Such are the results and the inconsistent operation of the principles of the superior. Two remarks only in conclusion: 1. It appears to me that there is some error in the inferences drawn from the Statutes respecting the entry of adjudgers, and appraisers, and latterly purchasers. These were cases of compulsory changes of the vassal invito domino, often against his interest as superior, against the bargain and contract subsisting between superior and vassal, and against the fundamental obligation on the vassal of keeping the feu. Hence, as the superior could not be called upon to change the investiture once constituted, a bonus was to be given to him. But I do not think that these Statutes, and the rights which they recognise in superiors, bear very materially, if at all, on the question as to the vassal's power (having paid for his entry) to name his own heirs in the investiture that is to be completed, and by which he proposes to hold the feu without the power of sale: 2. I am surprised to find reference made to practice, which, however, is said only to exist to the extent of requiring reservations when entails are executed. No one need object to that, for the effect of such was future and undecided. But the important practice to look to is this. Is there a single case of any superior demanding a composition when a stranger succeeds under a fee-simple destination of an estate? Neither has notice been taken of the important practice of the prime superior of the whole land in the country, and attention has not been paid to the alarming claims which could open to the Crown against the subjects. On the argument of the superior, the Crown would have a claim for a year's rent in every case in which the heir asking for an entry had no other character than that of heir of provision, whether in fee-simple or tailzied destination. It is a great mistake to suppose that the rights of the Crown were not very deliberately and thoroughly investigated, after the institution of the new Court of Exchequer on the Union. On the contrary, the opinions in the State Paper Office, and the Advocates' Library, by the Scotch Crown counsel, show that every point was most narrowly and vigilantly looked into. It is stated in the case of Lockhart v. Denham, and I believe is the fact, that the Crown first raised the question after the Union, that a superior was not bound to receive a corporation. Many instances might be given of the vigilance with which all questions respecting the rights of the Crown were considered after the Union. Yet in no single instance has a composition ever been asked from any party named as heir or substitute by the vassal—that vassal having paid his own composition if a stranger. On the contrary, one composition, and one composition only, has hitherto enabled the Crown vassals, in obtaining right to their lands, to name any heirs of provision or tailzie they chose, and from no heir of tailzie has a composition ever been demanded, at least up to the date when I was a law officer of the Crown. On this point, I have a distinct memorandum from the office of Presenter of Signatures, obtained in 1829, when I was Solicitor-General. I must say that I attach the greatest importance to this practice on the part of the Crown. They have never even attempted, generally speaking, to reserve the claim for composition, although regularly exacted in every case of a proper stranger not entering as substitute, but as purchaser. It would be with great reluctance that I should feel constrained to open up to the Crown a new claim that would operate so severely and so extensively on the principles contended for by the pursuer.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the claim of the superior to one year's rent of the lands in question should be repelled, being the form of the interlocutor in the case of Lord Hopetoun, and the cause remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as he shall deem just. Whether a ratio should be added or not, in this case, may be a matter of question. If so, and I rather think the ground of judgment should be stated, I would propose that the finding should be, that "the defender, being an heir substituted in the deed granted by the vassal, and in the investiture, for which a composition was previously paid, is entitled to be entered as an heir, on payment of the casualty of relief."

Lord Medwyn.—This is certainly a very nice and difficult question. The Court, ever since the case of Denham, 1760, have waived the determination of it, and the diversity of opinion among our brethren, now that it comes before us for decision, shows its difficulty. I have given the case the most careful consideration, more especially since I have had the benefit of the opinions of my brethren; and the opinion I have formed, I now submit with all deference to that delivered by your Lordship.

I consider this declarator as the proper mode of trying the question, upon what terms the defender is to obtain an entry to the lands of Allershaw; neither do I think it of any importance in this case, that he is called into process as heir of entail. The question is, since the defender is unquestionably not the heir of the person last infest, but is an heir of provision merely, is the composition of a year's rent due for an entry, or is he to be received simply for a duplicand of the feu-duty?

When the first heir of entail, who was not heir of line of the maker, obtained an entry and was infest under the entail, he paid a year's rent to the superior, and a clause was inserted, that the superior was not to be excluded from any claim there might be at law for a full year's rent, when the future heirs of entail shall happen not to be heirs of line of the "person last entered and infest." The question, then, is open, and now comes for decision, as the defender is not heir of line but heir of provision only of Lord Balgray, the heir last entered under the composition paid; it is of no consequence whether it be under a strict entail or a simple destination. It will occur when the heir of provision comes to enter, although, by the unfettered nature of the property, he might have been excluded by the prior heir having changed the destination.

The question seems to me to depend much on the effect which the Act 1685 had on the right of superiors previously existing, which necessarily involves the inquiry as to how these rights stood at that period. "By the genuine principles of the feudal system, no vassal had a power to transfer the right of his feu to another without the superior's consent, and the superior was not bound to receive any person in the lands other than the heirs to whom he himself had limited the descent by the investiture, though the greatest sum should have been offered him in the name of entry."—Erskine, B. II. t. 7, § 5. And he quotes the case of Cleland, 24th February 1685, for this,—decided the very same year in which the Act concerning tailzies was passed,—where it was held that it was arbitrary for a superior to receive, or not to receive, a vassal. An important right was originally connected with this, that when the heirs of the investiture failed, the superior succeeded as ultimus hæres. There is a case in Balfour, p. 484, c. 5, to this effect in 1506, where the grant had been to a man and the heirs-male of his body; on the failure of these it was held that the superior was entitled to take them even from the heirs-female of his body. See also Balfour, p. 232, c. 38. Craig, B. II. d. 17, § 17, mentions this also as the right of the superior, but says that some thought the Crown should succeed. The opinion in favour of the Sovereign gained ground, so that in Dirleton, p. 119, he resolved the question by a reasonable distinction, that if the fee be limited as to heirs-male, on their failure the superior should have right; but if the grant be to heirs whatsoever, the fee is simple, and the grantor having given every right away, the superior had reserved nothing, and can pretend no right to the same.

But this distinction was not followed out, and the right of the Sovereign prevailed, and was enforced. In 1680, Fountainhall, Vol. I. p. 97, mentions two cases where the Crown, as ultimus hæres, excluded in the one case, daughters, and in the other, a brother; and in Tenant, July 1688, "The Lords found, that either in an original feu or posterior infestment of tailzie, where the provision is in favour of heirs-male, and not the heirs whatsoever, that the heir of line cannot succeed, but that the right does devolve on the King as ultimus hæres." Now, although the superior's right was here abridged, yet the donator of the Crown necessarily could obtain an entry on no other terms than any other singular successor. The donator is liable for the debts of the last possessor coming in place of the Crown, who, as Dirleton says, cannot succeed but by way of representation and as ultimus hæres; and he also must be liable in a composition like any other grantee. It would be different in the case of forfeiture for treason. A donor, on forfeiture, does not pay a composition for an entry. Blair, 1680, p. 15,045; Duke of Gordon, 1771, p. 15,050. The Sovereign did not take as an heir but by escheat, and therefore was not liable for the rebel's debts till 1690, c. 33.

The superior's right to refuse an entry to a stranger came to be abridged so early as the fifteenth century; for by 1469, c. 36, superiors were forced to receive creditors' appraisers as vassals, on payment of one year's rent of the lands; and although this was only intended for the case of judicial sales at the instance of creditors, and for their behoof, yet it came to be used as a device to compel the entry of a purchaser, by which, as Craig says, Lib. 3. D. 1, § 13, this right of refusal "hodie pæne subvertitur magno dominorum damno;" and yet he says he never heard such appraisings set aside sub pretextu aut collusionis aut simulationis. Superiors, it may be presumed, were generally satisfied with obtaining a year's rent for the transference, and this came to be fixed as the price for foregoing his right to refuse an entry, which might thus have been enforced upon them circuitously, more especially after the example set by the Sovereign; for the Act 1578, c. 66, mentions, that, by several acts of the Privy Council, purchasers were secure of being received as vassals by the Crown upon their reasonable expenses, i. e., on a composition to be paid to the Treasury, which practice fixed at a moderate rate one-sixth of the valued rent. The favourable manner in which the Sovereign has always treated vassals as to their entry, makes the circumstance that the Crown makes no such claim as the superior here does, which your Lordship says is the case, of less weight than it might otherwise have. A subject-superior is entitled to, and exacts a year's rent from a purchaser, although the Crown only claims a small portion of the valued rent. That, then, will not affect an ordinary superior's rights.

By 1669, c. 18, adjudications were put on the same footing as comprisings, with regard to payment of a year's rent, so that the superiors of lands, annualrents, and others adjudged, shall not be holden to grant any charter for infefting the adjudger, till such time as he be paid and satisfied of the year's rent of the lands and others adjudged; for although the Act 1621 had treated of adjudications against the heir lying out unentered, following out the Act 1540, c. 106, when a creditor, either his own or his ancestor's, wished to pursue for his debt; and although custom had also introduced adjudications in implement of disposition and obligations to infeft, yet to these the payment of a year's rent had not been extended.

When adjudications were substituted for appraisings by 1672, c. 19, the payment of a year's rent was still the condition; and finally, purchasers at a judicial sale were, by 1681, c. 17, entitled to an entry on the same terms.

Now, these relaxations of the superior's right were all, except the last, in favour of creditors, and the last, which was in favour of purchasers, was on account of its bearing on the interest of creditors. It was to give them payment of their debts that these statutory regulations were introduced. No change was made in the case of an ordinary purchaser, still less of a proprietor wishing to make a tailzie of his lands, cutting off the right line of heirs. These Statutes, accordingly, speak only of the superior receiving the appriser, or adjudger, or purchaser at the judicial sale, and never even mention heirs, far less heirs of provision. This would have been going beyond the object in view, which was simply to prevent the privilege of the superior absolutely to refuse a new vassal standing in the way of a creditor obtaining payment of his debt. If he wished to acquire the lands themselves, and destine them to heirs different from his heirs of line, I see no provision in any of these Statutes which could compel the superior to receive a series of strangers substituted to him. This, it appears, must have been still the subject of treaty with the superior.

I am quite aware that it was common for proprietors of land to tailzie their estates, sometimes more strictly and sometimes less so, by simple destination, with prohibitions, and finally, with irritant clauses, but they were not favourites of the law, and with great difficulty sanctioned. That this was so, is apparent from our Statute book. Thus James III., by 1476, c. 70, re-vokes all "tailzies maid in his tender age fra the richteous aires;" and Craig, Lib. 2. D. 16, § 12, says, that tailzies confirmed by subject-superiors, when minors, might be reduced by them. James IV., in like manner, by 1493, c. 51, revokes "all tailzies maid fra the aires-general to the aires-maill of anie landes in our realm,"—plainly implying that scarcely any other tailzie was then known; and in the revocation by James VI., by 1587, c. 31, of all tailzies made by him in his minority upon resignations from the heirs-general to the heirs-male, "against the law and gude conscience," an exception is made as to conquest, "because it is not against conscience that onie person quho acquires the richt of onie heritable landes, may take the same to sic aires as he pleises." This merely imports that a person acquiring lands might make them to descend to heirs-male, or perhaps stranger heirs, without being held to proceed against good conscience, but it by no means imports that the superior must receive these extraneous heirs, as he must the acquirer and his heirs of line. It is true Craig (Lib. 2, D. 1, § 13,) maintains that such entailts are neither against law nor conscience, and mentions that they were supported by the Court in the case of M'Lachlan v. Lamont, 1st March 1548, and accordingly this decision is reported by Balfour, p. 173, as the first case supporting that view of the law; but in the very next year an opposite judgment is given, p. 174, c. 3; and from a case also noticed by Balfour, decided a few years afterwards, where the term heirs of tailzie in general was extended to all such, as well in the right line descending as in side line or collateral—Campbell v. Grahame, 18th June 1566, p. 174,—I infer that these heirs of tailzie were heirs-male, and certainly could not be stranger heirs. Craig distinctly restricts the term heirs of tailzie to heirs-male, to the exclusion of heirs-female of the maker. Accordingly, one of the reasons he gives (L. 2, D. 16, § 20,) why tailzies were not encouraged by superiors, (and he says, "Taillari feuda ex jure nostro non possunt, nisi ex consensu domini sui superioris," L. 2, D. 3, § 43; and Stair lays down the same doctrine, that a "tailzie must be constituted by the superiors") is, that it excludes females "cum majores multæ commoditates proveniant ex hærede fæmina, quam masculo." This was no doubt the first form of entail; but when more distant relations came to be introduced into a substitution, Craig denominates them heirs of provision, giving them a new designation, as now first known to the law, in consequence of this enlarged exercise of the power of entailing.

But it may be that the form of apprising came at a later period, and nearer the date of the Act 1685, to be used not merely to procure an entry to a purchaser and his heirs or his heirs-male, but to strangers in their character of heirs of provision. But I see no proof of this, and I think there is no probability of it. When Craig complains, that under the Act 1469, purchasers, not creditors merely, compelled the superior to receive them on payment of a year's rent, and that he had never seen the attempt to resist this successful, I think it cannot be supposed that this was any thing else than the purchaser assuming the character of a creditor, but without any substitution of extraneous heirs. I do not believe that such substitutions were very common at that time; I rather suppose I may say that they were not; and I can scarcely doubt that, although the Courts of law were willing to abridge the rights of superiors, so as to admit a purchaser's entry on the same terms as if he were a creditor, they would have scrupled to allow of a substitution of stranger heirs, and compel the superior also to receive them by assuming a character totally alien from his true one, in order to accomplish such an object, at a time when the state of the country and of the law made so very intimate a connection between superior and vassal, and when it was almost essential that the superior should have a delectus persona in his vassal.

The opinion of Stair on this point is noticed on both sides. One thing is very clear, that in neither of the passages is the learned author treating of the point at present in dispute—the composition for an entry. In the first passage referred to, (B. II. t. 3, § 43,) he states it as the law, when his first edition was written prior to 1685, that tailzies must be constituted by the superior, and that he is not bound to alter the tenor of an investiture, except where it is provided by law, whereby he is necessitated to receive appraisers and adjudgers. This of course would be presumed to include only these creditors themselves and their heirs, as all that was necessary for the object in view; and so it is, for Stair goes on thus:—"So neither in that case is he obliged to constitute a tailzie, but only to receive the appriser or the adjudger and their heirs whatsoever." This is a very distinct expression of opinion; and I cannot help thinking, that when public opinion induced the courts of law to sanction the extension of the form of apprising to the case of purchasers, it would not go beyond the heirs whatsoever, or possibly heirs-male, and would not compel the superior to receive strangers not of his own selection for vassals, and to the loss of a composition for an entry. One case mentioned by Stair, which immediately follows the words last quoted, fortifies this view; for the superior is only to receive the adjudger and his heirs, "unless the debt and decret where on the same proceeded be conceived in favour of heirs of tailzie, in which case the apprising or adjudication, and infestment thereupon, must be conform, unless it be otherwise by consent of parties." Certainly an adjudication on a debt must be in conformity with the destination in the bond constituting the debt, and unless by mutual consent this be altered, the decree must pass in these terms. This is merely following out the benefit conferred on a creditor, in order to recover payment from the lands of his debtor, for the remedy would have been incomplete if adjudication could not pass on a tailed bond for borrowed money. But it would not be often that securities for money would be taken in that form, so as to bring in a stranger, instead of simply to the creditor, his heirs and executors; and to admit it in such a case, is a very different matter indeed from allowing a proprietor to make an entail of his estate to a series of stranger substitutes, and adjudge either upon a bond or obligation to convey, so framed. As yet, Stair most clearly is treating of the case of a real creditor for borrowed money adjudging; and I farther think he is treating of the rights of a proper creditor, when he goes on to consider the case where the apprising or adjudication has been on a bond to heirs, and a tailed infestment is wished; for he says—"or at least, if the appriser or adjudger crave the infestment to himself and the heirs of tailzie, the superior ought not to refuse it." He is certainly not bound to do more than allow the lands to be adjudged in terms of the bond; but the reason why he should not refuse to give infestment in favour of heirs of tailzie, is, not that he has no right to do so, but this—"for the apprising or adjudication being assigned to a stranger, he behaved to be infest, much more the alteration of heirs is allowable." It is then only an alteration of heirs that is in view, as instead of heirs whatsoever, destining the lands perhaps to heirs-male, not the substitution of strangers; and the reason given shows, that even as to heirs, it is only one alteration of heirs that is contemplated, not a destination including as many strangers to himself and to each other as the maker of the deed may choose. For if an adjudication be assigned before infestment to a stranger, the stranger must be infest. But he will pay a composition just as the adjudger would have done. Nay, there is a case where an adjudger assigned to an assignee, and he again, without taking infestment, to another, and the superior was obliged to receive this second assignee, receiving only a single composition—(Colmaie, 12th March 1629, p. 200). But this only introduces the first stranger into the investiture; it goes no way to support the notion, that any number of stranger substitutes might be introduced into a tailzie, and the superior compelled to receive them on payment of a single composition, still less that a proprietor might tailzie on himself or his heirs-male, whom failing strangers, and could force the superior by adjudication to grant him an investiture in these terms, when, of course, he must be received upon payment of relief as an heir only. Nay, I think I may draw this inference from it, that it could not then be held that an appriser even, far less a purchaser, under the form of an apprising, could compel the superior to give an investiture to him, and to a series of stranger substitutes, for a single year's composition, otherwise such a claim never would have been made, that each assignee, before infestment, must pay composition. This was plainly viewed as defeating a right to refuse such substitutes without paying a composition. But the claim was not sustained upon a principle quite apart from admitting the right of an appriser to force the superior to receive any heirs of provision the appriser chose to offer as vassals.

It will be observed that I use the term tailzie in its original meaning, whether protected by irritant clauses or not. If they be so protected, this gives the superior a stronger interest to enforce his right, but it arises under the other form also.

It is fit, too, that I should notice, that after the passing of the Act 1685, Stair made no change in the above passage of his work. He does not seem to think that the Act in this respect at all abridged the right of the superior. How easy and how natural would it have been for him to have noticed this, if it really had been his view of the Act. But it must not be forgotten, that if a purchaser did wish to destine his lands to a series of stranger heirs, there was a privilege which the superior had which would effectually prevent him, under the guise of an adjudger, from forcing upon him strangers as his vassals, so that it must still have been matter of treaty between them. For the Act as to apprisings authorised the superior to acquire the subject appraised by making payment of the debt; and the same privilege was extended to an adjudger in the case of Scot, 10th June 1671, where it was farther found that it was redeemable from the superior by the vassal within the legal, without paying a year's entry, because the vassal was thus not changed. (Stair B. 2, t. 4, § 12.) I may notice, in passing, that the same privilege was not given to the superior in the case of a judicial sale. (Kennedy, 6th February 1695.) Fountainhall says, "the Lords unanimously found the superior's right of redeeming took no place in their sales."

As to the other passage referred to from Stair, § 59, it seems to me to advert merely to this, that if a superior does not accept of resignation voluntarily, he will be obliged to admit the adjudger in implement; but it says nothing as to stranger heirs being forced on the superior by this form of proceeding. I wish finally to remark, that in neither of the cases last mentioned, is there the least appearance that the destination was other than to the adjudger and his heirs; nor can I discover in our books a single instance of an adjudger forcing an entry for stranger heirs. There are abundance of instances in the Dictionary v. Superior and Vassal, of adjudgers claiming an entry, and also of superiors suspending such a charge on various grounds, but not a single instance on the ground that it was to introduce stranger heirs. All bear that the entry is for the adjudger simply, which, I must say, satisfies me that no greater relaxation of the superior's right to refuse a change of vassals was sanctioned beyond the statutory enactment compelling him to receive an appriser or adjudger. I cannot hold that it was so extended in practice, that it was vain for even the most determined stickler for a superior's privileges to urge this plea. I think the legitimate conclusion, from the absence of decided cases, is, that no adjudger believed the Court would sustain such a claim, and therefore, that, as in the case of a voluntary purchaser, he knew he must transact with the superior, if he wished the subject adjudged to pass to stranger heirs, and that he could only acquire this privilege by treaty with the superior.

Upon the whole, then, I do not see that it has been made out that a superior was bound, prior to 1685, in granting an investiture to an adjudger, or to a purchaser in the form of an adjudger, to go beyond the ordinary style to him and his heirs-male or heirs of line, but not to strangers whom he might wish to substitute; and as the superior could always exclude him by taking the adjudication to himself, this was an additional power he had to make him purchase a destination such as he wished, by paying what could only be matter of treaty and contract between them.

The Act 1685 was then passed, and as it is the main ground of the vassal's plea in this case, it is of great importance to attend to its object, and its enactments for carrying out that object. I presume it will not be disputed, that its sole object was to legalise the irritant clauses of an entail so as to make them effectual against creditors and purchasers, and to do this in such a way as to protect the interest of future heirs of entail, at the same time doing as little injury as possible to any other members of the community. Hence, when the Legislature enacted, that it should be lawful to tailzie estates, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions as they think fit, and to affect them with irritant and resolute clauses, it was necessary to provide some mode of informing the public of what tailzies were allowed, that creditors and purchasers might know they were dealing with a person who could not bind his estate. This was done by production of the entail to the Court of Session, and its insertion in the Register of Taillies. In case it might be thought that, by implication, the superior's rights might be affected, which was the only other interest to be attended to, this was done by an express reservation thrown in at the close of the Act, that nothing in this Act shall prejudice "his Majesty, or any other lawful superior, of the casualties of superiority which arise to them out of the tailzied estate." I must say, this is just what I would have expected from the aristocratic Parliament which sanctioned tailzies. I never could have conceived that they would have made so total a change on the rights of superiors, as to make any Act compelling them to receive any series of heirs the vassal chose. This was not necessary to secure their estates for the welfare of their family, which is always the inductive cause of entails. I am aware that Erskine says (B. II. t. 7, § 6), that a method of obtaining an entry, which was universally considered as a new limitation of the superior's rights, was established by the Act 1685, so that the superior is not left at liberty to refuse the entering of those heirs whom the vassal hath named under the authority of a public law; and, moreover, that the superior is not entitled to a composition for every heir of entail who is not heir of line to him who is last infeft. These views of the law are rested on the case of Denham, and the opinions of lawyers which led to that decision; and certainly they would have been entitled to the greatest weight, and, indeed, could hardly have been got the better of, if the credit of that decision had not been shaken by subsequent judicial procedure. The right of the superior was, in that case, held so much altered by the Act 1685, that it was not competent for the parties even to stipulate, that in the event occurring of a stranger heir succeeding, he should pay a year's rent, at least he could not bind an heir of entail in this payment. But in the subsequent cases of M'Kenzie and the Duke of Argyll, the Court disclaimed this view, and allowed a clause of reservation to be inserted in the superior's charter, to allow the right to be determined when the case should occur. We are now called upon to do so; and I cannot discover any thing in the Act 1685 to abridge the superior's prior rights, even had there been no reservation in his favour. The powers of the proprietors alone was the subject of the Act, so as to make an entail effectual against creditors and purchasers, putting it out of the power of heirs of entail to deal with any such to the prejudice of future heirs. It had no other object. It does not enact that the superior must grant an investiture to such heirs as the maker chooses. It left the entry, as before, to be the subject of adjustment between them. But if possible to make this more clear, the superior's right to the casualties is declared not to be prejudiced. This surely as clearly applies to composition as it does to relief.

Your Lordship has examined with great minuteness the character of this payment, and the place it holds in our law books. You also mention, that in the clause of reservation in the West-shiel case, the payment of composition is distinguished from the ordinary casualties of superiority; and you conclude that the reservation in the Act does not apply to the composition for an entry of a singular successor, but only to the relief for an heir. As already said, I cannot believe that the Parliament 1685 wished to abridge a superior's rights, without even any express notice that they were doing so, or that, in the reservation of these rights, they did not intend to include this most important one,—the right of not having a vassal forced upon him, not the heir of the person entered. I know very well that the composition for receiving a singular successor could not originally be reckoned among the superior's casualties, because it was not matter of right in the stranger, but of purchase and composition from the superior, whence its name, and whence also its place in our institutes of law; but when it could be enforced by an appriser or adjudger, it becomes of the same nature as any other of the casualties; it truly became a casualty; and in truth I think the reservation more expressly referred to it than to any other of the feudal casualties. What effect could the entailing clauses have upon ward, marriage, or recognition? The last it more effectually prevented; the other would occur as before. Moreover, an entail would not exclude irritancy ob non solum. In fact, it was the introduction of strangers into the series of heirs of entail which would affect the superior's casualties, and therefore this probably alone called for the express reservation.

And this, I think, was effectually done by the Act; so that whatever privilege the superior had before the Act, as to agreeing or not agreeing to receive strangers as heirs of investiture, he continued to have after it; and the entailing powers only operated in favour of the vassal, when he paved the way for it, by receiving the superior's consent to the admission of strangers as heirs of the investiture, and adjusting the composition due on an alteration of heirs.

To say, because the Act authorises the lieges to substitute heirs in their tailzies, that this gave these substitutes, in all respects, the character and right of heirs of line to the maker, in a question with the superior, so as to convert a mere stranger into any other heir than an heir of provision, does not seem to me a sound inference. The term heir, I think, will never solve the question. Each substitute is an heir of entail, and has his rights and character as such in reference to the maker, and the heirs before him, and the heirs substituted after him under the entail, which is the charter and measure of his rights. But quoad the superior, he is still an heir of provision, and, if a stranger to the former investiture, he will remain so under the entail, until it is acknowledged unreservedly by the superior, and an investiture in his favour made up under it. But till then, though called as an heir in the entail, he is a stranger to the superior, and must be dealt with as such by him.

I may remark, that the insertion of the clause in the superior's confirmation of the entail of West-shiel,—that every heir of entail should pay a year's rent for his entry, unless he was heir of line to the person last vest and seised,—is very strong proof that our lawyers at that time did not hold such an heir entitled to an entry merely by paying the relief. It appears that the clause was twice introduced in 1726, and again in 1737, when the judgment which forfeited the estate was reversed, and the appellant took an entry. The composition paid had been £200. I cannot conceive a stronger illustration as to the understanding of the law at this time of both superiors and vassals than this; and it is important to observe who were the counsel who advised the parties at that time. From the appeal cases it appears that, besides others on one side, there was Duncan Forbes, and on the other, the last President Dundas and Lord Grange, during the period of his return to the bar, after resigning his seat on the bench. These were great lawyers, and we may presume that, at the suggestion of the one, and with the approbation of the others, this clause was introduced as a due exercise of the reservation in favour of the superior, of his rights in the Act 1685. I may notice, in passing, an illustration arising out of this case. The entail which Sir William Denham made in 1711 was not feudalized by him. Sir Archibald Stewart Denham was the first heir who made up a title under it, having irritated the right of a prior heir, and as he was not heir of line to Sir William, he paid the composition as a singular successor. This title was set aside, and the prior heir, Sir Robert, was found entitled to the estate, the composition being allowed to Sir Archibald, as if paid to the superior by Sir Robert, and the same clause was again inserted. It was held in 1760, that having thus acknowledged the entail, the superior was not entitled to a year's rent when Sir Archibald succeeded to Sir Robert, as he did, not being his heir of line. But suppose that Sir William Denham had, at the date of the entail, applied to the superior to give him an investiture under this entail to himself and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to Robert Baillie and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to Mr Archibald Stewart, and the heirs-male of his body, would the superior have been bound to do so on payment of relief as an heir? The entail was made in 1711, and the entailor was an old man without heirs-male. He died next year. The superior was not, if he confirmed the entail in favour of Sir William, entering a singular successor, so that composition was not then due as for a singular successor, while it was very clear that it must be due at no very distant period. The superior surely was not bound to acknowledge the entail? That the interlocutor in 1760 implies, as it holds he had excluded his claim to refuse, and this must have been by a voluntary act of his own. The vassal could not surely force a renewal of the investiture, as if it had been simply to Sir William Denham, and his heirs or his heirs-male? Therefore, I think it must be held, that it was still a matter of transaction between the parties, as they clearly viewed it at the time, although effect was not afterwards given to it by the Court. Sir William Denham could not be called on to pay composition as a singular successor, as was found subsequently in the case of M'Kenzie; and if I am right in holding that the superior was entitled to a composition when Baillie took an entry under this entail, which really seems not questionable, on what principle can it be said that if he, having possessed the estate, should die without heirs-male, and Archibald Stewart, not his heir of line, came to succeed, should not be liable for a composition on his entry? It might be held that an heir of entail was not entitled to bind a future heir in payment of this; but if a reservation of the right to demand it be inserted when the case occurs, I am unable to see on what ground it can be resisted as often as it occurs.

Considering that there is so much difference of opinion upon the point among us, I am happy to fortify my own views by referring to the opinion of Lord Balgray, in the case of the Merchant Company, 17th January 1815. He observes, "a third encroachment arose from the Statute 1685. It empowers all men to entail their lands; and by that Act, the rights of the Crown and of all superiors are reserved. Yet the superior was bound to receive the heir of entail, if he were also heir of line, though he succeeded as a disponent, and he could not object to do so;" that is, when he received him, he was bound to receive him as an heir, and paying relief only. "But whenever the entail went beyond the heir of the original investiture, or called others than the heir of line, it was considered that the superior's right to impose an entry revived under the reservations in the Act." He then refers to the cases of M'Kenzie and the Duke of Argyll, "and the cases of the Earl of Dalhousie and the Earl of Breadalbane, decided in Exchequer, where the parties found caution, that, upon the succession opening to the fourth son, they would pay a year's rent." This I must consider an opinion of very great weight.

The same observation applies to the last change made on the rights of superior and vassal by the Act 20 Geo. II. A purchaser may obtain an entry from the superior under a title containing an unexecuted procuratory in his favour. He was no longer to act as an adjudger; but then it is expressly provided that the vassal must pay such fees or casualties as the superior is entitled to "receive on the entry of such purchaser." The case here is simply the reception of the purchaser as vassal, and the superior's casualty on his entry is to be paid before he can obtain his title. This Statute, in this respect, shows a due regard to the superior's rights; its object was to take from him a privilege inconsistent with the advanced state of the country, and the altered condition of superior and vassal, in relation to each other; but it went no farther, and it did not say that the payment then made would cover any series of heirs of investiture that might be introduced into an entail. To extend a vassal's right so far, and so far abridge the superior's, was not necessary for the object in view, and was certainly not expressly enacted. The utmost that can be said for it, that it is inferentially deduced as the result of the two acts, granting an authoritative right to the entry of such heirs as the vassal chooses, without expressly declaring that no casualty is to be paid on a change of heir. The view of the Legislature seems to have been all along the very proper one,—to grant a privilege to vassals, trenching as little on the superior's rights as possible, when both are compatible. It is quite compatible to allow the entailing on a series of heirs, and not defeat the right of the superior to a composition as often as a stranger succeeds as heir of provision; and therefore, upon the whole, I concur in the views of the majority of the consulted Judges.

Lord Moncreiff.—This is undoubtedly a question of importance. It was once decided in Lockhart v. Denham, 10th July 1760; and, notwithstanding all that has since occurred, I still think that case rightly considered—an authority of very great weight. But if the discussions which have since taken place, have the effect of rendering the material question still an open point, subject to the force of all the authorities together, though in none of the later cases, except that of Baillie, did the facts require or admit of a judgment on the point,—at the least I cannot hold it to have been determined in opposition to Lockhart, and the express authority of Erskine, by anything which took place in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Lord Hopetoun, which appears to me to have been different from the present case in the essential facts on which it depended, and which did not admit of any judgment on the question which the Court are here called upon to resolve.

On principle, I can find no solid distinction between the case of one heir of an investiture and that of another; between one series of heirs, not the heirs of the old investiture, who are once established in the superior's charter, and any other series so established. Whether they are natural heirs to one another or not, they are all heirs of the investiture, and enter as heirs of provision.

The case is, that there is an entail by Miss Ewart (who was fully entered) to herself in liferent, whom failing to William Cossar, &c., with a procuratory of resignation. He resigned, and got a charter engrossing the entail, on paying the composition of a year's rent. This was right. But once done, the entail was sanctioned as the ground of the investiture, and all the heirs as heirs of provision under it. The superior had no power to refuse the charter in these terms. He was bound by the Statutes to grant it, the composition being paid. He could not refuse, on the ground that the granter exercised the statutory power of imposing the conditions of an entail. This is not the question argued. The superior would not have been allowed to insert a clause binding the heirs of tailzie, who might not be heirs of line of their predecessor, to pay a year's rent on entering; not such a clause as that which occurred in the case of Lockhart. All the decisions together import that the utmost admissible was a mere reservation of such a question, leaving it open on both sides. (See clause of reservation in this case, p. 28 of record). Cossar might have taken infestment. But he held on the open charter. Still Lord Balgray took the estate as heir of provision to him by service. He was no assignee of Cossar, to whom the charter was granted; a fact very material with reference to the case of Lord Hopetoun. He was the heir specially, and nominatim recognised as such in the charter. Lord Balgray was infest on the charter as the vassal of investiture, taking not as assignee, but as heir. No composition could be due then on any supposition. Yet it must be said, that as he was not an heir of line or heir-male of Cossar, he would have been bound to pay it if Cossar had taken infestment; his not doing of which was a mere accidental circumstance. Lord Balgray dies without issue. The defender is heir of the investiture nominatim; and the question arises, Is he bound to enter as if he were a disponent or singular successor paying a year's rent, because he is not the heir of line, or an heir by blood of Lord Balgray?

The plea in law for the pursuer is very vague: That, in the circumstances condescended on, the defender is bound to pay a year's rent. It is not made precise in the pursuer's case, p. 29. He speaks of "the heir of the last vassal." He does not say the heir of line, nor does he exclude the case of heir-male general of the last. He leaves it doubtful whether his plea limited to total strangers or not. But I understand the pursuer to mean his ground to be, that the defender is not heir of Lord Balgray by blood; not that he is not heir of Cossar, the institute of the entail and the charter; nor, that he is not an heir of the entailer. It is put on his not being heir of blood to the last person infest as heir, though that person was himself a stranger both to the entailer and to the first heir or institute. It so stands by the clause of reservation, which puts it on the heir succeeding not being heir of line of the last heir. There is another peculiarity in the conclusion of the pursuer's case, that the defender must accept of a charter with a similar reservation. But, suppose the composition were due by the first extraneous heir, it might be a question, whether that must be continuous. Yet I understand the plea to be that it must apply to every such heir successively.

In this state of the case, I look for the law necessary to support such a claim. And I may just observe, before going farther, that it appears to me to be a claim totally different in principle and character from anything to be found in the opinion incidentally delivered in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Lord Hopetoun, on which the chief reliance is placed by the pursuer.

It is not necessary to go into the ancient history of the law, the state of it now in the essential points being clear. 1. By the Act 1469, a superior was bound to enter appraisers on payment of a year's rent. 2. By the Act 1689, c. 36, he was bound to enter adjudgers on the same footing. It is unnecessary to observe, that thereby the investiture was fundamentally altered without the consent of the superior. 3. But by 20 Geo. II., he became bound to enter all disponees on payment of the usual "dues and casualties," which provision has been understood to mean the composition of a year's rent in the first instance, and the casualties afterwards falling due. Entries or renewals of the investiture, under the force of these Statutes, are totally different from an original grant. But, 4. By the Statute 1685, c. 22, all proprietors became entitled to make tailzies of their lands and estates to any series of heirs that they pleased, and under such conditions and clauses, irritant and resolute, as they might think fit, but with a provision that the Act should not militate to the prejudice of superiors of the casualties of superiority. I understand it to be undoubted law, that whatever reservations it may be competent to insert in the charter, the superior cannot refuse an entry upon such a title, or object to it on the ground that it contains clauses irritant and resolute. I do not understand that any point is here raised on this subject. But I may observe, that if the superior were entitled to object on account of the entailing clauses, the time for settling any such question ought to be when the charter is first granted constituting the new investiture. The Duke of Hamilton was in that position in Duke of Hamilton against Lord Hopetoun, and the opinion delivered in that case, whatever may be the effect of it, had precise relation to that position. If there were any equity for a consideration being paid to the superior, because of the effect of the entailing clauses, it could only be at first,—for something to be paid, besides the composition by the institute as disponee. If the entail has been acknowledged by the superior without any reservation of such a claim, the investiture is constituted, and has become, by the act of the superior, the law of the feu; and as to the clause of reservation in the Statute of the superior's casualties, I concur in the commentary of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

And, with reference to the present case, if the estate may be effectually entailed, so that no alienation can ever take place, what intelligible interest can the superior have in the particular nature of the destination? If the vassal may tie up the property for ever to any number of heirs, ending with the Crown, what is it to the superior whether these heirs shall be heirs of blood to one another, or successive serieses of strangers, but all called as heirs, one after another? I agree in the observation of Lord Kaimes, that if the superior suffers, it is by the inevitable effect of the power to make such an entail.

When I look to the law as it stands upon the authorities, I can see no ground for the present claim; and I think that, if it were sustained in the form in which it is maintained, it would introduce great confusion in the practical application of the principles which regulate the subject.

All the cases settle this generally, that persons who are heirs of the last infest are entitled to enter, on payment of the relief, only as heirs, although they succeed in virtue of special destinations.

The case of M'Kenzie is particularly strong on this point. For the question arose with the first heir of tailzie asking, for the first time, a charter upon the entail: And he was found entitled to the charter as an heir, because he was the heir of the former investiture, with only a reservation of any claim against future heirs, but reserving also their defences. The reservation in that case was of a very peculiar nature; because not only the entail had never been acknowledged by the superior, but no composition had yet been paid for the change of the investiture. It was in like manner determined in the case of the Duke of Argyll, that the heir of entail was entitled to enter as an heir, though the superior was permitted to insert a similar reservation of the question as to future heirs. I shall again advert to these cases more particularly. But, though a question of this kind may stand reserved, it still remains to be considered, what the nature of that question is, and what the merits of the claim are, when the occasion arises for considering them. The Court have constantly refused to sanction any reservation directly recognising the validity of the claim. Accordingly, the reservation in the present case is merely, that the superior shall not be precluded, by granting the charter, from any claim which he may have at law for a full year's rent, whenever the heir of entail succeeding shall not be heir of line of the last entered and infest. It will be observed, that the pursuer does not venture to make a claim to this precise effect; and, as I understand the opinions which differ from mine, it is not held that the composition is due wherever the heir of tailzie is not the heir of line of the last infest. The doctrine now maintained is much more peculiar and abstract,—that the question depends altogether on whether the heir of provision asking an entry, is in any manner related by blood to the predeceasing heir. This is a very different proposition from that advanced in the summons in this case: and I must own that it is a proposition for which I can find no authority in the law. It is in no institutional writer, and in no decision with which I am acquainted. Even the incidental opinion, in the case of the Duke of Hamilton against Lord Hopetoun, is, as I have understood that opinion, utterly at variance with it. That seems to intimate, with reference to the special case, that the heirs called by the charter claimed on by the assignee of the procuratory, must all be heirs by blood to him. It happened that it was so in that case, which excluded the point, and withdrew attention from the peculiar qualification of the opinion. I understood it merely to indicate, that a tailzie by the assignee to strangers would be a different case. But that is a very different matter from the plea in the present case.

When we look at the authorities, the first thing which presents itself is the express doctrine laid down by Erskine. The question reserved, even if the pursuer be allowed to rid himself of the peculiar conclusion above alluded to, is distinctly this, whether the heir of a special investiture already in the titles derived from the superior must enter as a singular successor, if he be not an heir by blood to the last entered vassal. Then, what says Erskine to that doctrine? (Ersk. II. 7. 7.) "Yet where a proprietor entails his lands, the superior is not entitled to the composition of a year's rent from every successive heir of entail, who is not heir of line to him who stood last infest, on pretence that he is a singular successor. The heir of the last investiture cannot be called a singular successor; and he is founded in a right to demand an entry, upon payment to the superior of the sum due to him by law, in name of relief, upon the entry of an heir." Then as to Erskine's authority, it is true he refers to the case of Lockhart. I am not satisfied that that is not very high authority; but the first authority is in Mr. Erskine's own work. He so held it; and to this hour there is nothing to contradict it. The utmost is a permission to keep the point open. Mr. Bell is incorrectly referred to. He merely says that the question is undecided. Then consider the state of the cases,—1st, Lockhart v. Denham. I think it remains a decision of great importance. Divested of specialities, the heir of entail had taken a charter on a procuratory of resignation, with a very special clause of reservation. An attempt was made to decide the point on the charter, on the ground of the reservation being made a condition in the title. The real question there was, whether that was consistent with law. It was pleaded that the heir of entail could not be bound by the acceptance of the charter by another. But, besides, what power had the superior to insert the reservation if he was bound to grant the charter? Therefore, it could have no effect but as a reservation of the question. The idea, in the later cases, seems to have been, that the Court refused to acknowledge it even as a reservation, because they found, that in respect the entail had been acknowledged, the claim would not lie. But I doubt the correctness of this. I suspect that the idea was, that the imperative nature of the clause, once put in the investiture, should have been binding, being unreduced. But it may have been otherwise. The Court may not have regarded the reservation. But surely, if with such a clause they still held, on the merits, that the heir of investiture was entitled to enter on payment of relief only, it is a judgment on the merits of that question, and, a fortiori in the present case, where clearly the clause does no more than keep the question open. For the effect of the clause is not to qualify the charter or investiture. The superior could not help granting the charter, and the clause is merely a salvo by permission, to avoid discussing a question which might be unnecessary. In the report of Lockhart's case, the pursuer argues on the reservation as barring the defender from objecting, personal objections. The defender merely said it was of no weight, because he does not represent the taker of the charter. But he argues the whole merits on the footing of the question being open. In the later cases, all that can be said is, that the question was waived as unnecessary to be decided. In the case of M'Kenzie, it was a single composition that was asked, and it was found not due, though the entail had never before been recognised, because the heir asking an entry was the heir of the former investiture. The reservation allowed was only of the claim on the entry "of any future heir of tailzie, not an heir of the investiture prior to the tailzie." This is not at all what is maintained here; and it reserved also "to the said heirs all defences against the same." It is clear, that all that was contemplated was the question of one composition for the change of investiture. The opinions reported by Lord Hailes are not favourable to the pursuer. The Lord President evidently held the case of Lockhart an important decision. Lord Gardenston and other Judges held the same. Lord Braxfield says nothing against it, nor the Lord Justice-Clerk. The reservation was agreed to, to leave the question open.

In the case of Argyle, Lord Dunmore had offered to pay a composition, being institute. The pursuer required a positive declaration that he would not be bound to enter future heirs, not heirs-male or of line of the person last entered, without another composition. The defender offered a reservation of the question, and the question discussed was, whether that was sufficient? Plainly it decided nothing, but that the pursuer was not entitled to frame his charter in the way he required. The observation on Denham was, merely, that so far as effect was supposed to have been denied to a similar reservation as that offered, it must have been erroneous. But it does not appear that effect was so denied to it. It was only denied to the effect asked by the Duke of Argyle. In the case of Baillie the precise case occurred. But there was this specialty, that a charter had been granted without any special reservation, and it was pleaded the pursuer did not represent the grantor of the charter but as heir of entail. It was indeed said it would not decide the general question. But the point of right was decided. Lord Corebouse's note is direct on the very question. I grant that the question is reserved here; but, though it is reserved, the question remains, how it is to be decided?—Duke of Hamilton v. Hopetoun. The judgment in that case was not meant to be adverse to the opinion in Baillie. But the case was very peculiar. There was a charter to Lord Hopetoun and his heirs and assignees. A composition had been paid. Then there was an assignment to a series of heirs in the marriage-contract of his son, Earl John, all heirs of the assignee's blood. There had been no acknowledgment by the superior of any special destination, and the question was simply, whether one composition was not due for the first acknowledgment of the destination in the deed of assignment? That was manifestly an entirely different question from that which here occurs. Lord Stair, in the passage which has been referred to, (B. II. t. 3, § 59, beginning "as to the first case, it is a general rule," &c.), contemplates strangers as well as heirs in blood being members in the constitution of the tailzies he is speaking of. And your Lordship reminds me, that, if the principle contended for were to be sustained, it would throw the whole matter of making up titles to entailed estates into confusion. At present it is impossible to say, whether it is necessary for every heir who is a stranger to the heir last infest to pay composition, or whether the first substitute of a new series in blood should pay composition. It is difficult to say what would be the result, if the views of the defenders were to regulate the law; and as there are very few entails in which new members are not introduced, whether every substitute of a new series in blood is to be considered as a stranger, or whether only the first. The superior asks composition on the succession of the first member of a new series, but I do not well see whether every other member is to pay composition equally with the first.

Lord Meadowbank, who was confined by illness, communicated the following opinion:

"When this case originally came from the Lord Ordinary, the opinion which I had formed concurred generally in the views of that stated by Lord Mackenzie; but having since reconsidered the case, I have altered that opinion, and now concur in the result of that of Lords Cockburn, Cuninghame, Murray and Ivory. And having had an opportunity of very deliberately considering the notes of the opinion which has been formed by the Lord Justice-Clerk, I find the grounds of my own therein so clearly and luminously stated, that I am desirous that upon them mine should be understood to rest. My absence, therefore, from the deliberations of the Court can be of no importance to the parties, because it would have been impossible for me to have added any thing in farther elucidation of his Lordship's judgment."

The Court,

"In accordance with the opinions of the majority of the whole of the consulted Judges, find that the pursuer is bound to receive and give an entry to the defender as an heir of the investiture, on payment of the ordinary casualty of relief; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the cause as to his Lordship shall seem fit; and find no expenses due to either party."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Whigham, Cook; James M'Innes, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. G. G. Bell, A. C. Dick; James Peddie, junior, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

14th February 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 208.—HEPBURN, Petitioner.

Process—Bankrupt—Trustee—Bond of Caution.

The estates of a bankrupt having been sequestrated, the creditors were paid off by a composition contract; and the trustee thereafter applied to the Court, with concurrence of the bankrupt, and with consent of the cautioners in the composition contract, to obtain exoneration, and to have his bond of caution delivered up. The Court, on the report of the Lord Ordinary, remitted to his Lordship to exoner the trustee and to deliver up the bond of caution,—no balance appearing to be due by the petitioner.

Lord Ordinary on the Bills, Ivory.—[G.D.F.]

14th February 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 209.—ESSON, Petitioner.

Process—Bankrupt—Judicial Factor—Bond of Caution—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 14.—The Lord Ordinary on the bills having, in terms of the 14th section of the Bankrupt Act, appointed a judicial factor to administer the estate of a deceased, in regard to which sequestration had been applied for, until it should be awarded, and the proper officer appointed, held entitled, where there was no balance due by the factor, to declare the factor exonerated, and to order his bond of caution to be delivered up,—the application for doing so being presented by the factor with concurrence of the trustee in the sequestration.

The petitioner had been appointed judicial factor by the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber, in the sequestration of a deceased (Wilson), under the 14th section of 2d and 3d Vict. c. 41, until sequestration should be awarded; and with the concurrence of the trustee, he applied "for warrant to get up his bond of caution."

The Lord Ordinary, on a verbal report to the Court, suggested, that as the appointment had been made by him in the Bill-Chamber, he was entitled to declare the petitioner exonerated, and grant warrant to deliver up the bond, as his Lordship considered that the trustee's concurrence in the application, and adoption of the accounts, was a sufficient warrant for the step.

The Court approved of this procedure, on the understanding that there was no balance due by the judicial factor; and the Lord Ordinary thereafter granted warrant for delivering up the bond as craved.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—[G.D.F.]

10th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 210.—SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS ELLIOT and TRUSTEES, Pursuers, v. JAMES and GEORGE CLEGHORN, and JOHN WILSON, Defendants.—Et è contra.

Bona Fide Possessor.—Circumstances in which the purchasers of an entailed estate, afterwards evicted from them, were found entitled, under deduction of the annual payments affecting the estate, to appropriate the rents as bona fide possessors, up to the date when the decree of eviction was affirmed by the House of Lords.

Sequel of case, ante, 2d June 1837, House of Lords, August 27, 1839.

By a decision of the Court of Session, affirmed on appeal, the pursuers having succeeded, on the one hand, in evicting the lands in question from the defenders, and the defenders, on the other, in having claims to the amount of £12,715 constituted real burdens upon the entailed estate, it became necessary to determine the right to the bygone rents,—the pursuers demanding an accounting for the rents from Sir William Elliot's accession to the estate in 1812, or at least from the decree in 1825 restoring the lands to the heirs of entail, and the defenders claiming the rents (under deduction of the burdens and debts affecting the estate) as bona fide possessors up to 1828, when they renounced possession in consequence of the decree of 1825 having been affirmed by the House of Lords.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"9th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, as well in the process of reduction at the instance of Sir W. F. Elliot, as in the process of declarator, repletion, &c., at the instance of James and George Cleghorn, and the trustees of the late John Wilson, upon the several points still remaining for decision between the parties, and having made avizandum, and having thereafter resumed consideration of both processes, and having had special regard to the previous judgments pronounced therein, conjoins the said processes, and Finds, Primo, That so far as regards the principal of all the sums specified in the judgment pronounced by this Court in the process of declarator on the 31st January (signed 2d June) 1837, and affirmed on appeal the 27th August 1839, and which were therein found and declared still to form real burdens on the entailed estate, it is res judicata that the said sums were constituted real burdens, as said is, to the full extent of their several amounts, as specified in the said judgment, and to the exclusion of all deduction therefrom, in respect of any intromissions had by the said James and George Cleghorn and others with the rents or fruits of the said entailed estate during the period of their remaining in bona fide possession thereof: Secundo et separatim, Finds, that even if the rights of parties in this respect had not been so fixed, the said James and George Cleghorn and others were entitled, in their character of bona fide possessors, and according to the rule of law, that 'bonæ fidei possessor fructus perceptos et consumptos suos facit, et non cogitur restituere consumptos quantummodo iis sit factus locupletior,' to appropriate and deal with the whole rents or fruits of the said estate accruing during the period of their bona fide possession as their own absolute and exclusive property, and were not bound to apply the same, either in whole or in part, in extinction of the said real burdens, and are not now bound to allow deduction therefor out of the said burdens, or in diminution of the same, in any question between them and the said Sir W. F. Elliot, or the other heirs of entail, or the entailed estate itself: Tertio, Finds, however, as regards interest on the said sums, that the said James and George Cleghorn and others were bound, during the period of their said possession, to keep down and discharge the same, so far as their said intromissions with the rents or fruits of the estate afforded the means of so doing, and that they are not now entitled to hold the said interest, or to make effectual or enforce the same as a real burden upon the said estate, to any further extent than it may be made to appear that the said fruits or rents were insufficient to extinguish the same, nor at all, if it shall turn out that the said rents or fruits were sufficient, or more than sufficient, to extinguish the same: Quarto, Finds, that in the circumstances of this case, the said James and George Cleghorn and others are to be held and considered to have been bona fide possessors of the said estate up to the 2d May 1828, being the date of the judgment of the House of Lords, whereby (in affirmance of the previous judgment by the Court of 23d June 1825), the sales in their favour were finally reduced and set aside. With these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that such further order may be pronounced therein as shall be found necessary for finally adjusting the accounting between the parties on the principles now laid down, and in the meantime reserves all questions of expenses, in so far as not already disposed of.

"Note.—There can be no hesitation, it is thought, upon two of the points disposed of by the interlocutor, viz.,—1. That Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson are entitled (how long is a different question) to the character and privileges of bona fide possessors; and 2d, That, on the other hand, they are not entitled, even in this character, to appropriate the annual fruits of the estate, unless upon the condition of keeping down (so far as the fruits will go), its annual burdens. The last of these points was conceded in the debate by Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson themselves. The first was substantially decided by the former judgment of this Court (afterwards by the House of Lords), in the question of restitution—the unanimous opinion of the Court being, 'that on the faith of having obtained a good title to the lands, they paid the prices in the manner set forth in the records.'

"Another matter the Lord Ordinary holds to be scarcely less clear, viz., that Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson, in claiming the rights of bona fide possessors, are under no obligation to impute the rents in diminution or extinction of the principal of the debts. For, independently of the former judgment, which declares these debts, in their entire and unreduced original amount, to form real burdens on the estate, it is impossible, consistently with the principle on which the rule of bona fide perception and consumption rests, to arrive at any different conclusion. To decide otherwise would be indeed to say, that the bona fide possessor of an estate can have no benefit from his possession, so long as any encumbrance is left to exist connected with the estate. It would give a different operation to the law, where the estate sold was an estate free from burden, and where its real and intrinsic value was destroyed, or in great measure reduced by debt. But this would be to prevent all the equities of the case.

"In questions of this kind, the principle is, that the true proprietor, in revindicating his estate from the bona fide possessor, is entitled to have back only that estate which would have belonged to him, if the title on which the adverse possession has meanwhile been supported, had never existed;—the bona fide possessor, on the other hand, retaining and appropriating the intermediate fruits, and being bound to restore the corpus or stock of the estate, and no more, such and the same as that estate would have stood without reference to any fruits it may in the meanwhile have yielded. If the estate had been diverted from the true proprietor as a free estate, it must be restored free. But if, when so diverted, it was a burdened or a limited estate, the obligation to restore is satisfied, if it be restored the same burdened and limited estate which it was received.

"In fact, it is a mere fallacy in this question of restitution, to deal with the estate which is to be restored as a subject separate and apart from the burdens which affect it. An estate which is burdened to half its value, is substantially, and in truth but half of the nominal estate. And to say that the bona fide possessor, who has happened, for example, to possess for so long a period, as that the rents or fruits intromitted with are equal in cumulo amount to the burdening debt, is bound to restore the estate free from burden, is just to say,—1st, That the possessor is to give back twice the extent of estate that he received; and 2d, That during the whole period of his possession, though he may have had nothing whatever but the surplus fruits to live upon, and though, as regards these fruits, the law expressly says that his bona fide possession entitled him fructus suos facere, he must yet give back, not merely the estate such as he received it, but along with it the whole rents and fruits which it may in the meantime have yielded.

“The force of these and other similar considerations were so far felt in the discussion, that the argument on Sir W. Elliot’s side was rested rather on the specialty which occurs in the present case—that the debts, as they originally existed over the estate, had here at one time been extinguished, and were now and ought to be revived on principles of equity,—the heirs of entail, it was said, being in this way placed in a position which entitled them, in answer to the equity demand on the one hand, to plead as a counter equity on the other, that such revival should be allowed only to the effect of reconstituting, as a burden upon the estate, the balance of the original debt, after imputing in extinction or diminution the whole intermediate rents and profits. But this is just a repetition of the original fallacy, in a slightly altered shape. Indeed, if it could not be contended in the abstract case, that a bona fide possessor is bound to apply the rents, not only in keeping down the interest, but likewise in extinguishing, so far as they may go, the principal of the debt, it is difficult to see how the case can ever come, in principle, to be varied, merely because the debt which there was thus no legal obligation to extinguish, has happened, by some accident, to be for a time,—and this in appearance only—not absolutely—but in form—extinguished,—the substance all the while remaining untouched, and the debt being now at last revived in statu quo, just as if it had never been extinguished at all.

“Accordingly, the decision of the Court in the question of restitution went expressly ‘to declare, that the several sums (of debt) shall subsist and be effectual as burdens on the estate and the heirs of entail, as the debts to the payment of which they were applied would have been, if they had not been paid.’—(Opinion of the consulted Judges, p. 6.) In point of fact, several of the debts were actually kept up in statu quo by assignment; while, as to all the rest, they might equally have been kept up in that shape; and as it is, they not only stand replaced by the final judgments of the Court, but, ‘although the same have not been kept up by assignment,’ are declared, no less than those ‘which have been kept up by assignment, still to form real burdens on the entailed estate, to the same effect (but no farther) as if they had not been so paid, and had still stood as outstanding debts of the estate, according to the terms of the deeds constituting them.’

“The only question upon which the Lord Ordinary has felt any hesitation, is as to the point of time when Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson’s bona fides shall be held to have ceased. On reviewing the authorities, however, he has come to be satisfied that the interlocutor does not go beyond what the actual circumstances of the case justify, when it extends the privilege to the date of the judgment finally reducing their title in the House of Lords.

“In point of principle, the Lord Ordinary adopts implicitly the reasoning of Lord Mackenzie in his note to Moir, 16th June 1826. But if, from principle, he turn to the specialties of the individual case, he thinks it impossible to hold that Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson, in carrying the case to the House of Lords, were persisting in the litigation with a mala fide purpose, or, in short, that they did anything which ought more to affect their character or rights as bona fide possessors, than when in this Court they submitted the Lord Ordinary’s judgment to the review of the Inner-House,—they having, in both cases alike, as their sole end, the perfectly reasonable and legitimate object of obtaining a reversal.

“After all, it is thought the present question has more of speculative than of practical importance to the parties. For, even taking the statement in Sir William Elliot’s answers to Cleghorn and Wilson’s minute, it is apparent that in the outset, and for a very long period, the rents of the property were insufficient to meet even the interest of the debts in question.

It is disputed whether they were more than sufficient to meet that interest down to the very end. But, granting there did come at last to be a surplus, it is thought this could only have been for a short period, and of no great amount, so that in all probability it must, in any view, have been more than swallowed up by the original deficit. Even supposing the period of bona fides to have ceased with the judgment of the Court in June 1825, if, as is said by Cleghorn and Wilson, their last intromission with the rents was at the Martinmas term of 1827, this would leave but a difference of two years, or two years and a-half, between the parties. It is not thought that any supposed excess of rents over the interest during this short period, especially if allowance be first made for the deficit of earlier years, can be such as to make it expedient for either party to continue the litigation.”

The pursuers reclaimed, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Recal the third finding in the interlocutor reclaimed against as unnecessary, in respect that Messrs Cleghorn and Wilson do not claim interest on the debts affecting the estate till after the term of Martinmas 1827: Quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note; reserving the question as to the expense of this discussion for subsequent decision.”

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Anderson, Neaves; Horne and Rose, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, Patton; Robert Smith, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H. B.]

10th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 211.—THE EARL OF MORAY, Advocator, v. CHARLES PEARSON (Forsyth’s Trustee), and W. H. PLAYFAIR, Respondents.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff Court—Heritable—Superior and Vassal—A superior feued out certain stances for street building in Edinburgh, according to a plan which delineated the size and position of the feus with reference to one another, and to the street and other buildings, but owing to some error, the line of street, as delineated on the plan, came afterwards to be shifted eight or ten feet backwards from the line drawn thereon; the consequence of which was, that if the feuar was obliged to build according to his agreement, his buildings would now encroach on, and stand eight or ten feet within the line of street as laid out and completed subsequent to the date of agreement, and before these particular feus had been built on. The superior brought an action in the Sheriff Court, under the penalty clause in the agreement for neglecting to build, to have the feuar ordained forthwith to erect his buildings, and he made offer to give the feuar the exact superficial area he had bargained for, by substituting an additional piece of ground behind—Held that the circumstances of the case raised a question of heritable right and title, which could not be competently discussed in the Sheriff Court.

The Earl of Moray and his commissioner raised an action in 1832 before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, in which it was set forth, that some time ago his Lordship feued out his lands of Drumsheugh under articles and conditions of roup, dated in 1822, by which it was provided that the feuars should finish their houses betwixt and the term of Whitsunday 1825, under a penalty of £100: That by missives entered into with Messrs George and John Forsyth in 1824, they feued the stances 88, 89 and 90, in Great Stuart Street, as marked on the feuing plan,—one of which, No. 89, was conveyed to Mr Playfair, architect,—and were taken bound to build the cellars, lay the drains and street pavement, &c., when so directed, all in conformity with designs to be furnished by his Lordship’s architect: That notwithstanding ing of the obligations incumbent on Messrs Forsyth, the same were not implemented, and the areas so feued out in Great Stuart Street were still unbuilt on by them, and concluding, accordingly, that the defenders "ought and should be decerned and ordained immediately to commence to erect dwelling-houses and buildings on the foresaid areas or stances, Nos. 88, 89 and 90, in Great Stuart Street," and "to proceed with and complete the said dwelling-houses and buildings on said stances or areas, within such time as I may fix, or within such time as may be reported by competent persons to be reasonable for completing the same in terms of, and agreeable to, the foresaid articles of roup, and relative missives of feu; reserving action at the pursuer's instance against the said defenders for all loss and damage sustained, or that may be sustained, by the noble pursuer, and penalty in and through the defenders' failure."

In the course of the procedure the pursuers made offer to give the defenders the exact superficial area which they had bargained for, which they were enabled to effect by arrangements with the neighbouring feuars, who had agreed to give up certain portions of their ground, but in this way the areas would have been shifted considerably backwards.

The respondents, who had hitherto paid no feu-duty, resisted this action, explaining, that while the pursuer required them to proceed to build upon the stances, he was not able to give delivery and possession of the different areas marked off on the ground plan as corresponding to their numbers, and which they had bargained for. A portion of these areas to the front, to the extent of several feet, from the negligence of the party employed by the pursuer to stake off the ground to the different feuars, had been occupied by the street in Ainslie Place and Great Stuart Street, and the pursuer was, from that circumstance, unable to give the particular feus by eight or ten feet; and they averred, that if they were now to build according to the plan, the front line of the houses would stand from eight to ten feet into the street or pavement of Great Stuart Street. But the feuing plan, in reference to which they contracted, pointed out the precise boundaries of the different areas or stances for the street houses, with the back ground of each, and also set off and appropriated certain stable ground behind, which, it was specially stipulated, should be applied to no other purposes than for stables, coach-houses and washing-houses, and that the same should be sold only to those who wished that accommodation, and to which the feuars were to have access from their back ground, along a lane four feet wide. It had been proposed, however, to substitute other areas of equal superficial extent, viz., by extending the feus backwards from the now street line into the ground appropriated by the plan for the stabling accommodation; but this, it was averred, could not be properly done without in the first place encroaching on the neighbouring feuars on the sides (whose permission, however, had been obtained), and also diminishing the stable ground and access thereto, which the feuars were entitled to resist. They accordingly pleaded, that they could not be compelled to implement their part of the agreement, since the pursuer was unable to implement his; and that they were not bound to take a different area or areas from those for which they bargained.

The Sheriff remitted to Mr Grainger, civil-engineer, to make out a plan, and report,

"1st, Whether the said feuing plans and articles of roup professed to exhibit to intending feuars, the precise boundaries and dimensions of the areas and back grounds, and of the stable ground referred to? 2dly, Whether the defenders have obtained these precise boundaries and dimensions of areas and back grounds, and whether the pursuer has allotted the stipulated extent and boundaries (if there were such) of stable ground besides the stipulated lane, or to what extent they differ, or are deficient? 3dly, Whether the pursuers can still give the stipulated areas, back grounds, stable ground, and lane, in terms of the feuing plan and articles of roup, and generally to report on the facts in dispute between the parties, in articles 2d, 4th, 5th, 9th, and 10th of the defenders' condescendence, No. 15, and in the answers to these articles, and that with his earliest convenience."

Mr Grainger reported affirmative on the first query. In regard to the second, he stated that the feuars had got the precise length in front, but that there was a considerable deficiency in the back ground, which he specified; that the feus, if built on as shown on the plan, would trench several feet on the adjoining feuars, at the sides; and that if the back ground of the feus in dispute was made to the depth shown on the plan, the difference would be eighty-two yards on the three feus. In answer to the third query, the reporter stated, that the pursuers could still give an equal quantity of ground as the stipulated area and back ground, but this could only be done by encroaching upon Mr Drysdale's feu on the east, Mr Ness's feu on the west, and the ground appropriated on the feuing plan for the stables on the south, by altering the position of the lane, which was to be carried along the back of the feus on the south side of Great Stuart Street, and part of the west side of Randolph Crescent.

Thereafter a great variety of procedure took place, and both parties adduced a proof of their averments bearing on the understanding of parties, their acquiescence, the staking off of the ground, &c. &c., and other questions which are not at present in question.

The Sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Edinburgh, 25th November 1840.—The Sheriff having resumed consideration of the cause, with Mr Smith's report, objections thereto, and whole process, Sustains the defences, assolizes the defenders from the conclusions of the action, reserving to the pursuer his right to insist in a competent action against the defenders, in respect of their alleged acquiescence in the deviations from the original feuing plan, or their obligation to accept the ground offered in lieu of other portions of the areas in question, and to them their defences as accords: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses, allows an account to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditors for taxation, and decerns accordingly." (Signed) "GRAHAM SPEIR."

"Note.—This action is raised for implement of a penal obligation in the contract of sale between the parties.

"The pursuers, by missives of sale, sold to the defenders two building stances or areas in Great Stuart Street, delineated on a feuing plan of these grounds, and the defenders became bound to implement certain obligations referred to in the missives and relative articles of roup, one of which is to build houses on these areas. It is to enforce this obligation that the action is brought. The defence is, that the pursuers are unable to implement their part of the contract by giving the defenders possession of the two areas purchased by them. It is proved by Mr Grainger's report that there is a very material difference both in the boundaries and in the extent of the areas, Nos. 88 and 90, as delineated on the plan referred to in the missives of sale, and the actual boundaries and contents of these areas respectively. But, as the action is laid upon the missives of sale, it is thought that the pursuers are not entitled to enforce a penal obligation arising under the contract, unless they implement the obligation incumbent upon them. It is not denied that the pursuers cannot now put the defenders in possession of the precise areas purchased by them. But they have proposed, in the course of the action, to give ground equal in extent to that taken away, and which, in the opinion of Mr Smith, the reporter, would answer the defenders equally well. The Sheriff does not think that this proposal to alter the boundaries of the feu, and to substitute one piece of ground for another, can competently be entertained under the conclusions of this summons. Neither does he think it necessary to express any opinion in reference to the defenders' alleged acquiescence in the altered boundaries of the feu, in consequence of the line of Great Stuart Street being staked off before the date of the sale. This may be the subject of another action at the pursuers' instance; but in so far as respects the present proceedings, he is inclined to regard that fact as adverse to the pursuers. For if the position and extent of the areas were actually altered before these were sold to the defenders, these alterations ought to have been stated in the missive of sale, and described in the feuing plan. But, on the contrary, the missives refer to the original plan, and the summons is laid on these missives, without reference either to these alterations or to the defenders' alleged acquiescence in them.

"Deides, the Sheriff thinks it is a very doubtful matter whether he has any jurisdiction to determine that the defenders are bound to hold, as included in, or comprehended by, the missives of the sale, the ground now offered to them."

The pursuers then advocated, pleading—That, under the whole circumstances of the case, the defenders, as feuars, were bound to implement the articles and conditions of roup, and relative missives, so far as applicable to the areas, Nos. 88 and 90 (89 being vested in Mr Playfair), and consequently they were bound to erect the dwelling-house and buildings on the said area, and to complete the same in terms of the conclusions of the summons. The summons was in itself regular and formal, and applicable to the actual circumstances of the case, and the advocates were entitled to obtain decree under it without the necessity of bringing any new action, either in the Sheriff Court or in the Court of Session. The alleged deviations from the feuing plan, founded on by the defenders, were altogether trifling and insignificant; and, even if they had been stated by them immediately after their bargain was concluded, would have afforded no ground for their resiling from it. Much less could the alleged deviations afford any good defence against the present action, which was not brought until the defenders had held the areas in question for many years, without taking any steps whatever for reducing their contract, or making any complaint or remonstrance respecting it. Even supposing that the alleged deviations were of any importance, the defenders were barred from founding upon them by the facts established by the proof, upon which the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutors of 25th October 1837, and 17th January 1838, were mainly founded. The advocates would have been entitled to decree in terms of their libel, even independently of the offer (to give a substitute) on pages 5, 13 and 14, of the revised answers: But that offer, and the power and willingness of the pursuers to fulfil it in its fullest extent, as established under the investigations which took place subsequent to the interlocutor of 28th March 1838, were of importance, as proving that the defenders had no real grievance of which to complain, and that they were actuated only by an unwarrantable desire to get rid of the contract deliberately entered into.

The respondents pleaded—That the case and pleas attempted to be raised by the pursuer in this process, could not be competently raised or maintained under the libel. The main plea or demand, under which he insisted that the defenders were bound to accept of the ground professed to be offered to them as a surrogate or substitute for the ground referred to in the original missives, could not be competently raised or maintained before the Sheriff Court, but only in a process of declarator before the Supreme Court, to which the other feuars, as being interested in the question, behoved to be made parties. The offer was not such as the defenders could, in any circumstances, be bound to accede to, and this in respect of the nature and effects of that offer, as found and reported upon by Mr Grainger, whose report was now binding and conclusive against the pursuer. Nothing was proved, or even averred by the pursuer, in the course of the proceedings, sufficient either to bar the defenders of any of their defences, or to prove that they were bound to take the ground offered, either in respect of implied agreement, acquiescence, or otherwise.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the record and proceedings in the Inferior Court, approves of the interlocutors of the Sheriff complained of, and therefore repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits the case to the Sheriff simpliciter, and decerns: Finds the respondents entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—Upon the best consideration which the Lord Ordinary has been able to give this and the relative case of Mr Playfair, he is of opinion that the objections to the action sustained by the Sheriff are insuperable.

"The object of this action, which was brought before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, was to enforce the stipulations in certain missives of feu entered into by the defenders, Messrs Forsyth, in 1824, relative to the specific stances, Nos. 88 and 90 of the feuing plan of Lord Moray's grounds in Great Stuart Street, and No. 94, in Ainslie Place, and the action concludes that the defenders shall forthwith be ordained 'to proceed with and complete the dwelling-houses on said stances, &c. &c.,' agreeable to the foresaid articles of roup, and relative missives of feu.' A separate action with the same conclusions was also brought before the Sheriff against Mr W. H. Playfair, architect, who acquired a right from Messrs Forsyth to the lot No. 89, as delineated on the said plan. Both these actions have been in dependence before the Sheriff since 1833.

"The defenders pleaded, that some time after the date of these missives, they discovered that Great Stuart Street, as now open to, and used by the public, had not been laid off in the precise direction laid down in the original feuing plan of the Drumsheugh grounds, referred to in the missives and articles of roup; that, on the contrary, the street, as now formed, is considerably more to the south than it should have been according to the feuing plan; and they maintained, that as they have hitherto got no possession, and paid no feu-duty, there is no completed contract between them, and that they are not bound to take areas in any different position from those laid down in the feuing plan.

"The noble pursuer rejoined, that the deviation was trifling, and that he was willing, and had it in his power to give the defenders possession of an area of equal dimensions behind the south line of the street, as now lined off, and a consent to that effect from some of the neighbouring feuars was produced, at a certain stage of the proceedings in the Inferior Court. This accordingly has led to a wide inquiry before the Sheriff. In the first instance, Mr Grainger reported that the street, as formed, is eight feet farther south than the line of the street laid down in the feuing plan; and Mr Smith, architect, reported that the superior can still give as much ground to the south of the present line of the street as the original plan exhibits, and that, in his opinion, the areas with the new boundaries will be as valuable in all points to the feuars, as the areas delineated on the original plan. This appeared to the former learned Sheriff (Mr Duff), and to his intelligent substitute (Mr Matheson), to be sufficient to entitle the noble pursuer to decree in terms of his libel. But the present Sheriff-depute was of opinion that the ascertained state of the facts, as to the partial change in the situation of the areas since the feuing plan was made out, render it quite impossible to give decree in terms of the present libel as framed; while he entertained doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to try the question in any shape, which the state of the facts, as disclosed by the investigations in this cause, may require. The Sheriff, therefore, by his interlocutor of 25th November 1840, assolizied the defenders, to which he added a note explanatory of his views. The Lord Ordinary feels himself bound, on every rule of law and form applicable to the case, to affirm the judgment under review, on the following grounds:—

"I. In the first place, it is conceived that, from the course which the discussion and inquiries in this cause took, the case resolved into a question totally incompetent in the Sheriff Court. There can be no doubt that the Court of the Judge Ordinary is competent to entertain all cases of personal obligation, though constituted by contracts or agreements respecting heritable estates, on which ground actions are daily brought before the Sheriff for payment of feu-duties and annualrents, and fulfilment of other obligations constituted by contracts peculiar to heritage. But even in cases of that description, the Sheriff could not proceed to try or to enforce a personal obligation, if any fair doubt were raised as to the completion, and validity, and subsistence of the contract itself, of which the personal obligation was only an accessory. The validity of all contracts respecting heritage, when challenged, can be tried in the Supreme Court alone; and the Judge Ordinary cannot declare, and, still less, he cannot adjust a disputed contract relative to a real estate, incidentally, to enable him to give effect to the subordinate and personal obligations in the contract. Cases may indeed be figured, in which parties, for the purposes of delay, may pretend to deny a contract concluded in the most formal manner, and long ago followed with possession; but the present case manifestly does not fall within that class.

"Here the defenders pleaded that they had not got possession; that they had paid no feu-duty; and that they held the missives of feu abandoned, or incapable of fulfilment;—and the superior admitted so far that the contract was not yet completed, and offered to give the defenders an equivalent of other ground in lieu of a part of the original subject delineated on the feuing plan; and these specialities, it is manifest, unavoidably raised an important question of heritable right and title to be constituted in the competent court, which precluded the superior from suing before the Judge Ordinary for implement of the personal obligations of a contract, as yet incomplete and unadjusted.

"It was strenuously contended that the defenders, by building the cellars in front of their lots, had taken possession of the feus as at present lined off, and that this was an homologation of the alleged deviation, which bound the defenders to accept of the lots as now altered. But that very question is as clearly within the class of those exclusively appropriated to the Supreme Court as any which can arise. If the missives per se were insufficient to constitute a final contract binding the feuars to take the areas as now laid off, it is for the Supreme Court alone to find and declare, in a proper declarator, whether the feuars, in respect of their possession, had acceded to a different arrangement, and are bound to take a charter to areas containing boundaries in some respects different from those specified in their missives. Indeed, if such pleas as were entertained for a time in the Sheriff Court, in the present case, can be competently tried before the Judge Ordinary, every possible dispute that can occur between the sellers and purchasers of landed estates respecting the import and extent of the contract, may be equally brought in every Sheriff Court in Scotland. Such a doctrine, it is apprehended, would be contrary to the principles and practice of the law, hitherto acted on, in all analogous cases.

"II. In the next place, even if the Sheriff had possessed jurisdiction to try the question, to which all the later inquiries and reports in his Court were directed, it is supposed that a decree 'in terms of the libel' as framed, would be quite inept and useless to the noble pursuer. The conclusion of the libel is, that the defenders shall be decerned and ordained 'immediately to commence to erect dwelling-houses and buildings on the foresaid areas or stances, Nos. 88, 89 and 90, in Great Stuart Street,' &c. &c., 'in terms of, and agreeable to, the foresaid articles of roup and missive of feu.' The libel is thus founded on the articles of roup, and these again bear reference solely to the original feuing plan; but a decree in these terms would not avail the superior, and is not, it is presumed, the decree which he latterly required, as the whole investigations before the Sheriff related to the practicability of the superiors giving, and of the feuars taking, lots which (at least as to a part of their area and boundaries) will be different from the feuing plan. No doubt, the learned and worthy Sheriff who preceded the present Judge Ordinary, pointed at a decree against the feuars to erect buildings within the areas, as now altered and proposed to be laid off, and not according to the correct boundaries of the feuing plan; but upon the principles laid down by the House of Lords in the late case of Stuart and Glog (1 Robinson's Reports, 721), it is apprehended that decree could not have been granted by any court in these terms, under the conclusions of the summons in the present action.

"On these grounds, the Lord Ordinary has come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff in his last judgment on the merits. The learned Judge, no doubt, states that he considered the present as an action for the enforcement of penal obligations in a contract of feu: but the Lord Ordinary cannot take that view of the case. He holds that the obligations sought to be enforced were ordinary and reasonable covenants, similar to those which in general occur in mutual contracts of this description near large towns. Still, whatever may be the nature of the stipulations, implement of them must be sought in an action properly libelled to meet the specialities of the case, and pursued before the Court, which has an exclusive jurisdiction in the constitution of heritable rights.

"The Lord Ordinary has superseded the advocacy against Mr Playfair at present, as his pleas are necessarily the same with those of his authors, Messrs Forsyth, and one discussion on review may suffice for both parties."

The advocates reclaimed; but the Court, considering that the action was incompetent in the Sheriff Court, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—For Forsyths, G. G. Bell, Maitland; Gibson-Craigs, Dalziel and Brodie, W.S., Agents.—For Playfair, Rutherford; Agent.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Walker; Walker and Melville, W.S., Agents.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

10th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

NO. 212.—THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THOMAS ALEXANDER LORD LOVAT, Pursuer, v. ARCHIBALD T. F. FRASER, Defender.

Resting-Owing—Meliorations—Entail.

The pursuer brought this action against the defender, concluding for payment of £1066, alleged to have been found due to him by the defender for certain claims, according to an award pronounced in a reference. The action was defended on the ground that whatever sum, if any, should be found due on the award, should depend on certain other accounts between the parties being investigated and settled. But as these were still sub judice, the pursuer was not entitled, in the meantime, to insist.

There was also a plea by the defender of compensation arising out of claims, which however were still in Court, which he had against the pursuer, as succeeding heir in the entailed estates, for three-fourths of the expenditure under the Montgomery Act. The Lord Ordinary found, in reference to one of the claims in the action (one of no general importance), that it was comprehended in, and settled by the award, and was not contingent on the investigation or adjustment of other accounts; and in reference to the other claim, his Lordship remitted it to an accountant to report.

Though the point between the parties in regard to the meliorations was not decided by the Court, the interlocutor and note of the Lord Ordinary is herein given, as raising questions of general importance.

"3d February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this cause, and thereafter considered the revised minutes of debate, writs produced, and whole process, finds that certain accounts between the noble pursuer, as heir of entail of the deceased Honourable Archibald Fraser of Lovat, and the defender Mr Fraser of Abertarff, as executor of the said Archibald Fraser, were latterly referred to Alexander Shepherd, solicitor in Inverness, now deceased, who, in 1834, made up a report on the state of accounts, as far as seemed to him then practicable, and thereafter, on 10th November 1834, pronounced an award agreeable thereto, declaring the balance then due by Abertarff to the pursuer to be £1066. 5. 7., including interest till that date, and carrying legal interest thereafter till paid: Finds that both parties homologated and confirmed that balance by subscribing a doquet annexed to the report and award, and acknowledging the correctness of the balance: But supersedes issuing decree for the above balance, in hoc statu, to afford time to the parties to discuss certain counter claims urged for Abertarff in the present, and other processes now depending in Court: Farther, with reference to the two counter claims which are discussed in the revised minutes now under consideration, finds, 1. That the first counter claim urged for the defender is founded on an averment that Abertarff had been erroneously charged with the rent of Wellhouse, which was paid to the deceased Lovat on 1st December 1815, and that it is not well founded,—in respect, first, that this claim was not truly a point reserved by Mr Shepherd in his final award, though his report contained a note directing the attention of parties to the article which, by their subsequent doquet, they declined objecting to; and, secondly, in respect the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, from the explanation of the pursuer in his revised minute, that the executor was justly charged, in the accounts both of 1829 and 1834 (as well as in prior states), with the said term's rent, for which his executor was accountable to the succeeding heir: Therefore repels that counter claim, and decrees: 2. With regard to the defender's second counter claim, founded on the heritable bond granted by the late Lovat, binding himself and the other heirs of entail, in terms of the Statute, for the computed half of the expense of erecting the bridge of Beauly, Finds that Abertarff's claim on that matter is not foreclosed, but was specially reserved by Mr Shepherd, the referee, as he found 'it impossible to adjust this account while the principle of accounting between the county and the contractor to the bridge remains unsettled:' Finds it admitted that the deceased Archibald Fraser of Lovat made large payments in money and in counter claims to the Commissioners for Highland Roads and Bridges, to account of the said heritable bond in October 1815, recently before his death; but that he executed no discharge or renunciation of the said heritable security in respect of such payments: Finds that the defender, as the successor or disponee of the late Lovat, claims an interest to the amount of the said payments, or to such extent as the Statutes permitted and declared such bonds to affect the heirs of entail in the estates over which they extended: But in respect the parties differ widely as to the state of accounts, and other facts which ought to be more clearly elucidated by a man of skill before a final decision on the merits of this claim, before further answer, remits this branch of the case to Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant, to examine the whole accounts and vouchers relative to, or connected with, the said bond, and to report, (1.) How far the payments made, and balance credited, by the late Lovat to the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges, to account of the said bond, in October 1815, were composed, in whole or in part, of assessments or charges which the proprietor was entitled to charge as a burden against the said entailed estate; or whether the late Lovat was, at that date, owing any further or prior arrear of assessments, or other charges, in respect of roads and bridges, which he did not account for to those entitled to levy the same. (2.) Whether the late Lovat had any security over the entailed estates, authorised by Statute, for his assessments paid to account of the said bond, other than that document itself, and infetment thereon: Lastly, to prepare a state, showing to what amount the said payments by Lovat, in October 1815, formed charges against the entailed estate at his death in December 1815, and the amount of the sums chargeable by the noble pursuer, as heir of entail, at Whitsunday next 1842, if the said bond shall be held as a subsisting and available security to the successor and disponee of Lovat, to the extent of his advances on account thereof in 1815, taking into consideration the obligations incumbent on the said Archibald Fraser himself by the Statutes, to keep down the interest and pay 3 per cent. per annum during his own possession of the entailed estate, in extinction of road and bridge debts; with power, generally, to the accountant to report on any other points of fact or accounting which either party may suggest as material to the pleas to be afterwards maintained by them; the said report to be lodged quam primum; and in the mean time, reserves all claims of the parties, hinc inde, to expenses of process, till an ulterior stage of the cause.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

"Note.—The earlier findings of the preceding interlocutor have hardly been disputed since the parties joined issue in the cause. It was agreed on both sides, that Mr Shepherd's award, in so far as he finally adjusted the accounts, cannot now be opened up by any party. But the defender contended that decree should not be allowed to go out for the balance ascertained by Mr Shepherd, till his counter claims, urged in this and in another well-known process in Court, for constituting the amount of the improvements on the entailed estate of Lovat claimable by Abertarff, as executor of the Honourable Archibald Fraser, the last heir of entail, were ascertained. It is understood that the noble pursuer did not latterly object to that proposition, which will now be found more necessary than was at first apprehended, from the importance and extent of the counter claims.

"In the present process, the discussion has been confined to two counter claims of the defender, which are stated with great clearness and ability in the revised minutes that have been lately lodged for the parties. The Lord Ordinary has expressed his views on each of the points, so far as the facts yet ascertained enable him to do so, in the specific findings of the prefixed interlocutor. But a short additional explanation may be necessary, especially on the second and more important question which is here raised between the parties.

"1. The first counter claim rests on the allegation that the defender was improperly debited, both in Mr Shepherd's report and in prior states, with £140 as a term's rent of a farm called Wellhouse, which was paid to the late Lovat by the tenant a few days before his death (on 8th December 1815), and was held as a sum which the defender, as Lovat's executor, was bound to repeat to the heir, on the ground that it consisted of forehand rent conventionally exigible at Martinmas 1815, but not legally due till Martinmas 1816, and so legally claimable by the heir; to which the defender objects, that the said payment was not forehand, or made to account of the term's rent due at Martinmas 1815, but of a prior arrear due at Whitsunday 1815, which, of course, fell to be retained by the late Lovat and his executor, without any accounting to the heir. Now, on considering the statements of both parties on this point, the Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that this is not a claim which was latterly reserved by Mr Shepherd at all; on the contrary, it appears that any objection to it was latterly given up, or abandoned by, the defender himself, when he doqueted the report subsequent to Shepherd's award. But even if the question were open, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the plea is utterly erroneous and groundless in point of fact. Looking to the mass of states, reports, and relative documents produced with regard to this claim, he thought at one time of remitting them to an accountant to report on their import; but when he recollected that these documents have all been sifted and examined carefully by the men of business acting for both parties, who made up states for the parties in 1829, and afterwards by Mr Shepherd in 1834, it was conceived to be quite out of the question to require any new report from another accountant on such a matter. The facts on which this claim depends, cannot be more clearly and ably, or more briefly stated in any report, or by any man of business, than they are by both the learned counsel, under branch I. of these revised minutes; and it humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the statement and argument of the noble pursuer, in answer to the claim in his minute, p. 22 to p. 40, is one of the most satisfactory and conclusive demonstrations which he has ever read in a disputed matter of accounting. The Court, if called on to review this judgment, really require no other aid than the minutes.

VOL. XIV.—No. XXXII.

"II. The second counter claim, however, of the defender, is of a different description. The question here raised also is now very perspicuously and candidly stated in the revised minutes for both parties; and when these are contrasted with the vague and erroneous statements on the point at issue, to be found in previous statements, both judicial and extrajudicial, it is impossible not to feel that the proper merits of this branch of the case have never before been properly set forth and understood. Now that the real merits of the claim are brought by both parties to a precise and definite point, the Lord Ordinary must own that he has a strong impression that the claim of Abertarff on this head is, to a certain extent, insuperable; but as the parties are not entirely agreed on either the state of accounts, or on the facts generally on which the claim may depend, and as a great mass of states and accounts have been recovered and put into process, which apparently very little affect the real question at issue, but must, nevertheless, for the satisfaction of the Court, be examined by a person skilled in figures, to ascertain their bearing on the case, it has been thought indispensable to send this branch to an accountant of experience, to give information on the matters of fact and accounting specified in the interlocutor, as well as to exhibit a state of the true amount of the claim, in case it be ultimately sustained.

"At the same time, it is perhaps due to the parties and to the accountant, and may possibly save some unnecessary detail in the accounting, for the Lord Ordinary to state briefly the view which he is at present disposed to take of this claim on the part of the defender.

"Keeping in view the provisions of the Statutes passed in 1803 and 1804, relative to the construction of highland roads and bridges, it will be observed that the late Lovat, in the year 1814, availed himself of a provision in these Acts to grant an heritable bond over the entailed estates for £5237, as the half of the computed expense of erecting the new Bridge of Lovat across the Beaulieu. That sum was afterwards restricted to £4734, being one-half of the actual expense of execution.

"In July 1815, Mr James Hope, W.S., acting for the Commissioners on Highland Roads and Bridges, called upon Lovat to pay up this bond,—or at least to make a payment equivalent to the assessments on his own estates, which Lovat had retained for a series of years, apparently to meet the bond; accordingly, it is proved beyond dispute, that the late Lovat, in October 1815, paid the Commissioners upwards of £3000 to account of the said heritable bond. It will be the business of the accountant to report in what manner, and on what sort of voucher that payment was made. It is admitted that no discharge of the heritable bond and infestment, in so far as they affected the entailed estate, was ever granted; and it also appears that no assignation was executed. The fact is undoubted, that the late Lovat died a few weeks after this payment; so that the rights of parties must now be regulated by the rules and principles of common law applicable to the case of payments made to account of analogous securities, and in similar circumstances.

"Before entering on these, however, the noble pursuer states one general plea, which, if well founded, would supersede further argument. He pleads that the counter claim now under consideration was referred to Mr James Keay, advocate, by Messrs Kinloch and Shepherd when the accounts were left to their adjustment in 1829, and that Mr Keay gave an opinion in 1831 adverse to the claim. But the facts of the case are quite insufficient to support that plea. There was indeed a case laid before Mr Keay in 1829, and certain statements made and questions put respecting assessments, quite different from those which the state of the question as to Abertarff's claim, under the bond for Lovat Bridge, required. This is manifest on a perusal of the memorial and opinion of Mr Keay, to which it is sufficient to refer. Accordingly, so completely was Mr Shepherd sensible that Mr Keay's opinion did not rule the question, that he states in the outset of the report and award, now libelled on, 'that the adjustment of the account of the Lovat Bridge comes within the present reference.' In no view, therefore, is it foreclosed by Mr Keay's opinion.

"The chief plea, however, of the noble pursuer against the counter claim in question, seems to rest on the assumption that the late Lovat, by the mere act of advancing or settling a balance with the Commissioners in 1815, discharged the bond as against the entailed estate, to the extent of the sums so paid, and of course that Abertarff, as his general representative and disponee, can maintain no claim afterwards, under this bond, against the heirs of entail; but the defender, as the general disponee and successor of Lovat, replies, that a discharge of an heritable security, subsisting and created over an entailed estate, cannot be raised up by implication, unless the party making the payment had shown an intention of extinguishing the security, and that there are no termini habiles for any such inference in the present case.

"On the assumption that there are no material specialties to affect the case, it is apprehended that the plea of the noble pursuer, on the preceding state of the argument, could not be sustained without a departure from all the principles by which the rights of parties making advances to account of securities over entailed estates in Scotland have long been regulated. When a debt constituted against, and due by heirs of entail, is paid by an heir in possession, the latter unquestionably has a right to demand an assignation to keep up the debt against the heirs of entail; and so strong is the presumption of law that the heir means to exercise that right, that even when he takes a conveyance and discharge from the creditor, it is nevertheless held, 'that the discharge hath not the effect of extinguishing it con-fusione,'—Ersk. B. III. tit. 4, § 27,—a section which contains a very clear view of the law and authorities on the subject.

"No doubt, it is alleged that there was no conveyance here, by the creditors of the bond and infestment, to the late Lovat and his heirs generally; but, if so, it is equally certain that there was no discharge of the bond. The adjustment of the voucher or security to be given to Lovat, in respect of his payments in 1815, seems to have been delayed, and ultimately superseded, by his death. But, in the ordinary case, if a party making a payment on account of an entailed security, dies before it is discharged or assigned, it is supposed that the right to demand an assignation passes to the general heir and disponee of the party who has advanced the money. There is every legal and equitable presumption to support such a demand.

"The plea of Abertarff, however, is still more clear in reference to the debt now claimed. As the Statute expressly declared that heirs in possession were to have recourse against the subsequent heirs of entail for their advances, to be repaid at the rate of three per cent. per annum, it is supposed that a formal assignation was necessary in this case to secure the relief of Lovat, and his successor and disponee, against the heirs of entail. The Statute itself ascertained and constituted the obligation of these heirs for their proportion of any bond advanced by a proprietor in possession.

"It is objected, however, that the late Lovat did not take any means of charging the entailed estates with the assessments which he advanced, and, therefore, that Abertarff cannot maintain any claim against the heirs of entail for these sums. But it is obvious to answer, that when Lovat executed an heritable bond, charging the heirs of entail and their estates with the whole expense of the bridge, for which he had become bound, and when the assessments were applied, as far as they would go, in payment of that bond, Lovat had the most complete security that could be devised for reimbursement of these assessments from the heirs of entail, in terms of the Statute. He was not entitled both to keep up the bond over the entailed estates, and to charge the assessments by a separate security, as another burden thereon. The assessments came to be covered by the bond; so that there is double authority under the Statute now to charge them against the heir of entail.

"As the Lord Ordinary understands the case, the bond and infestment over the entailed estates for one-half of the expense of the bridge, is at this moment undischarged. Now, who is entitled to take up and found on this document? The noble pursuer states candidly, that, on his succession, he, or his curators, paid up the balance due upon the bond (said to amount to about £1500), and that they took an assignment to keep up the bond as a security for that balance against the entailed estate. See minute, No. 109, p. 49. But, with deference, was not the late Lovat, or his general disponee and executor, legally entitled to act in the same manner with respect to the prior portion of the bond paid by Lovat in 1815? At present, the Lord Ordinary is unable to understand on what ground this can be resisted.

"Nevertheless, the aid of an accountant is indispensable in the case. By the Statutes, the heir in possession is bound to keep down the interest of every constituted debt against the entailed estate during his possession, and also to pay three per cent. towards the extinction of the principal. Now, while the date of the heritable bond is ascertained, and while the payment in 1815 is equally vouched, it remains to be seen, by an accurate account made up in terms of the Statute, what parts of the debt fell to be extinguished by the late Lovat himself prior to his death.

"Besides, various other points requiring explanation may occur in the accounting. Thus, there is one charge deducted by Mr James Hope from the claim of the Commissioners against Lovat in 1815, which is also stated as deduction from Lovat's claim against the heirs of entail, although the ground of the latter deduction is not at once apparent. It would appear that the late Lovat had executed a certain road near Fort-Augustus, for which the Commissioners allowed him £799. 5s., and Mr Hope seems to have sustained that as a payment to account of the bond. But the accountant will consider if this ought to be deducted in a question between the late Lovat and the heirs of entail, in an accounting as to the statutory security of the former. At present, it has the aspect of a claim arising upon a separate account between Lovat and the Commissioners, for money which Lovat had advanced, or work that he had performed for them unconnected with the bridge, for which the Commissioners were his creditors. If so, it is difficult to perceive how the payment of that debt by the Commissioners to Lovat should form a deduction from the claim of the latter against the entailed estate on a totally different concern. But this probably admits of a satisfactory explanation, which, of course, will be given to the accountant.

"It is only necessary to add, that although the process is loaded with many superfluous documents, there are some of importance, which the Lord Ordinary has not been able to find. Thus the bond (the foundation of the whole counter claim) binding the heirs of entail for the expense of the bridge, does not appear to be produced, nor the infestment, if any was taken thereon; neither can the Lord Ordinary find any vouchers from Mr Hope as to the payments in October 1815. It is probable the accountant will call for these, and the Lord Ordinary, if asked, will grant a diligence for their recovery."

On a reclaiming note, the Court

"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, in so far as it relates to the two counter claims urged by the defender, and to that extent only; and in regard to the first counter claim urged by the defender in his minute of debate, Find that the same is excluded, and the defender barred from bringing forward the same by the docket subscribed by the defender, and appended to the award of Mr Shepherd, acknowledging the correctness of the balance now sued for, after such award had been examined and considered by him with a view to state to the referee any objections, if he any had, to the same, and by the correspondence in December 1834 and January 1835, in which, in consequence of, and in reliance upon such acknowledgment of a specified balance being due, Lord Lovat, on the other hand, agreed to allow payment of that balance to remain over until certain other matters were adjusted between the parties: And in regard to the second counter claim, find that the same is not stated or embraced in the record, and cannot be competently proponed in this action: Find the pursuer entitled to the expenses incurred by him from the date of the interlocutor of 19th November 1841; allow an account thereof to be lodged, and remit to the auditor to tax the same and to report; and quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. A. Anderson; Gibson-Craigs, Dalziel and Brodie, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, Moncreiff; Aeneas Macbean, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

11th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 213.—DAVID ROUGHEAD, Complainer, v. JOSEPH STEPHENSON and OTHERS, Respondents.

Process—Wakening and Transference—Diligence—Arrestment—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114.—It is incompetent, under Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, to insert a warrant of arrestment in a summons of wakening and transference.

Thomas and William Stephenson, sons of the deceased Joseph Stephenson, brought an action of count and reckoning against James Roughead and others, their father's trustees. The original parties having died, and the action having fallen asleep, Joseph Stephenson and others, as representing the pursuers, raised an action of wakening and transference against the representatives of the defenders, among others, against Archibald Dunlop and others (James Roughead's trustees), who stated as a preliminary defence, that they had denuded themselves of the trust-estate in favour of David Roughead, the truster's son. To meet this allegation, the pursuers raised a supplementary action of transference and wakening against David Roughead, inserting in the will of the summons a warrant of arrestment in the form authorised by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114. Roughead objected to this as incompetent, on the ground that the only summonses on which such arrestments could be used were those "concluding for payment of money;" whereas the conclusions of the summons in question simply were, that the pursuers should have the said process of count and reckoning "wakened and transferred at their instance, for their respective interests as aforesaid, against the said David Roughead, son of the deceased James Roughead, to the effect the pursuers may have such action and execution against him as they would have had against the deceased James Roughead his father, in his lifetime," &c. He accordingly applied for letters of general loosing, when the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"30th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this cause, passes the bill, and grants warrant for letters of general loosing as craved.

"Note.—It is not necessary, in this case, to decide whether the statutory enactment, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, § 16, which makes it 'lawful to insert in summonses concluding for payment of money, a warrant (or will) to arrest,' does or does not extend in sound construction to a summons of transference; though, if it were, the Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, would be disposed to hold, that where the summons in the primary action concludes for payment, these conclusions are to be considered as substantially imported into, and repeated in the transference, so as truly to make them also conclusions of this latter process. He thinks there could be no doubt of the competency of embodying and setting them forth in extenso in the summons of transference as conclusions immediately directed against the defender, against whom transference is sought. And if this would be competent, he sees little difference in substance, or in the sound sense and principle of the thing, where the same result is effected by reference, instead of by actual re-petition.

"But what the Lord Ordinary rests upon as the ground of the above judgment is, that there was here, not the mere transference of a process that was awake, but a combined waking and transference of a process which was asleep. Now it is clear, upon the authorities, that, down to the date of the Statute, there could in no form be any legal arrestment, or any legal warrant for arrestment, obtained upon a sleeping process. To make arrestment competent, or to render it competent to apply for warrant to arrest, it was indispensable that the process which was thus asleep should first be wakened. And as the Statute was directed merely to the giving of a short-hand remedy in cases where the older and more round-about forms would previously have been available, and not to render arrestment competent where it would not previously have been so, nor yet to entitle parties to apply for warrant to arrest, at a time, and under circumstances, with reference to which it would previously have been incompetent for them so to apply, it humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary that the Statute really makes no difference in this question, and that it is just as incompetent under the statutory form to arrest, or to issue a warrant for arresting upon the dependence of a process which is asleep, as it was in all time preceding when a different form of procedure had to be resorted to.

"The Lord Ordinary therefore entertains no doubt, that had the secondary process here been a simple process of waking, and not combined, as it is, with a relative process of transference, there could not, either under the Statute or otherwise, have been any valid arrestment, or any valid or legal warrant to arrest, so long as the primary process was in a state of sleep.

"Nor does the combination of a transference with the waking, as it seems to him, mend the matter. For the transference itself would have been incompetent, as a secondary process, where the primary process was asleep. And, therefore, the waking truly lies at the root of the whole matter. Indeed, if the Lord Ordinary be right in holding that the conclusions of the transference can have active the effect of conclusion for payment only by reference to the conclusions in the primary action, they could, in no view, of themselves afford ground for the warrant to arrest, when the primary action was itself asleep, and its conclusions thereby in abeyance.

"A distinction was attempted to be drawn between the arrestments which were used before, and those which were not used till after the execution of the summons of waking and transference. But the distinction is one which cannot practically avail. For although no doubt, according to certain authorities, it is not absolutely necessary to have an interlocutor of waking, and so it may plausibly be maintained, that the mere execution of the waking is sufficient, per se, to awaken the principal cause, the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any instance in which the effect of waking has been held complete until the summons of waking was not only executed, but the executed summons actually produced in causa. But be this as it may, the fatal circumstance here is, that till the principal cause was awakened, it was not competent, either under the old or new form, to issue the warrant to arrest. At the date of the summons of waking and transference, therefore, it was just as much a nullity, under the Statute, for the writer to the Signet to insert 'a warrant (or will) to arrest,' the primary action being asleep, as, prior to the Statute, it would have been, in the like circumstances, to issue separate letters of arrestment. Of course, if the warrant to arrest was a nullity at the time of its being inserted, it could not be rendered otherwise by any after execution of the summons which contained it. And hence the arrestments posterior to the execution of the summons, equally with those prior to its execution, are all tainted with the nullity of the warrant on which they proceed.

"The only question, therefore, that remains is, was the primary action asleep? And upon this, as the Lord Ordinary understood the statements of the parties, there can be no room for doubt. In the first place, it is not easy to see how the respondents are to get over the statement in their own summons of waking and transference. For the process is there treated throughout as a sleeping process, so far as regards the present complaint. And as the warrant to arrest must, therefore, have gone out upon that footing, it is difficult to deal with the actual diligence itself upon a different footing; or, in other words, to support it by extraneous evidence against the positive allegation of the writ on which it bears to proceed. But, in the next place, and more especially, there seems to be no question that the process, as regards the present complainer, was truly asleep. It has been awakened, no doubt, as against the general trustees of James Routhead. But the express purpose of the ulterior and supplementary proceeding, which lies at the bottom of the present question with the complainer, David Routhead, was to meet the possible contingency of its being decided that the trustees of James Routhead were not the defenders whom it was proper to have convened. The summons is brought against the present complainer 'without prejudice to the pursuer's right of action against the trustees,' on the distinct footing that it 'is proper and necessary, on account of the allegation that the said trustees have denuded of the trust-estate, to have the process awakened and transferred against the said David Routhead, son of the deceased.' In other words, the respondents, lest they may have called the wrong party, are now proceeding against the present complainer, as they would have been entitled to do had they begun with him as their party from the first. But is it not clear, in such circumstances, that the respondents cannot avail themselves, against the complainer, of the fact that the process has been awakened against another party, as his father's trustees. They are, in truth, pursuing two separate and independent sets of defenders; and they must deal with each severally in the question of waking, as if the other had not been in the field. If they had never proceeded against the trustees, they concede that the process would have been asleep as against the complainer. But if their proceeding against the trustees be inept, as it must be, if the trustees were not their proper party, the result is still the same; and in no view can their waking the process, as against the trustees, have any effect as a waking against the complainer."

The pursuers reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—Here we are only interpreting a Statute, and must be guided entirely by its enacting words. These are, that after a certain date it shall be "lawful to insert in summonses concluding for payment of money a warrant (or will) to arrest." Now, the present summons simply concludes, that a certain action, for certain reasons of alleged liability, shall be awakened and transferred against the defender. It neither directly, nor by necessary inference, contains a conclusion against him for payment. Till he is actually made a party, we are not to scan and scrutinize the summons, in order to ascertain how it may ultimately apply against him. I have, therefore, the greatest difficulty in holding that the Statute authorises a warrant of arrestment to be inserted in any summons not containing a money conclusion. Whatever may have been the intention of the parties who brought the measure into Parliament, our only guide is the enacting clause, in which I see nothing to sanction such an arrestment as that now in question. This is my difficulty; and I feel it to be the more important, that the Lord Ordinary adopts rather a different view. As presently advised, my impression is, that before this Act was passed, it was not the practice to arrest on the dependence of actions of transference. It is admitted that no case can be produced in favour of the practice, though there must have been five hundred if it had really existed. The presumption is, that the Legislature, in introducing an extraordinary remedy, did not mean to alter former practice, unless in so far as it does so expressly. The Lord Ordinary holds that warrant of arrestment might have been inserted if the action had been one merely of transference. I cannot adopt this view. Here, however, the action is one of waking and transference,—not transference and waking. It must first be raised from its grave, and have life put into it. Till this is done, it cannot be transferred. Though differing from the Lord Ordinary as to the sufficiency of an action of transference to warrant arrestment, I perfectly agree with him as to the other point, and am therefore for refusing the note.

Lord Gillies.—I concur with your Lordship, particularly as to the Statute, and will not weaken the observations by attempting to repeat them. While the process is asleep, it is a legal nonentity. The citation of the defender calls upon him "to hear and see the aforesaid process awakened, transferred and insisted in," &c.; but if it is not previously awakened, none of the other proceedings can take place; and hence, all subsequent conclusions imply that the first step has been successful. Here, however, before the awakening necessary to give validity to the process has taken place, arrestment is used upon it as a depending process. This is clearly incompetent.

Lord Mackenzie.—The question is, whether an action of wakening and transference contains a proper conclusion for payment of money in the sense of the Statute? I am clear that it does not. If I could infer with the Lord Ordinary, that an action of transference transfers the full conclusions of the summons, I would say the same of an action of wakening; but I cannot venture so far. The conclusion of an action of wakening and transference, is simply that the action be awakened and transferred; and there is an end of the matter. There is no style, or established practice, in favour of such arrestments; and I see no warrant for them in the Statute. I cannot hold that an action of transference, either by itself, or conjoined with a wakening, will authorise an arrestment on the dependence.

The Court refused the note.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—For Complainer, Solicitor-General (McNeill), Monro; Graham and Anderson, W.S., Agents.—For Respondents, Rutherford, Horn; Peter Bairnsfather, W.S., Agent.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

11th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

NO. 214.—ALEXANDER PEARSON and OTHERS (Boyd Alexander's Trustees), Pursuers, v. WILLIAM MAXWELL ALEXANDER, and BOYD ALEXANDER and his CHILDREN, Defenders.

Succession—Testament—Trust—Burden—Personal and Real—A testator directed his trustees to convey certain lands to A, whom failing to B, but declared, that in the event of A or his issue succeeding to a certain other estate, he or they should be bound to denude of the estate now conveyed in favour of B or his issue,—it being the testator's meaning and intention that the two estates should never be united during the lifetime of B, or any of his issue.—Held that the trustees would discharge their duty under the settlement, by inserting the testator's declaration in terminis in the conveyance to A; that the declaration amounted only to a personal obligation on A, and could not be made to affect the lands as a real burden or species of entail.

The late Boyd Alexander of Southbar, by trust-disposition and settlement, of date 19th April 1808, conveyed his whole property to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, of conveying his whole heritable property, and particularly his estate of Southbar and Boghall, under certain specified burdens, to his nephew, William Maxwell Alexander, his heirs and assignees whomsoever. By a codicil to the deed the truster declared it to be his desire and intention, that, in the event of William Maxwell Alexander predeceasing him without issue, or with issue also predeceasing, every thing meant to be conveyed to William Maxwell Alexander should go to his brother, Boyd Alexander.

In February 1816, the truster executed a supplementary trust-deed, in which, considering that he had made several purchases of land since the date of the original deed, and that, in terms of that deed, these lands would descend to William Maxwell Alexander, he altered this destination, and desired his trustees to sell the newly purchased lands, together with any future purchase, and regard the prices as forming part of his personal funds; declaring it to be his intention that it was only the estate of Southbar and Boghall which "was to descend and belong" to William Maxwell Alexander, and failing him, as described in the original deed, to Boyd Alexander. Of date March 1819, a codicil was appended to this supplementary deed, making various alterations both on it and the original deed. The fourth alteration is as follows:

"As I have by my codicil, already referred to, provided that in the event of the death of the said William Maxwell Alexander without lawful issue before me, or of the death of such lawful issue likewise before me, that the said Boyd Alexander, also my nephew, shall succeed to the real property specially conveyed in my said first trust-disposition and settlement (and which comprehend the estates of Southbar and Boghall), and to the personal property likewise thereby provided to the said William Maxwell Alexander, it is now my further meaning and intention, and I hereby declare such to be the case, that if it shall happen at any time hereafter that the said William Maxwell Alexander, or any of his lawful issue, shall succeed to the estate of Ballamyle, in the county of Ayr, belonging to his brother, Claud Alexander, Esquire, then and immediately on that event taking place, and whether the said William Maxwell Alexander shall have lawful issue or not, the said William Maxwell Alexander, or any of his lawful issue, as the case may be, so succeeding to the said estate of Ballamyle, shall be bound and obliged immediately to denude themselves of, and to convey the said estates of Southbar and Boghall to and in favour of the said Boyd Alexander, my nephew, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever,—it being my meaning and intention that the said estates of Southbar and Boghall shall never be united with the estate of Ballamyle in the person of the said William Maxwell Alexander, or of his issue, while my nephew, the said Boyd Alexander, or any issue of his body, shall be in life; it being always expressly understood, that in the event of the said Boyd Alexander, my nephew, or any of his issue succeeding to the said estates of Southbar and Boghall, he and they shall be burdened in the same manner as the said William Maxwell Alexander, and his heirs and successors, are by my said settlements."

In executing the part of the trust-deed in favour of William Maxwell Alexander, the trustees proposed to dispose to him the estates of Southbar and Boghall,—inserting in the disposition a declaration in terms of the above fourth alteration. The sufficiency of such a declaration to meet the intentions of the truster having been questioned, the trustees raised a summons of declarator and exoneration, in which, stating that they had made up a feudal title in their persons to the lands of Southbar and Boghall, and were prepared to convey them in terms of the settlement, but that doubts had been expressed by the parties concerned, whether the terms of the destination and obligation proposed to be imposed on William Maxwell Alexander and his issue were sufficient, they concluded to have it found and declared that, under the terms of the settlement,

"the pursuers are bound to convey, make over, and dispose the lands and others mentioned therein, and hereinbefore described, to the said William Maxwell Alexander, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever; and that under the terms of the said settlements, the said Boyd Alexander and his heirs and assignees have merely a conditional interest in the said lands and others, in the event of the said William Maxwell Alexander, or any of his issue, succeeding to the said estate of Ballochmyle, and ought not, in the conveyance to be executed by the pursuers, to be substituted in the dispositive clause thereof after the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the said William Maxwell Alexander: As also, that the said Boyd Alexander and his forefathers are not entitled to have their said conditional interest provided for in the said conveyance, by means of a clause of devolution, or otherwise than by means of a personal obligation upon the said William Maxwell Alexander, or any of his lawful issue, who shall succeed to the said estate of Ballochmyle: As also, that the pursuers will have fulfilled the duty imposed upon them, and implemented the directions of the said truster, in so far as regards the rights and interests in the lands and others before described, given to the said William Maxwell Alexander, and to the said Boyd Alexander, and their respective heirs and assignees whomsoever, by the said settlements, by executing a conveyance to the several effects set forth in this conclusion, and under the burdens before mentioned or referred to, in the terms expressed and contained in the draft of the deed proposed to be executed by the pursuers, to be produced in process, and herein in part before recited: Or otherwise, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said Boyd Alexander and his foresaids ought to be substituted in the dispositive clause of the said deed to the said William Maxwell Alexander and his foresaids, or to him and his lawful issue, and that they are entitled to have a clause of devolution inserted of the said lands and others in their favour, in the event of the said William Maxwell Alexander, or any of his issue succeeding to the said estate of Ballochmyle; or at least, what other right and interest they have in the said lands and estate, and what clauses and provisions they are entitled to have inserted in the deed of conveyance to be executed by the pursuers, for enforcing and securing the same, other than, and different from, those contained in the draft to be produced by the pursuers."

William Maxwell Alexander pleaded—1. Mr Boyd Alexander and his children have only a conditional interest in the lands of Southbar and Boghall, arising under the codicil of 1819. 2. The proper mode of providing for such interest is by a personal obligation of the defender to denude in terms of the provision contained in said codicil. 3. The defender, on granting such obligation, is entitled to conveyance of the lands, in terms of the trust-deed of 1808, Boyd Alexander, for himself and children, pleaded, That according to the true intent and meaning of the truster, the trustees, in conveying the estates of Southbar and Boghall to William Maxwell Alexander, are bound to make the conveyance one in favour of William Maxwell Alexander and his heirs, whom failing, to the defender, and not merely to introduce the condition as to William's denuding in the defender's favour, but to secure the due implement of that provision by declaring the obligation to that effect to be a real burden on the lands conveyed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"4th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, finds that the defenders, Boyd Alexander, Esquire, and his children, are not bound to be satisfied with the clause in the deed prepared by the pursuers, referable to the contingency of the other defender, William Maxwell Alexander, or his issue, succeeding to the estate of Ballochmyle, but are entitled to have the provision that, in this event, the said William Maxwell Alexander, or his lawful issue so succeeding, shall be obliged to denude of the estates of Southbar and Boghall in favour of the said Boyd Alexander, and his heirs and assignees, made a real burden in the title to be granted to the said William Maxwell Alexander; and before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that it may be settled, whether the parties can adjust the appropriate clause or clauses themselves, or wish a remit to a neutral person, or how they propose to proceed: Reserving all questions of expenses.

"Note.—The law, as expounded in several decisions, is, that trustees, in the situation of the pursuers, are bound to carry what shall appear to have been their constituent's intentions, as deducible from his trust-deed, into effect; and the present truster, not content with leaving this to the law, expressly declares that the pursuers should 'regulate themselves according to my meaning and intentions,' as pointed out by my previous settlements, and by this codicil."

"Now, it is clear that he meant that Southbar and Boghall should never be united in the person of the same heir with Ballochmyle. He says so in express terms—and the question is, whether his trustees can be allowed to give William Maxwell Alexander such a title as may confessedly enable him to defeat this intention? The Lord Ordinary thinks that they cannot, but that Boyd Alexander is entitled to insist that they shall not merely insert into his title a general and very easily defeasible declaration, but that they shall do what the defender now desires, to secure his interest.

"There are several courses that might have been followed. But it is needless to examine these, because Mr Boyd Alexander restricts his claim to the one that is the mildest for the other party, viz., that the obligation to denude shall be made a real burden, and shall enter Mr Maxwell Alexander's sasine and the future investitures. To this extent, at least, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the claim of Boyd is well founded.

"There is nothing to be learned from decisions on this subject, except the general rule, that the will of the grantor cannot be allowed to be evaded or defeated. Where the mere insertion of his words into the title to be framed will suffice, this (as in Anderson, 11th February 1835) exhausts their duty. Where more is required, the Court (as in Stirling, 30th November 1838), will order this addition, whatever it may be, to be made. Here the grantor has given no form of deed, but has merely explained an object which he wishes his trustees to attain: and the question is, whether they attain it by mere insertion into the title of his expression of his wish, which may be disregarded, and his intention defeated the very next day?"

William Maxwell Alexander reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Gillies.—On the first blush of this case I had great doubts of the soundness of the interlocutor; and these doubts have been confirmed. It was clearly the intention of the truster that the estates of Southbar and Ballochmyle should not be united; and he has so expressed it. Intentions, when a similar object is contemplated, are common, but none are more frequently frustrated. The question here is, has the truster used the proper terms to give effect to his intention, or to bind us to give effect to it now? I don't think he has. The case of Duthie (25th February 1841) is conclusive on the point. Indeed, the present case is a fortiori. All that the truster has done is not to give an instruction to his trustees, but to append a codicil to his settlements containing an obligation on his heir. To give effect to his intentions in the manner contended for by Boyd Alexander, would just be to rear up a new form of entail. The truster was a man of business who knew, and might easily have known, that if these were his intentions, he could only give effect to them by executing a regular entail. He has not done so. But he has said that the estates are not to be united; and is it therefore to be maintained, that as the union cannot otherwise be prevented, we must order a strict entail? Suppose an individual wishes to bind his heir not to spend beyond a certain sum. The obvious way of giving effect to his wish, is to execute an entail which will prevent people from trusting him; but if he does not choose to do so, it is impossible to have it done for him. I am clear that, in the present instance, the trustees will fully implement their trust by disposing in terms of the proposed draft.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. There is here no direction whatever to entail. There is not even a clause to prevent alienation, but merely a clause which binds the disponee in a certain event "to denude." This is merely a personal obligation, and cannot affect the lands. And I would infer, that it was not the truster's intention to affect them. He says, they are not to be united "in the person of the said William Alexander," &c. Now, what is here asked? A new kind of real right, which is to be substituted for the obligation which was originally personal, but is to be personal no longer. In this way effect is not to be given to the meaning, as expressed by the truster, but a new meaning altogether. The personal obligation appears to me to give full effect to the intention. If at the time when the estate of Southbar stands in the person of William Maxwell Alexander, the estate of Ballochmyle opens to him, he is under a personal obligation to denude himself of the former. From the very nature of the obligation, it appears impossible to carry it beyond the person. Indeed, I doubt if the thing proposed by the other defenders could be accomplished by the law of Scotland at all. Certainly, it could not be accomplished without an entail. At first, I thought that an entail had been ordered; but when I saw that there was to be no entail, I was satisfied that the thing was utterly impossible. The real right proposed would be of a very extraordinary description,—the effect being, that whenever the party holding the one estate happened, in whatever way, to come into possession of the other, one of them should jump away to a different party altogether. It would be a perfect anomaly.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no objection to allow the truster's declaration to go into the disposition, but the attempt to convert the personal obligation contained in it into a real right, would be utterly impracticable. As observed, there is here no instruction to the trustees to do any thing, and therefore there is no analogy between this case and those in which the trustees have been ordered to do certain things, e. g., to execute a strict entail according to the law of Scotland. In such cases, it has been found that the thing ordered to be done, must be done in such a way as not to leave the entail imperfect. Here the direction to the trustees is to convey in fee-simple; and were it to be held, that under such a direction, they are entitled, with the view of carrying out what is said to have been the truster's intention, to execute an entail, it is clear that, in the same way, every condition in a settlement might be construed into a direction to make an entail. Were a truster to say, my intention is that my heir shall not sell the lands disposed to him, or contract debt, the trustees might perhaps be entitled to insert this, in terminis, in the conveyance, but surely not to insert all the fetters of an entail. So here. As to the proposal to convert the declaration into a real burden, it is altogether out of the question.

Lord President.—I see no reason to doubt the soundness of the opinions now delivered. We are always, as far as possible, to give effect to the will of the testator. This principle we applied lately in the case of Ramsay v. the University of St Andrews. What was the intention of the truster here? If he intended, that, on a certain event, he wished the estates to be entailed, why did he not say so? Mr Alexander was a regular man of business, and knew how to give effect to his intentions. He does so by framing a codicil, which clearly enough indicates his wish, that the estates should not be united, but also indicates that he left it to his two nephews to give effect to it—just as if he had said, I have explained my wish, and have full confidence that you will not neglect it. As to an entail, there is no indication of it. This distinguishes the present case from those alluded to by Lord Fullerton, in which there was an express direction to entail. Then the proposed conveyance fulfils the direction given to the trustees, who are not entitled either to make an entail, or constitute a real burden.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and find and declare in terms of the first conclusion of the libel; and farther, find that, upon executing a deed of conveyance in terms of the draft, No. 10 of process, the pursuers are entitled to be exonerated and discharged in terms of the conclusions of the libel to that effect, and exoner and discharge the said persons accordingly, and decern; appoint the expenses of both parties, defenders, to be paid out of the trust-funds.”

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For William Maxwell Alexander, Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Moir; Hunter, Campbell and Company, W.S., Agents.—For Boyd Alexander, Anderson, Cowan, J. H. Maxwell; A. J. Russell, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

11th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 215.—Poor JOHN MAIKLEM, Pursuer, v. JOHN MACGRUTHAR, Defender.

Jury Case—New Trial—Husband and Wife—Expenses—Circumstances in which a new trial granted on the motion of the defender, generally, on the ground that the verdict was not sufficiently warranted by the evidence, but on condition of the defender paying the pursuer the expenses he had incurred in the first trial.

The pursuer—alleging that a bond had been granted by Thomas Henderson, and Jean Henderson and spouse, on 27th June 1839, by which these parties obliged themselves to pay to the pursuer and his wife ten per cent. on every £100 recovered by them out of a certain succession to which they claimed right—brought this action against the defender, who, it was alleged, prepared the deed for its delivery to them. The defender admitted having prepared the deed, but alleged, that some time after its execution, and before delivery, it had been returned to the granters at their desire; and, accordingly, that he was not answerable for delivery, and was unable to comply with the demand. A draft of the bond, and certain documents bearing on the circumstance, were recovered; and thereafter the following issue was sent to a jury:

“It being admitted, that on or about the 19th day of July 1839, a bond was executed in favour of the pursuer by Thomas Henderson, Edward Buchan, and Jean Henderson or Buchan:

“Whether the said bond was delivered to the defender, as agent for the pursuer, or for his behoof?—and Whether the defender wrongfully retains and refuses to deliver the same to the pursuer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

“Damages laid at £1500.”

The jury found,

“that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find that the bond was delivered to the defender, as agent for the pursuer and his wife, and for their behoof, and that the defender having wrongfully retained, and refused to deliver the same to the pursuer, find him liable in damages to them, and assess the same at 10 per cent. on the sums received, or to be received, conform to state signed by the counsel for the parties.”

The defender now moved for a new trial, on the ground, (1.) that the verdict did not answer the issue; and (2.) as being against evidence. As to the first ground, it was explained that the issue was taken, whether the bond was executed in favour of the pursuer, but that the jury had found that it had been delivered to the defender, as agent for the pursuer and his wife, while his wife was no party to the action. It appeared that the finding for the wife had been introduced by the jury, in consequence of an intimation from the presiding Judge, that as it appeared that the wife was interested in the bond, that that interest should be protected by the jury.

The Court granted a new trial, principally on the ground that the evidence, which chiefly depended on the instrumentary witnesses, was contradictory or unsatisfactory. But in regard to the other objection, the Court held that the defender was now precluded from urging it as an objection, especially as he made up a record in which the wife's interest appeared, and had taken the issue as it stood, and gone to trial thereon without stating any objection. In these circumstances, the Court held that he had waived any objection to want of title; and, besides, their Lordships were of opinion that they were bound to protect the interest of the wife. The new trial was granted on condition of the defender paying the expense of the former. On a subsequent day, a motion was made to the Court for leave to sist the wife as a party; but this the Court refused,—the Lord Justice-Clerk observing, that the Judge at the trial would protect the interest of the wife; and if he presided, he would suggest to the jury to endorse on their verdict that the wife had an interest in the result.

Presiding Judge at trial, Lord Justice-Clerk.—Act. A. Anderson, C. Robertson; T. M'Indoe, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Inglis; J. and J. Wright, W.S., Agents.—[G.D.F.]

14th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 216.—ROBERT KERR, Pursuer, v. ARCHIBALD SCOTT, Defender.

Public Informer.—Statute 50 Geo. III. c. 48.—Process.—A party who had been appointed by the Sheriff of Edinburgh as an officer of Court, was employed in that capacity under the Middle District Road Acts, to supply information to the Procurator-fiscal of the county, to enable him to prosecute for offences committed under the Road Acts. On the occasion of these prosecutions, the officer acted as principal witness, and was paid weekly wages for his duties and trouble, and, libelling on the 50th Geo. III., he brought an action against the Procurator-fiscal, in which he insisted he was entitled to a half of the fines recovered from offenders, on the ground of being informer—plea in defence sustained, that the Procurator-fiscal, who pursued for the penalties, was, in the sense of the Act, the informer; and action accordingly dismissed.

The pursuer set forth in the summons in this case, (which was raised in 1840,) that he had been admitted in 1825 by the Sheriff of Edinburgh as an officer of Court, and

“at the time of his said appointment and admission, it was stated to him by Archibald Scott, Solicitor-at-law in Edinburgh, and Procurator-fiscal of Court, that he wished the pursuer to give his attention particularly to the detection of offences committed by carters against the Road Acts, and that the pursuer would be remunerated for his trouble from the fines to be levied and recovered upon his information: That the pursuer attended to these duties, but he farther had occasion to observe various offences committed by proprietors and drivers of stage-coaches and other carriages, and the pursuer proceeded to give such information to the said Archibald Scott, as public prosecutor, as enabled him, with the aid of the evidence supplied by the pursuer, to obtain convictions against a considerable number of offenders of that class: That, from the 6th day of August 1825, to the 11th day of August 1830, the pursuer continued, from time to time, to lodge informations with the said Archibald Scott, which led to convictions against that class of offenders, upon whom fines or penalties were imposed, amounting generally to £5, but which, in some instances, were modified to a moiety of that sum, in terms of the Act of Parliament: That an account of the fines imposed and levied upon coach proprietors, coachmen, and others, in consequence of information given by the pursuer, during the time and in the manner foresaid, and amounting in all to the sum of £237 Sterling, is herewith produced and referred to, and held as repeated brevitatis causa.”

He then concluded, under the 50th Geo. III. c. 48, § 17, that the “defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuer for the half of the whole fines and penalties levied and recovered by him from coach proprietors and coachmen, in consequence of information supplied to him by the said pursuer, for offences against the Road Acts, from the 5th day of August 1825, to the 11th day of August 1830, with periodical interest thereon from the date of recovering the same till payment: And to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £130 Sterling, or such other sum, more or less, as shall appear to be the amount, with interest, resting owing to the pursuer at the said 11th day of August 1830.”

In defence it was stated, that from 1825 to 1828 the pursuer was employed as a road officer for the county of Edinburgh, but that from 1828 to 1838, when he was discharged, his duties were confined to the limits within which the Middle District Road Acts extended, and that, for the first part of his employment, he was reimbursed for his trouble out of the fines and penalties levied on offenders, but thereafter he was paid weekly wages for the duties he performed, as a public officer under the trustees of the Middle District, during which time he received no part of the fines.

It was admitted that the pursuer supplied information to the defender, which, together with evidence drawn from other sources, enabled the defender to prosecute as pursuer himself; but it was explained, that the present pursuer acted as principal witness for these prosecutions for penalties.

The defender pleaded—1. That the pursuer having received such wages or remuneration for his services as were agreed upon, or, at any rate, such as he was satisfied with at the time, and having made no claim from the time of his appointment till after he ceased to act as an officer, he was not now entitled to insist against the defender for the sum claimed in the summons; and, 2. That he had no right in law to make the present demand, since, in the cases of prosecution and conviction referred to, he was not the informer to whom a moiety of the fines and penalties was appointed to be paid. But the defender, as the prosecutor who sued for and recovered the penalties, was the informer in the sense of the Statute.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“4th February 1842.—Having heard parties, and considered the process, sustains the defences; absolves the defender, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in; and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

Note.—The pursuer, though he may have given what is popularly called information, was not the informer in the statutory sense. This character belonged to the defender, who gave the Court to be informed of each delict. The pursuer's position was quite different. He was a Sheriff's officer, to whom the detection of these offences was assigned, as it was to other officers; and although his outlay was repaid, and his wages were made to bear a certain proportion to the fines, still it was by wages, and as an officer, that he was paid. Accordingly, he generally appeared as the witness in these prosecutions,—a character inconsistent with his being entitled, as a matter of right, to part of the penalties. The long delay before bringing the action can only be accounted for on the idea that he understood he had got all he was entitled to.”

The pursuer reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Rutherford, Donaldson; James Malcolm, Agent.—Alt. G. Grant; Peter Crooks, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

8th June 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 217.—THOMAS SCOTT, Appellant, v. MESSRS CURLE and ERSKINE, Respondents.

Reparation—Damages—Wrongous Imprisonment—Process-Caption—Advocation—Amendment of Libel—Expenses—In an action of damages for wrongful imprisonment, on the ground that the pursuer had been apprehended under a process-caption issued by the Sheriff of Roxburghshire for recovering a process which had been advocated to the Court of Session, and was therefore under the control and jurisdiction of that Court,—the circumstances being, that a bill of advocation had been passed, but the letters had not been expedite within the ten days allowed by the Act of Sederunt, so that the bill fell, and a certificate to that effect was given out to the defenders,—and the Sheriff-Court process stood borrowed on a receipt by the pursuer, as a procurator there, in common form, to return it when called upon,—he not having complied with the regulation of the Act of Sederunt in case of an advocation, viz., to return the process to the Sheriff-clerk, that it might be transmitted to the Court of Session, on an obligation by the complainer's agent for its redelivery when the advocation should be finally disposed of; and the pursuer having unwarrantably expedite his letters of advocation after the certificate that the bill had fallen had been issued—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That there was no relevancy to sustain a claim of damages; and, 2. That the pursuer was not entitled to state, after the record was made up, but not closed, a new objection which went to the nullity of the caption altogether, otherwise than by an amendment of the libel on payment of the whole previous expenses.

This was an action concluding for £2000 of damages on account of imprisonment under a process-caption alleged to have been irregularly issued. The circumstances were these:—

The pursuer, who was a procurator in the Sheriff Court of Roxburghshire, presented, in April 1836, a petition to the Sheriff of Roxburghshire against Mrs Barbara Erskine or Pott, widow of the deceased Charles Erskine, writer in Melrose, and against the defenders, James Curle and James Erskine, praying the Sheriff to ordain these parties to deliver up to the petitioner certain title-deeds over which the defenders had then a right of retention or hypothec. The petition was found to be improperly directed against Mrs Erskine; while the Sheriff (after a good deal of procedure), on 18th June 1836, sustained the defenders' plea of retention, and dismissed the pursuer's petition, with expenses. The pursuer then presented a bill of advocation to this Court, which was of course passed ex parte.

It was provided by Act of Sederunt, 14th June 1799, that,

"5thly, When a bill of suspension or advocation is passed by the Lord Ordinary on the bills, the complainer shall expedite the letters at the Signet within ten days thereafter, otherwise the same shall fall to the ground, and the respondent shall be at liberty, upon a certificate from the Signet-office, obtained at any time after the said period is elapsed, bearing that the letters are not expedite, to go on with his diligence or other proceedings, as if the bill had been refused."

This regulation had been preserved and renewed by Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, § 17 and 18.

The pursuer did not expedite his letters within the ten days, and the defenders took out from the Signet-office the requisite certificate on 3d September 1836, three weeks after the passing of the bill.

The Sheriff-Court process had been borrowed by the pursuer, as procurator, from the Sheriff-clerk, in the common form, and stood on a receipt against him. He averred that it was lodged in the Bill-Chamber prior to the passing of the bill of advocation.

The Sheriff-Court Act of Sederunt provides, cap. 19, § 1:

"Any party who has given notice of his intention to advocate, and has lodged his bond of caution, in terms of cap. 19, sec. 2, may be allowed to see the process from the time of giving such notice, until it is competent to extract the decree."

And cap. 19, § 4, provides:

"When a bill of advocation is presented to the Court of Session, the process shall be produced by the procurator, whose receipt stands for it, in order that it may be transmitted by the clerk, agreeably to Act of Sederunt, 17th January 1797, and minuted as having been sent; or failing his producing the process, the Sheriff may grant caption for recovering it, and enforce such fine for non-compliance with this regulation as to the Sheriff shall seem reasonable."

The Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, provided,

"9. That in all cases in which the Lord Ordinary on the bills shall think it expedient, before passing or refusing a bill to which it is competent to appoint answers to be made, to order production in the Bill-Chamber of the proceedings in the Inferior Court brought under his review, it shall be incumbent on the complainer to lodge the same, with the inventory thereof, in the hands of the clerk to the bills, within such time as the Lord Ordinary may think reasonable, and which may, on cause shown, be prorogated, and failing such production, the bill shall be refused, and expenses found due."—"10. That on production to the clerk of any inferior court of a copy, duly certified by the clerk of the bills, of an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the bills, either passing a bill of suspension or advocation complaining of a judgment of such court, or ordering the process before such court to be produced in the Bill-Chamber, such clerk shall be bound, upon satisfaction of his legal fees, to deliver the whole steps of process, so far as in his hands, all conform to inventory, to the complainer's agent practising before such court, on his receipt and obligation for redelivery thereof, so soon as the matters at issue shall be finally disposed of in the Court of Session in case of the bill being passed, or in the Bill-Chamber, if the bill shall by a final interlocutor be refused; and the said clerk shall, previously to such delivery, if required, take the usual summary measures for compelling the restoration to his hands of any parts of the process which may have been borrowed, provided that the complainer shall not be entitled to require with the process the writs produced by the respondent, unless by his consent."

The form of proceeding herein pointed out was not followed by the pursuer.

The defenders having extracted their certificate at the Signet-office, wrote to the pursuer on 7th September 1836, requesting him to return the Inferior-Court process to the Sheriff-clerk. This not being done, they, on 15th September, transmitted the Signet-office certificate to the Sheriff-clerk, and marked a caption in the Sheriff-clerk's office-book, in common form. The Sheriff-clerk, according to the practice of the Court, intimated to the pursuer the application for the caption before actually issuing the writ. No objection having been lodged, the Sheriff-clerk gave out the caption to the defenders in the usual form. The defenders wrote to the pursuer on 21st September, intimating that they had "been obliged to apply for a caption against Mr Scott for it" (the process.) "The caption is in Messrs Curle and Erskine's hands, and they now intimate to Mr Scott, that unless the said process be returned to them, or to the Sheriff-clerk's office in Jedburgh, by Friday next, at twelve o'clock noon, they will be under the necessity of putting the caption into the hands of an officer."

The pursuer returned no answer to this letter.

The pursuer, in the meantime, expedited letters of advocacy upon his bill, and signeted them on 26th September. He then called and enrolled them in absence of the defenders. Having seen the advocacy in the printed rolls, they appeared and stated the objection of incompetency under the Act of Sederunt, which was at once sustained by the Lord Ordinary.

The pursuer having still kept up the Sheriff-Court process, the defenders directed the officer to put the process-caption into execution. The pursuer was in consequence apprehended and incarcerated on 23d December 1836, upwards of three months from the date of the caption. The pursuer then presented a bill of suspension and liberation, accompanied by a certificate from the clerk in whose office the letters of advocacy had been called, dated 24th December 1836, and certifying that the process of advocacy "is at present in dependence in the Court of Session."

On this application Lord Cockburn, Ordinary, granted warrant of liberation in absence of the defenders. The pursuer, in the meanwhile, reclaimed against the interlocutor dismissing the advocacy; and he raised the present action. On the reclaiming note the Court (26th May 1837) adhered, with additional expenses.

The ground of action libelled on by the pursuer was, that his incarceration was illegal and unwarrantable, in respect that at the date of the apprehension, "the said" (Sheriff Court) "process was part of the record of the said process of advocacy, and was subject to the orders, control, and jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and entirely out of the control and jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Roxburghshire."

In defence it was pleaded—1. That the expediting and enrolling of the letters of advocacy, founded on by the pursuer, having been illegal and unwarrantable, could not stop the defenders' legal diligence, and hence the using of that diligence was lawful, and was not relevant as a ground for claiming damages; and, 2. The proceedings of the defenders libelled being neither, causeless, malicious, incompetent, illegal, nor oppressive; but being in every respect regular and legal, and having been rendered necessary by the contumacious and illegal conduct of the pursuer himself, this action could not be maintained.

The record having been prepared (but not closed), and the case remitted to the Issue-Chambers, the defenders moved to have it retransmitted, in order that the question of law raised under their defence should be disposed of by the Lord Ordinary before trial.

"20th November 1838.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the points of law or relevancy which the defenders require to be decided before remitting the case to the issue clerks, with a view to a trial by a jury—Before answer, appoints the said parties severally to prepare and give in minutes of debate on the said points of law or relevancy, to be seen and interchanged within fourteen days from this date, and finally revised and lodged with the clerk within ten days thereafter.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has not the least doubt of the competency of requiring a decision in this stage of the proceedings on any points of law or relevancy which it may be expedient now to decide, although this is one of the cases appropriated to jury trial by the Statutes, and indeed, since the case of M'Leod and Buchanan, 10th June 1837, he cannot think that this is open to question. Even in the earlier case of Lord Eglington's trustees, (10th March 1837,) where the question turned solely upon the 12th section of 59th Geo. III. c. 35, a large majority of the Judges held that there could be no doubt that that section applied to the enumerated cases, as to the power of giving a preliminary decision on points of law or relevancy, though some of them were of opinion that it did not apply as to the power of finding that the case was not in itself proper for trial by jury, which alone was then in dispute. The whole five Judges who voted in the minority (to whose views Lord Cuninghame also inclined), held that it applied to both these cases; and two out of the six, who made the majority, were clear that it applied to the enumerated cases, in so far as regarded the power to decide law or relevancy before trial, though not as to the power to remit as unfit for jury trial; and a third, Lord Cockburn, was doubtful. But the matter seems to be put out of dispute, as to the point now in question, by the 33d section of the 6th Geo. IV. c. 120, which had no bearing on that former case. The opinion of the Court, accordingly, was unanimous in M'Leod and Buchanan. The Lord Ordinary trusts, therefore, that the defenders will refrain from resuming the discussion of this point in their minute; though, as he is anxious to pronounce no judgment hoc statu, which might lead to intermediate litigation, he has not thought it advisable to fix the matter by any interlocutor.

"He has a very clear opinion, too, both that the point of relevancy which is here raised is one which it is highly expedient to have settled before the case (if, after such settlement, any case shall be left,) goes to a jury; but that it would be unjust both to the parties and to the Judge or Judges at the trial, to leave it to be argued and decided in the summary way in which it must necessarily be disposed of on such an occasion. The question, as he understands it, is, whether the actual dependences of a process of advocacy, upon expedite letters, of a judgment of the Sheriff of Roxburghshire, had transferred the original record and exclusive cognisance of the cause to this Court, at the time the defenders proceeded to carry into effect a process-caption previously issued by the said Sheriff against the pursuer,—the admitted facts being, that the advocator had omitted to expedite the letters of advocacy for more than ten days after his bill was passed; and a certificate of that fact had been obtained in regular form from the Signet-office, in consequence of which the Lord Ordinary, before whom the case came, had found that the advocacy had finally fallen, and that there was truly no such process in Court, but that his interlocutor had been submitted to review by a reclaiming note, and that this note was still undisposed of when the caption was put to execution; the final result being, that the note was refused, and the Lord Ordinary's judgment confirmed.

"The defenders are not understood to dispute, that if there was a process of advocacy truly depending in this Court, they could not have lawfully executed the caption issued by the Sheriff for restoration of the proceedings to his clerk, and that the subsequent and ultimate dismissal of that depending process, or a remit to the Sheriff simpliciter, could never free them from the consequences of having anticipated this result on their own authority, and thus deprived the advocator of the interim protection against any execution of the Sheriff's warrants or decrees to which he was entitled, as the pursuer of a process of review in the Supreme Court. But they say that the objection which the Lord Ordinary had sustained, was not to the merits, but the competency of the advocacy, and accordingly, that the case was not remitted simpliciter, but 'dismissed, as brought irregularly into Court;' and they maintain, that it being thus manifest that the record was never legally taken out of the Sheriff Court, it was clearly competent for them to force back the process under his authority, in spite of any null and fictitious proceedings which the pursuer might attempt in this Court, on the ground of letters improperly expedite on the face of them, after the advocacy had irrecoverably fallen and been annulled. If they can make out this proposition, there is no doubt an end of the case of the pursuer, which rests solely on the illegality of his apprehension on this caption during the alleged dependences of the advocacy at his instance in this Court. If there was truly no such dependence, and the apprehension was consequently warranted by law, there are not on the record any such allegations of excess or personal violence as to justify any claim for damages; and for this reason the Lord Ordinary thinks it essential that the legality or illegality of the proceedings should be determined in the first place,—the question as to such legality being sufficiently raised on the documents in process, and the facts admitted on the record. If he had been satisfied, therefore, upon the argument he has already heard, that the execution of the caption was legal, he would at once have dismissed the action, and assailed the defenders.

“He cannot say, however, that he is as yet so satisfied when he considers the pursuer's replies. His argument in substance is, that a question of competency is as much a question of law, and may be as difficult a question as one on the merits, and that a defence founded on an alleged irregularity in bringing a process into Court, is no more to be acted upon by a defender at his own hand, and before final judgment, than any other defence, and adds, that so long as the validity of such a defence is sub judice, there is a depending process which fixes the record, and all legal control over it, exclusively in the Court whose judgment it is awaiting. He asks, how the defenders would have justified their execution of this caption if the Court had altered the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted to him forthwith to hear parties on the merits of the depending advocacy? Or upon what grounds, other than their own rash confidences in its being adhered to, they can now justify their illegal proceeding in anticipation of such a result? He asks, whether they will now maintain that they might legally have acted as they have done, if the Court had previously been equally divided on the question of competency, and the matter had been standing over for consideration when the caption was put in execution? He then asks, whether the record of the Sheriff Court process, which had been duly transmitted from the Bill-Chamber to the clerk to the advocacy, at the time of its first enrolment in this Court, and was known to be in his hands by the defenders when they stated their objections to the Lord Ordinary, could possibly be at the disposal of the Sheriff till the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was final, and while it was yet doubtful whether he might not be directed to proceed to the discussion of its merits at the next calling? And, finally, he asks, whether, even if he were yet to intimate an appeal to the House of Lords against those last judgments, that record must not be laid on the table of the House, and all execution either of the Sheriff's orders, or those of this Court, suspended, till a regular warrant was obtained for such execution pending the appeal?

“The Lord Ordinary gives no judgment, and has formed no decided opinion upon these questions, further than that he is not prepared to dispose of them without more consideration, and that he thinks them not only of great importance, but of very considerable difficulty, and wishes, upon this account, to see them argued in writing. If, after considering the minutes, he should still have the same difficulty, he will probably report the question to the Court, and if the parties contemplate going there at any rate, it might be convenient that the minutes should at once be printed. If he decides to report, he will certainly order the minutes to be boxed before the Court rises for the Christmas recess, so that the trial, if it is ultimately to proceed, may be as little delayed as possible.”

On 7th December 1838, the Lord Ordinary allowed the pursuer to give in a minute, stating an addition to the record, that the “caption was not signed by the Sheriff, nor was it an extract of any warrant duly signed by him,”—the caption having been signed by the Sheriff-clerk,—and also an additional plea applicable to that statement. The minutes of debate were given in, when the Lord Ordinary (9th November 1839) made avizandum therewith to the Court, adding the following note:

“The Lord Ordinary inclines to think that the new plea of the pursuer, founded on the want of the Sheriff's signature to the caption, cannot be entertained under this summons, though, upon its merits, it seems to be the best plea he has. There is something, perhaps, in the specialty, that the clerk of a court is the proper custodian of the processes then depending, and entitled, as it were, to effect their restoration via facti, and by an act of rei vindicatio, which may sanction his issuing caption of his own authority for this particular purpose, though such an assumption of judicial power would be indefensible in any other circumstances; and if there was any thing like a general usage to this effect, it might be held that he was constituted virtute officii a substitute for the Judge, as to this particular function. But it is plain to the Lord Ordinary that the general usage is all the other way; and in a question as to the actual invasion of the personal liberty of the subject, he thinks the supreme tribunal of the country cannot be too jealous of all questionable assumptions. But as the case now stands, he does not think that the question is here.

“Upon the original ground of action, he retains, to a certain extent, the doubts expressed in his former interlocutor, and has therefore reported the case without a judgment. On the merits, however, he is more inclined than he was originally to sustain the defenders' objections to the relevancy: But he still feels that there are great difficulties in the way of such a decision.

“The distinction taken by the defenders between objections to the competency or formality of an action, and to its merits, is perplexing enough in itself; but the farther distinction between nice and critical objections to the competency, and such as are said to be so obviously well founded as not to admit of a bona fide or rational defence, is incomparably more perilous. In all questions of relevancy, the objector must admit or assume the truth of the whole statements on which the other party rests his conclusions. But an essential part of the pursuer's averments in this case is, 1st, That he was encouraged by his legal advisers to maintain the validity of the proceeding on the expedite letters, and did accordingly maintain them in the most perfect bona fides; and, 2d, That the defenders proceeded to execute the caption against him ‘causelessly and maliciously.’ Now, so far from admitting or assuming the truth of these averments, the defenders, in their argument on the relevancy, vehemently and entirely deny them. They form part, however (and a very material part), of what the pursuer offers to prove to a jury: and, if the case is sent there, will probably be put specialty in issue. In these circumstances, there are two questions for the Court, 1st, Whether, assuming the truth of these, along with the pursuer's other averments, there is or is not a general relevancy in his statement? and, 2d, Whether, if there be such a relevancy on this assumption, it would be fitting (or even competent for us, in an action of damages like the present) to form any judgment as to the truth of these averments, and substantially to hold them as false, on account of their palpable improbability, their inconsistency with admitted facts, or on any other consideration? On the first question the Lord Ordinary should have great doubts, but on the second, he should have a clear opinion against such interference with the proper functions of a jury.”

A majority of the Judges were of opinion, 1. That the new objection to the caption, which was not covered by the summons, could not, at so late a stage, be received under an amended libel, without payment of the whole previous expenses; and, 2. That on the case there was no relevancy to sustain a claim of damages.

They accordingly (18th January 1840) remitted to the Lord Ordinary to close the record, sustain the defences, and dispose of the question of expenses as to his Lordship should seem fit.

Scott then appealed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case came before your Lordships by appeal from an interlocutor of the Court of Session. At the time of the hearing I felt no doubt, except on one point—that of the form of the certificate. With respect to the rest of the case which has been brought before your Lordships by the appellant, it did not create one moment's doubt. The interlocutor of the Court of Session dismissed the suit,—the Court being of opinion that the pursuer was not entitled to the relief he prayed, and accordingly compelled him to pay the costs of the suit; but it, at the same time, gave him the liberty of commencing another suit if he had any cause of complaint.

It really, therefore, is a case that resolves itself into a question of costs, though it does not assume that shape. Your Lordships do not allow an appeal in respect of costs; but where the same question is presented in another shape, your Lordships are under the necessity of hearing a discussion on a question as unimportant between the parties as if it had been presented as a mere question of costs. My Lords, the contests between the parties arose out of a suit in the Sheriff Court, from which the appellant presented to the Court of Session a bill of advocacy. There is no doubt that that bill of advocacy fell to the ground, unless a certain process took place within ten days,—that is to say, at the expiration of ten days. According to the construction which has been put on the Act of Parliament, it was competent for the opposite party to put an end to the proceeding if that process had not taken place. Ten days elapsed—and more than ten days elapsed. The parties then applied for a certificate, which certificate was in these words: "Certificate of the keeper of the Signet. Searched Signet-books from the 22d day of August last to the 3d day of September current, both days inclusive, and found no letters of advocacy there entered as having passed the Signet, during the above period, at the instance of Thomas Scott of Abbottsmeadow against Messrs Curle and Erskine, writers in Melrose, and Mrs Erskine residing there." There is no doubt that upon the ten days being elapsed, and the proper certificate being obtained, by the Act of Sederunt the cause was actually gone: it no longer existed. The terms of the Act of Sederunt are—"that the party may go on with his diligence or other proceedings as if the bill had been refused." There is no question made upon that: that is gone. After that, however, the appellant proceeded as if this process had not been taken to put an end to the bill of advocacy. He brought the case first before the Lord Ordinary, and after the Lord Ordinary had decided on this very ground, that the certificate of lapse of time put an end to the suit, he thought proper—not being satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's decision—to bring the case before the Court of Session; and the Court of Session of course adjudged in the same way the Lord Ordinary had done before. It is said, however, that the appellant having possessed himself of the Sheriff Court process, the suit was still pending, and that the pendency of the suit prevented the party taking any proceeding in the Sheriff Court. My Lords, that would be a very strange view to be taken of the case. The Act of Sederunt put an end to it completely, and enabled the party who had got the certificate to go on with the proceedings in the Sheriff Court. There is no question about the construction of the Act of Sederunt. If, then,—the suit being actually out of Court—there being no further opportunity of preventing the party going on in the Sheriff Court,—a party thinks proper to institute so useless a proceeding as to apply to the Lord Ordinary, in the first instance, and the Court of Session afterwards, that cannot be considered as a pendency of the suit in favour of the party who has gone on prosecuting that writ—assuming the proceedings to be regular after the expiration of the ten days, and after a certificate granted to the opposing party, which, by the terms of the Act of Sederunt, put an end to the cause. It may be assimilated, according to our course of practice, to the case of the Court of Chancery dismissing a bill: the plaintiff is actually out of Court; and if he thinks proper to give notice of a motion in that case—if he comes before the Master of the Rolls, or the Vice-Chancellor, who must necessarily give judgment against him on the motion, on the ground that the suit is no longer in existence,—and if the party, notwithstanding that, brings the matter by appeal before the Lord Chancellor, who must necessarily decide that that suit is ended,—can such person say that the suit was pending? Certainly not: nor can the appellant be heard to contend that this suit was pending, because he has chosen to take these proceedings contrary to the Act of Sederunt. It is impossible to contend that this is a pendency of the suit for the purpose of preventing the party who, by the Act of Sederunt, had a right, on the certificate being granted, to take the course he did. The respondents having armed themselves, as I have stated, with the certificate under the terms of the Act of Sederunt, proceeded in the Sheriff Court, and, having found that the proceedings which ought to have been in the hands of the Sheriff, were somehow in the possession of the appellant—having been procured by him from the Sheriff Court—applied to have them restored. They were not properly in his possession, and ought not to have remained in his possession; and it is quite clear he had no right to use the possession he so obtained from the Sheriff Court for the purpose of expediting letters of advocacy. The mode of proceeding is very clearly pointed out. He ought to have restored them to the Sheriff Court—having borrowed them for a particular purpose. He did not say that he was to deposit them in the Sheriff Court; but, contrary to the purpose for which the documents had been intrusted to him, and contrary to the Act of Sederunt, he brought these proceedings into the Court of Session—at least, so he states; and that may be assumed for the present purpose to be a correct representation. But there is another fact which he does not dispute; for it appears, upon his own representation, namely, that on the 7th of September, those documents were in the possession of his agent. He is then called upon, by proceeding in the Sheriff Court, to bring in these documents: he does not do so: he states no reason for not doing so; but afterwards he deposits them in the Court of Session. Now, if a party is intrusted with documents in the Sheriff Court, under an obligation to return them into the Sheriff Court when called upon to do so, and he afterwards thinks proper to deposit them in the Court of Session, or elsewhere, he cannot be permitted to plead the possession of the Court of Session as a reason why he should not obey the order of the Court:—that, however, was the course taken. After repeated applications, having deprived himself of the means of obeying the order of the Sheriff Court, by having deposited the documents elsewhere, at least so he alleges, he is arrested under process of the Sheriff Court for not obeying the order of that Court; and then, fortunately, through a not very accurate representation, he gets liberated; and for that arrest he brings his action; and these facts are stated by himself. He also states,—not as the statement of a grievance, but in the course of the narrative—that he was apprehended on the 23d of December 1836, by a process-caption under the hand of the Sheriff-clerk of Roxburghshire;—not, I say, stating that as a grievance, but narrating it as part of the transaction. Now, that process-caption is said not to have been regular: for that it was signed by the clerk, and not by the Sheriff. That the Court of Session, on the case being brought before them, did not determine. They did not think the summons stated that as a ground of action, which it clearly did not, but as a part of the narrative; and they held, that if the party meant to state that as a part of the ground of action for his arrest, he ought to have distinctly stated it as such; and therefore the Court of Session adopted a course which preserved to the party complaining of the arrest, all the benefit he might be entitled to in consequence of any defect in the process-caption, by giving him liberty to bring another action on that ground if he thought proper; but it refused him an opportunity to amend his pleadings, by introducing a new grievance as a ground of action. Now, the action having proceeded on a totally different ground, this error in the process of caption not having been brought forward, and stated as a ground of complaint, but merely incidentally stated as one among other circumstances, it would certainly have been a very inconsiderate exercise of discretion for the Court to have permitted the amendment to have been made. It was for the Court to determine the question of relevancy or competency; and the Court being of opinion, in which it appears to me clearly that they were right, that that was not a complaint stated or relied upon,—the permitting a party to amend the record for the purpose of bringing forward some new case, would have been an act of injustice towards the other party. They felt that they could not permit a record framed for one purpose to be turned to another, and therefore they dismissed the suit, ordering the pursuer to pay the costs; but at the same time that they dismissed the suit, they left him at liberty to bring another if he thought proper. Now, the costs must be paid at all events. If the amendment had been permitted, the costs must have been paid up to that point, when the suit was put on a new ground: so that regarding it simply as a question of costs, the effect of the suit being dismissed with costs, with liberty to bring a new action, would be precisely the same in every respect, except that, in the one case, the party would have to pay costs up to the period of the amendment; and in the other, to pay the costs of the suit so dismissed. My Lords, the only point on which I yesterday entertained any difficulty, was as to the form of the certificate. I did not receive any explanation why, the bill of advocacy having passed on the 13th of August, the search is stated to have been from the 22d day of August, and find that there was no bill of advocacy at that period—Why it was that the information was not required for the period previous to the 22d, the date stated in the certificate, I do not understand; but there is in the appellant's case, a passage cited from Mr Beveridge: "It may be noticed, that in practice the ten days have been reckoned heretofore, not from the date of the interlocutor passing the bill, but from the date that the bill so passed is issued, or in a state to be issued by the clerk to the bills." Whether that is the period to which the date refers or not, there has no satisfactory explanation been given; but in the same page of the appellant's case, there is a passage which appears to me to remove the difficulty as to the period to which the certificate refers; for it is there stated, that "if the letters should be expedite before the certificate is issued, although beyond the ten days, the proceeding is quite effectual. In fact, the keeper of the Signet would not issue a certificate, if, before such certificate was applied for, the letters were actually expedite, although after the ten days." The only difficulty that arises upon the terms of the certificate, is the possibility that, in the interval between the 13th of August and the 22d of August, there might have been a signet attached to the letters of advocacy; but that is entirely excluded by the statement the appellant himself makes, that on the application to the officer for the certificate, though more than the ten days had elapsed, he would not have granted the certificate applied for, if, even after the expiration of the ten days, letters of advocacy had been expedite before the certificate was applied for. Now, that appears to remove the possibility of there having been such letters at the time the certificate was granted; and in point of fact, there is no statement that there were such letters expedite at any time between the 13th of August and the 22d. My Lords, this, however, was a question for the parties before the Lord Ordinary in the original suit; because when the case came before the Lord Ordinary,—if this bill of advocacy was gone,—if there had been no letters of advocacy,—of course it was competent to the party contending that the bill of advocacy was gone, to raise that as an objection, and to apply for the dismissal of the suit; and it was also competent for the other party to insist on the irregularity of the certificate if any such objection could be made; and then it would have become the duty of the Lord Ordinary or the Court of Session to decide on the regularity of the proceeding; and if there was no certificate, in consequence of which the suit was necessarily ended, it would be matter of discretion for the Lord Ordinary, or the Court of Session, what course should be pursued; but neither on the one occasion or the other, do we find any proceeding on the ground of a supposed irregularity of the certificate;—it is, therefore, a case in which the whole effect of the certificate remains, and this certificate must be assumed to be a regular certificate, in the absence of any authority to show that it is an irregular certificate: the case having been four times before the Court of Session,—twice before the Lord Ordinary, and twice before the Court of Session; and that objection not having been made, it would be too much for your Lordships to assume, in a question of practice, that there is any thing in substance in that which appears certainly not perfectly explained. My Lords, if then that is a valid certificate, the proceeding in the former action was gone at the time the letters of advocacy issued, and all further proceedings were null and void: and so the Court said, whenever any question came before them on the subject of the proceeding,—whether the respondents were correct in their proceedings in the Sheriff Court, or whether there was any defect in the process of caption, is a question which may be tried if another action is brought. It is quite sufficient that this suit has failed on all the grounds on which it was brought, and therefore the interlocutor of the Court of Session was perfectly correct in dismissing that suit, and directing the pursuer to pay the costs, leaving him at liberty to bring another action if he thought fit. Under these circumstances, my Lords, I submit that the interlocutors appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Second Division.—Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—J. W. Nicholson, Appellant's Solicitor.—Spottiswoode and Robertson, Respondents' Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

8th June 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 218.—CHARLES TODD, Appellant, v. The Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow and Others, (Parliamentary Trustees of the River Clyde), Respondents.

Accretion—Alluvion—River—Feu-right—Property—By a series of Statutes, the first in 1758 and the last in 1825, a trust was created for improving the navigation of the river Clyde. Powers were conferred on the trustees to undertake all necessary works for that purpose, whether it should be by contracting or enlarging the channel of the river. The trustees proceeded by contracting the channel, for which end they erected embankments in the channel of the stream. At one part of the river a feu-right had been granted in 1792 by the Magistrates and Town-council of Glasgow (who were then also the trustees of the river), of a piece of ground of a specified measurement, and described as bounded on the north by the Clyde. A considerable space having been interjected between the original limits of the feu and the river, in consequence of the embankment made by the trustees, and the filling up of the ground behind, which was done principally by them, so that it became solid ground about 1826—Held, in an action of declarator by the feuor, to have that new ground declared to belong to him in absolute property, as having accreted to his original feu, that he had not acquired such property therein, but that the trustees were entitled to remove their embankment and resume possession of the interjected space, for the improvement of the navigation, without giving any compensation to the feuor as for his own ground.

The present action was raised by the appellant, who set forth in his summons, that in 1792 his predecessors acquired from the Magistrates and Town-council of Glasgow a feu of a piece of ground on the banks of the Clyde, below the Broomielaw: That the feu-contract described the feu as "consisting of one acre, one rood, and thirty-five falls of ground, or thereabout, in which measure both parties acquiesce, be the same more or less;" and as also described by its boundaries, and in particular, as being bounded "on the north by the river Clyde:" That certain reservations and declarations were contained in the feu-right, being in substance, (1.) a reservation of the minerals; (2.) a declaration that it should not be lawful to the feuor to erect any quay, harbour, wharf, &c.; (3.) nor to make or allow any road or passage to any quay, harbour, wharf, &c., for the purpose of loading or unloading any merchandise; (4.) that it should not be lawful to the feuor to interrupt the privilege of footpath subsisting over the lands; (5.) nor to "erect any building, fence or other obstacle, to interrupt the said foot-path, or to abridge, diminish, or interrupt the right of towing ships, lighters, boats and vessels on the river Clyde, or the navigation of the said river, or the rights or privileges there-to belonging in any manner of way; which foot-path, towing-path, and other rights and privileges, are hereby reserved in full force."

That since the date of the feu in 1792, the channel of the Clyde had been contracted, and certain ground had been gained from the river in consequence of operations performed by the respondents or their predecessors; and the summons concluded that the appellant

"is entitled to the full and absolute property of the subjects down to the said river, and of the whole ground extending to the said river, without distinction as to whether the said ground formed part of the subjects at the date of their original acquisition, or has since been gained in consequence of the river having receded, or its channel having been contracted or narrowed, or of any operations employed for the purpose of so contracting or narrowing the said channel, or in connection therewith."

The respondents stated, that it was true that, since the date of the feu-right, the ordinary water channel of the river had been contracted, not by any natural cause, such as the receding of the river, but by artificial restraints connected with the objects of navigation: That at the date of the feu-right, the river was under public regulation and control, for public purposes, and it had continued to be so, with enlarged and altered powers conferred by the Legislature: But that, although in the course of these operations, and in following out the views which, from time to time, had been entertained as to the measures best suited to improve the navigation, it was at one time considered advisable to contract the ordinary water channel, the respondents were now advised to enlarge the present contracted water channel, and for that purpose to slice down and cut off in many places a considerable portion of the embankment which their predecessors had made, encroaching upon the original water course, and restraining the ordinary water channel within narrower bounds than were natural to it.

The following were the legislative enactments with reference to the river Clyde, on which the respondents founded.

The first Statute upon the subject was passed in 1758, viz., 32 Geo. II. c. 62. By the first section of that Statute, authority was given to the Magistrates and Council "to cleanse, scour, straighten, enlarge and improve the said river Clyde, from Dumbuck ford to the Bridge of Glasgow, aforesaid, and to dig, cut, and deepen the same, or any part thereof, and thereby to make the said river more navigable or passable for boats, barges, lighters or other vessels:" And also to make such "works, as to the said Magistrates and Council, and their successors in office, shall appear necessary or convenient for promoting the said navigation, and, from time to time, to repair, amend, and alter the same:" "And also to do all such other acts, matters and things, as they shall at any time think necessary and convenient for carrying on, supporting, improving and maintaining the said navigation."

The second Statute was passed in 1770, viz., 10 Geo. III. c. 104. By that Statute it was enacted, that the Magistrates and Council "shall have full power and liberty, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to make and keep the said river Clyde navigable from the lower end of Dumbuck ford to the Bridge of Glasgow aforesaid, so as there may be at least seven feet water at neap tides in every part of the said river, within the bounds aforesaid, for ships, vessels, barges and lighters to come and go to and from the said city of Glasgow; and for that end to alter, direct and make, or cause to be altered, directed and made, the channel of the said river through any land, soil or ground (part of the present bed of the said river), between the lower end of Dumbuck ford and the Bridge of Glasgow aforesaid, and to make, set up and erect so many jetties, banks, walls, sluices, works and fences, for making, securing, continuing and maintaining the channel of the said river within proper bounds, for the use of the said navigation, as to the said Magistrates and Council, and their successors in office, shall seem proper and convenient."

The third Statute was passed in 1809, viz., 49 Geo.

III. c. 74. By that Act the trustees were authorised not only to continue the works authorised by the former Acts,

"but also to carry on such new and additional works as they shall think proper, till such time as the said river is at least nine feet deep at neap tides, in every part thereof between the Bridge at Glasgow and the Castle of Dumbarton."

By the same Statute there was the following special provision in section 10:

"That in carrying on the said works, the transverse bed or channel of the said river in the highest flood, shall not be lessened or contracted, but the same, in all time coming, shall be kept, at least, of the present extent and dimensions, for the purpose of allowing the water and land floods to pass freely off during heavy rains."

The only other Statute was passed in 1826, viz., 6 Geo. IV. c. 117. By that Statute certain other trustees were added to the Magistrates and Council; and the trustees were authorised not only to continue the works authorised by former Acts, in the manner therein described, but also to carry on and execute such new and additional works as they should think proper, until such time as the river was thirteen feet deep at neap tides; "reserving always to the proprietors of lands adjacent to the river, all rights to soil acquired from the said river, or other rights competent to them at common law."

The statement of the respondents as to the mode in which the new ground claimed by the appellant was formed was, that "with the view of improving the navigable channel, the Clyde trustees erected jetties and embankments, and built retaining walls on each side, by which the transverse section of the river was greatly lessened or contracted; and they afterwards filled up the space between the wall on the north side of the river and the pursuer's ground, so as to form a new bank, to an extent greater than the original feu. The last operation, whereby a large pool opposite the pursuer's property was filled up, took place about the year 1826."

The appellant, again, denied that the contraction of the channel had been wholly by artificial operations, although it was principally by these; and that the filling up was wholly done by the trustees. He stated, that the earth was laid down in part by himself, and partly by the respondents; and that in consequence of this, a very considerable extent of ground had been gained from the river, and added to the property acquired in 1792. According to a plan made up in 1797, the subjects contained 13,092 square yards. According to another plan made up in 1837, and comprehending the ground down to the river, the extent of the same subjects was 16,851 square yards, making an addition or acquisition of not less than 3759 square yards.

The appellant pleaded—1. That he had the full and absolute property of all the ground gained from the river on his north boundary, whether by natural or artificial accession, subject only to the servitudes and restrictions contained in his titles, and to such as lay, at common law, on every proprietor on the banks of a navigable stream: Ersk. II. 1, 15. Campbell v. Brown, 18th November 1813. Boucher v. Crawford, 30th November 1814. Fisher v. D. of Atholl's Trustees, 3d June 1836;—and, 2. That the Parliamentary Trustees of the river Clyde were not proprietors of the ground so gained from the river, and were not entitled to appropriate or use it as such, or to deal with it differently from the other parts of the appellant's property.

The respondents pleaded—1. That this action could not be maintained, in so far as it applied to the ground which formed part of the bed of the river at the date of the original feu-right in 1792; (1.) because that ground was excluded from the appellant's property by the terms of the feu-right and the limits there set forth; and, (2.) because it could not be pretended that the appellant had enjoyed possession of that ground during the years of the long prescription: 2. That, further, the appellant and his predecessors had no right to make any erections or encroachments on the alveus or channel of the river, as the same stood at the date of the feu-right in 1792,—all such operations being illegal, and prohibited at common law: 3. That the ground in dispute having been recently taken from the channel of the river by artificial means and operations carried on by the parliamentary trustees, with a view to the improvement of the navigation, the same did not accresce or belong to the appellant: 4. That in virtue of the Statutes under which they acted, the respondents were entitled to restore this ground to the channel of the river, or otherwise to appropriate it exclusively to purposes connected with the navigation of the river, without allowing any sum in name of damages or compensation to the appellant: 5. That even supposing the appellant had an interest in the ground in dispute, such interest would be subject to the right of the respondents, as parliamentary trustees, to use the ground for the purposes of navigation, without his having any claim for reparation against them; and, 6. That as the whole of the appellant's ground formed part of the bank of a public navigable river, it was subject to a servitude or restriction at common law, whereby the appellant was debarred from putting up buildings or other erections upon it, or raising its height, so as to injure the navigation, or prevent the free course of the water over the banks in time of land floods.

Cases were ordered by the Lord Ordinary. The following passages in the respondents' case (pp. 15 and 19) were referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his note:

"To allow a right of property to be acquired by mere accession, whether natural or artificial, can only be supported upon principles of natural equity or expediency. Hence, even supposing this abstract right to exist, it must be received under various important and well-defined limitations. For it is clear that no one can acquire a right of property in land by accession, 1st, where this is contrary to his own title; or, 2dly, where there is a preferable right in favour of another party founded on an express grant or special Statute; or, lastly, where the claim is plainly inconsistent with the rights of the public. Upon all these grounds, the claim advanced by the pursuer in this case must be rejected.

"On the other hand, it is equally indisputable that the trustees had a right to the solum of the channel at the place in dispute, before they commenced their operations, and without which these operations never could have been carried on at all. But surely if they had such a right, it could not be lost or extinguished by their placing an embankment or mound of earth upon the solum, though the effect of this might be to convert the water into dry land. Suppose that the parliamentary trustees had made a large embankment or opus manufactum in the centre of the river below the bridge of Glasgow, and erected warehouses or other buildings thereon, completely surrounded with water, could the conterminous heritors have claimed the ground thus acquired from the river? Clearly not. Again, put the case, that in place of filling up the channel with earth opposite the pursuer's property, the trustees had erected a wharf or quay, projecting for some distance into the fairway of the river, could the pursuer have claimed the solum upon which it was built, because the erection happened to lie adjacent to his northern boundary? It is thought no such claim could be advanced. But, if not, where is the difference between these cases and the present? Here the right of the defenders to the ground is infinitely stronger than in the cases which have just been put, because they have no intention to take the ground for erecting wharfs or placing any buildings thereon, but solely for the purpose of appropriating it to the objects of navigation, by restoring the channel to its original breadth."

"11th July 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the revised cases for the parties, with the productions and whole process,—makes avizandum therewith to the Lords of the Second Division; and appoints copies of the said cases (which are already printed) to be boxed to the said Lords quam primum, in order to be reported; and grants warrant to the keeper of the Inner-House rolls to enrol the cause therein, as soon as either of the said cases is boxed under this appointment.

"Note.—This case, like all others which turn upon principles and interests so large, and (if the epithet may be allowed) expansible, is not unattended with difficulty. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the weight both of principle and of authority is with the trustees for the navigation.

"It is a long, and by no means an easy step, from the case of gradual and imperceptible accession, by the action of natural causes, to great and sudden acquisitions of additional land by artificial operations of the acquirer himself. But it is a still greater and far more difficult step from this last, to the allowance of such acquisitions to an inactive proprietor, when these have been obtained by the artificial operations of a third party; and most of all by the operations of a public statutory board, performing them (tentatively or permanently) for the improvement of a local navigation, and met, when afterwards proceeding to remove them, in the discharge of the same duty, by a claim on the part of the alleged (gratuitous) acquirer.

"Whatever other difficulties may be in the case, the Lord Ordinary has no idea that the pursuer can ever make good against such defenders, the broad and sweeping right he asserts "to follow the river" to whatever distance it may be carried, because his property is described in his titles (though they limit him to a precise measurement by rods and yards) as bounded by that river. To show the fallacy of this proposition, it is only necessary to consider to what consequences it would lead. By the Statutes, the trustees have power not only to deepen, widen, or contract the channel of the river, but also to 'straighten, direct, or alter its course.' But, suppose that in the exercise of this power (and to avoid a long bend like those on the Forth), they had thought fit to carry the channel of the river quite away from its former bed opposite to the pursuer's ground, and to lead it through a new cut three or four hundred yards farther off, thus interposing between him and the actual stream a large tract of land (twenty or thirty acres it might be in extent,) would the pursuer be entitled to take to himself the whole of this interjected territory, in virtue of his alleged right to have the river at all events for his boundary, and consequently to follow it wherever it went? The notion is evidently extravagant. But the pretension might lead to still greater absurdity. His titles, he says, gave him an inalienable right to have the river for his boundary 'on the north.' But suppose the trustees had found it necessary to divert its course in an opposite direction, and to carry its channel some three or four hundred yards to the south of the pursuer's acre and half of ground, what would become of his north river boundary then? Or how would he proceed with his claim to all the land between him and the river on the south?

"The propositions in law at the bottom of page 15 of the defenders' case, and the illustrations beginning at the middle of page 19, seem to the Lord Ordinary to admit of no answer. Some others, however, to the same effect, have occurred to him. Suppose, that, instead of closing in their retaining wall up to the land at each end, the trustees had left it open, and for the sake of quickening the action of the water, had constructed it in the form of a breakwater running along the shore, at a distance of but a few yards, but completely insulated, and leaving a narrow run of water between it and the old original bank, could it be doubted that, in such a case, the pursuer, though losing all the benefit of his open frontage to the river, and cut off from any useful access to its navigable channel, must yet have been contented with his original boundary, and could have had no pretensions to the property of the unsightly bulwark by which he was excluded? But suppose, again, that this insulated breakwater had been faced up as a quay on the side next to the channel, and levelled on the top accordingly, and that, in order to make it accessible for the purposes of trade and navigation, the trustees had connected it with the shore by two or three bridges across the interposed narrow water-run, would the property of it have been in this way transferred, by what he calls 'legal accession,' to the pursuer? But if open-arched bridges would not have this effect, would the substitution of a solid mound or two, as the means of communication, if placed towards its centre, have any other? It would be strange if they could; and yet if two such mounds were placed, one at each of the two extremities of such a breakwater, they would bring it precisely into the condition of the original front wall or quay of the trustees, which the pursuer confidently maintains did convert all the space behind it into his private property. It is inconceivable, however, that such a trifling change in the plan of the connecting passages should have so extraordinary an effect; and, if the trustees could certainly have removed their breakwater, if, after a certain trial, it was found not to be serviceable, without raising any right in the pursuer to compensation in any of the former cases, the Lord Ordinary cannot understand how he should have such a right in the last, which, however, is substantially identical with that which has occurred. It appears to him, in short, that the trustees must always have a right to remove any embankment they may have erected in the river, when they find it does not answer their purpose, and that this right cannot be affected by the mere form or plan of such embankment, but must be the same, whether it is constructed as a detached breakwater or an advanced dike, touching the shore only at its upper, or at both its extremities, or an open wooden quay resting on a low embankment overflowed at every flood-tide.

"The pursuer dwells much on the long possession he has been allowed to hold of the added ground, and of the plain finality (as he contends) of the operations by which it was added. But upon both points there is great and palpable exaggeration. The Lord Ordinary doubts whether the trustees could, consistently with their duty, have announced any of their operations as final while their engineers told them there was room for improvement; and certainly there never has been any such announcement. The whole of their operations in fact have been tentative; and their general character has varied, and even been in some degree reversed, after years of experience had pointed out the errors of the first conception. The two first acts, for example, contemplate improvements, chiefly by the construction of artificial channels, with locks, dams, and sluices; and all the latter ones, by scouring and cleaning the natural bed of the stream; and while the Act of 1809 points mostly to gaining additional depth by narrowing the water-way, that of 1825 provides most anxiously for bringing up a larger mass of tide-water and securing sufficient width for the purposes of navigation. It is not disputed, accordingly, that from the very first, the plan and principles of the operation have undergone material changes; and that, though the work has been going on ever since 1758, it was not till 1826 that the experiment of an advanced or contracting bulwark in front of the pursuer's ground was completed.

"Since that time, there cannot well be any thing like a settled state of possession; and, considering the nature of the subject, that possession could scarcely be attended with many indications of ownership. The pursuer accordingly has admitted that the added ground has been chiefly used for the purposes of navigation as a towing-path or landing-place, &c.; and that, except in carrying his drains through it, and occupying a small part as a tank or basin, he has had no beneficial use of it. But, in truth, he admits enough to show that the occupancy (or right to occupy) as proprietor has been mostly with the trustees, or those for whose benefit they were acting. He admits that they were fully entitled to use it for all purposes connected with the navigation and trade of the river; and consequently, not only to have a towing-path and landing stairs there, but to have occupied it with cranes and windlasses for unloading vessels, and posts or pails, and ground-rings for mooring or making them fast, and all the other apparatus of a landing-place within the city's grant of free harbour; in short, that they were entitled to take the same use of it as they might have taken of any other quay or wharf which they had erected on ground belonging to themselves, or had constructed as a detached bulwark in the bed of the river, connected with the shore only by mounds or bridges. The first question to be asked, therefore, is, whether if, instead of building this quay in the bed of the river, beyond the pursuer's original property, they had cut off an equal breadth—say 25 or 30 yards—from what was included in his measurement, and then in his occupancy, and built up a pier or quay for such purposes on the space so laid open, the pursuer would not have been entitled to have been paid for it as ground actually taken from him by the trustees for the use of the navigation? But if his admitted property would have been justly considered as taken from him, by being appropriated to such uses, it would certainly be rather extraordinary if a quay built on what never was his property, should yet become so by being so appropriated. The present claim of the pursuer goes down, it will be observed, to the very water edge, and includes the whole space occupied by the advanced dike or quay of the trustees,—not, however, to the effect of excluding them from the actual use of it, which he admits to be preferable to his own, but to the far more extraordinary effect of preventing them from taking it away when they find that it does not promote, but obstruct the uses for which it was erected.

"He does not (or at least he cannot well) deny, that if, within a year or two of its erection, they had found it necessary to remove this dike from the bed of the river, they might have done so without making him any compensation. But he seems to think, that because it was allowed to stand for twelve or fourteen years, they can now deal with it only as his property. The Lord Ordinary does not understand this. On the contrary, he is very much inclined to go along with what is said by the trustees, as to the insufficiency even of a prescriptive possession to sanction obstructions in navigable waters. He is indeed pretty clearly of opinion, that if the operations had been wholly performed by the pursuer himself, and for the sole purpose of gaining ground from the river, it would have been competent for the trustees to have removed them, even after forty years' possession, if it had then been clearly made out that they operated as such obstructions. That the fact is so, he thinks is sufficiently proved by the reports of their engineers, upon the faith of which they are now about to remove them, and farther to enlarge the channel at a very great expense; and he does not see that it should make any difference, in the pursuer's favour at least, that they were originally made, not at his expense but theirs; and not with the most remote view to his benefit, but under an erroneous expectation of improving the navigation.

"The Lord Ordinary will not go into the authorities referred to on either side, no one of which, he thinks, bears materially on the hinging points of the present case, which are in the peculiar powers and privileges of the defenders, as parliamentary trustees. But even upon the more general questions involved in former cases, it appears to him that the pursuer has little to found on beyond certain obiter dicta reported (more or less correctly) as having fallen from Judges, no doubt of great authority, when deciding cases which did not call for the announcement of any such large principles; and he must add, that the account given (at p. 28 of the defenders' case) of the proceedings in the House of Lords, as to the most recent of these cases, goes very far to shake the authority, not only of its decision in this Court, but of the previous decision in that of Campbell and Brown. But the true ground of the Lord Ordinary's opinion here was not, as he conceives, involved in any of those cases.

"Before concluding, however, he thinks it right to say, that the only thing that has occasioned any hesitation in his mind, is that express provision in the Act of 1825, by which, while giving ample powers to widen the channel if necessary, there is 'reserved to the proprietors of adjacent lands all rights to soil acquired from the said river, or other rights competent to them at common law.' There is something perplexing, no doubt, in this distinct reservation; and it is not easy to adopt the trustees' explanation, that it was a mere redundancy, and gave no benefit or security that would not have been enjoyed without it. The Lord Ordinary holds, that it gave something more than this, but thinks that what it gave was security rather than any new right; and while he cannot construe it, therefore, as excluding any right which would otherwise have been clearly in the trustees, he conceives that its insertion will be sufficiently explained, and its object satisfied, by holding that it was meant only to secure to the adjacent proprietors such acquisitions of soil as might have come to them by natural imperceptible accession, and to exclude what might have been a plausible claim on the part of the trustees to interfere, without payment, with such acquisitions.

"He has reported the case to save a little time and expense to the parties, and not, as will be seen, on account of any difficulty he should have felt in deciding it."

At advising on 23d January 1840, the Court sustained the defences, and absolved the trustees, but found no expenses due.

Todd appealed; but after hearing the appellant's counsel, the judgment of the Court of Session was affirmed, with costs.

Second Division.—Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—Archibald Grahame, Appellant's Solicitor.—Richardson and Connell, Respondents' Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

15th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 219.—JOHN HENDRIE, Advocator, v. ROBERT STEWART, Respondent.

Sale—Warranty—Proof—Circumstances in which the buyer of a horse was held entitled to rescind from the bargain on the ground of unsoundness, after the horse had been in his possession for five days.

Stewart purchased a horse at Rutherglen market, on 8th May 1840, from Hendrie, for a sum of £43. 10s. The animal was warranted as perfectly sound. Immediately after the sale, he submitted him for inspection to a veterinary surgeon, who pronounced no decided opinion at once; but on the fifth day after the sale, he gave a certificate that the horse was unsound. In consequence of this the buyer then requested the seller to take the animal back; but having refused to do this, the buyer then presented an application to the Sheriff of Lanark, setting forth the above circumstances, and that it was part of the bargain at the time that he was to have a fair trial,—in evidence of which he stated, that only £30 were paid on the market-day, and the balance was allowed to remain in his hands till such time as he should be satisfied in regard to the animal. He therefore craved the Sheriff to order the horse to be sold, and to pay over to the petitioner such price, deducting charges, as should be obtained, in relief of the £30 left in Hendrie's hands on the market-day.

Hendrie admitted that the horse was sold under the warranty of being sound; but he averred that he was so when sold; and, further, that the sole condition of sale was, that the buyer was only to have the market-day to satisfy himself in regard to the animal, and not longer; and he accordingly argued, that as Stewart had taken him away, and kept him for a length of time, he could no longer throw up the bargain, which must now be held to have been finally concluded: The Sheriff meantime granted warrant for selling the horse (the price obtained, after deducting charges, left a balance of £22. 4s.), and thereafter allowed a proof, hinc inde, as to the state of the animal when sold, and the conditions and understanding of parties at the sale.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The import of the proof is set forth in the following interlocutor of the Sheriff:

"Glasgow, 24th December 1840.—Having considered the interlocutor appealed from, and reviewed the whole process; finds it proved by the receipt, No. 6, that the horse here was sold for the price of £43. 10s., 'warranted sound and steady in harness.' Finds that, independently of the said written warranty, and which is also proved by parole evidence, that the agreed on price of £43. 10s. for a carriage-horse was a sound price, and warranted soundness in the animal: Finds it proved by the parole evidence, that in addition to this express and implied warranty, it was a condition of the bargain that the animal was to be reported on favourably by Mr Stewart, veterinary surgeon: Finds that, in implement of the bargain concluded under these conditions, the pursuer delivered to the defender a draft for £30, with an obligation for the price, dated 8th May 1840, in these terms:—'Although I have got the receipt for £43. 10s., I have only to-day given the draft for £30 on the Western Bank, and the balance will be remitted by me to Mr John Hendrie. By (Signed) ROBT. STEWART.' Finds that, upon the animal being submitted to Mr Stewart's inspection in terms of the bargain, he reported that he could not say that it was sound, nor yet decidedly that it was unsound, but recommended that it should be sent out to the pursuer's residence at Carfin, put to moderate exercise, and taken good care of, and that he would give a decided opinion in a few days: Finds it proved that the animal was taken to Mr Stewart's accordingly, taken good care of, and put to moderate exercise, and that as it appeared he was not sound, he was again submitted to Mr Stewart for inspection, who made a report and granted the following certificate of the unsoundness of the animal: 'And I hereby certify that I find the horse unsound, having the tendons of both fore-legs enlarged.' Finds that, in consequence of this certificate by the agreed on referee, the pursuer offered back the horse to the defender, which he declined to accept, and in consequence the present action was brought for warrant to sell the horse, which had been lodged in the Black-Bull stables by the pursuer, and for a warrant to apply the proceeds of the sale, after deducting expenses, in payment pro tanto to the pursuer of the £30 paid to account of the price: Finds that, in the circumstances which have now been detailed, the bargain was a conditional one, subject to the inspection and approval of the animal by Mr Stewart, and that as no period was fixed within which Mr Stewart's final opinion was to be given, it was competent for him to adjourn the giving of said opinion, and that if the same was given within a reasonable time, it was binding upon the parties: Finds that Mr Stewart's final certificate having been given on the 13th of May, five days after the bargain, and forthwith intimated to the defender, was given within reasonable time: Finds that the horse having been sold by warrant of this Court, in the course of the present process, brought the price of £30 Sterling on the 24th of June last, whereof £20. 10. 10. has been consigned in the hands of the clerk of Court, the remainder having been absorbed in the expenses of sale and keep of the animal: Finds that, under the special terms of the warranty which was granted here, and of the obligation of reference as to the soundness of the horse, come under by the defender to Mr Stewart as referee, the defender, in the whole circumstances of the case, was bound to have taken back the horse: Finds, separatim, that although there is great discrepancy in the evidence, the preponderance, upon the whole, is in favour of the opinion, independent of Mr Stewart's certificate, that the horse was not sound, and therefore that, under the bargain, the defender was bound to take it back: Therefore, alters the interlocutor complained of, decerns and declares in terms of the prayer of the original petition.

tion to this effect, that the pursuer is found entitled to uplift the consigned money, and that action is reserved to him against the defender for the balance of the £30 paid on account of the horse, after deducting said consigned money: Finds the defender liable in expenses of process; appoints an account thereof to be given in and taxed by the auditor, and decerns."

(Signed) "A. ALISON."

In an advocacy, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, finds that the proof establishes, 1st, That the sale of the horse in question was conditional, on its being approved of as sound by Mr Stewart, veterinary surgeon in Glasgow, and that this person gave it timeously as his opinion that the horse was not sound; 2d, That at the date of the sale the horse was unsound: Therefore, on these two grounds of fact, or on either of them, repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits to the Sheriff simpliciter, and decerns: Finds the advocator liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The case is not free of all doubt; but it appears to the Lord Ordinary, first, That the favourable opinion of Mr Stewart was an understood condition of the bargain. The answer of the advocator to this is, that Stewart did not reject the horse—that delivery was taken, and part of the price paid. But though at once he did not absolutely reject, he suspected and stated at the moment to the respondent (or, what is the same thing, to his servant acting in this transaction for him), that he would require some time to observe the animal; and in five days he declared him unsound. The horse had no doubt been taken away by the purchaser for these five days, and a partial payment of the price took place; but this was all on a reliance that the warranty was to turn out effectual.

"2d, That the evidence of the unsoundness preponderates. The strong circumstance in favour of the advocator is the testimony of Mr Poett; and if this intelligent and disinterested witness had seen the horse at, or even near the period of the sale, the Lord Ordinary would have held his evidence conclusive. But his opinion, if not altogether destroyed, is reduced to nearly nothing by the fact that he did not see the horse till about three months after the sale, during all which time it had been under the advocator's charge.

"The Lord Ordinary proceeds more upon the first of these grounds than upon the second."

The Court on a reclaiming note,

"Recal the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find it unnecessary to pronounce any opinion on the first finding in the said interlocutor; and find that the proof establishes, that at the date of the sale the horse in question was unsound, and decern and declare in terms of the prayer of the original petition; and remit to the Sheriff, with instructions that the pursuer shall have right forthwith to uplift the consigned money, in part payment of the balance of £30, reserving his action for the remainder: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses incurred both in this Court and the Inferior Court; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Russell; S. Campbell, S.S.C., Agent.—All. P. Robertson, A. Anderson; T. Sprot, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

16th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 220.—ANTOINE VIGNES, Pursuer, v. EDINBURGH and LEITH BANK, Defenders.

Deposit—Resitution—Bill of Exchange.—A bill deposited in a bank having been inadvertently delivered to a third party who had a partial interest in it—Held that the bank were bound to restore the bill to the depositor, or pay the full amount of the proceeds, without deducting the partial interest of the third party.

A bill for £60 at four months, drawn and accepted by certain parties at Tain, was indorsed by the acceptor to Donald Robertson, and by him to Antoine Vignes, hotel keeper in Edinburgh, who having put his own name on the back of it, carried it to the Edinburgh and Leith Bank for negotiation or discount. On the following day, Donald Robertson called at the bank, and being supposed to be the person who had left the bill, obtained delivery of it. Shortly after, in the course of the same day, Vignes called for the bill, and being asked what right he had to it? answered, that it belonged to him, and that the bank had no right to give it up to Robertson. Thereafter, a correspondence took place between Vignes and the bank,—the former threatening legal measures if the bill or its proceeds were not forthwith delivered to him, and the latter promising every effort to recover the bill, but denying liability for it under the circumstances. Robertson had sent off the bill to Tain for discount, and not being able to redeliver it, was incarcerated by the bank for non-delivery, under a decree to that effect which they had obtained against him. The bank then addressed a letter to Vignes, stating that Robertson had offered to pay the bill, under deduction of £18 of the proceeds, said to belong to him, and asking Vignes to say whether he consented to this arrangement. Vignes answered, that he had given instructions to his agent to raise the necessary action against the bank; "but as you now make the proposition of paying me the amount of the bill, with the exception of the £18, which you state Robertson claims, I have given directions to stay farther proceedings until I again hear from you, whether you will guarantee me against all farther claim on said bill, provided I agree to accept of the terms proposed by you; as, without your doing this, or delivering up the bill to me as I gave it to you, I have no security that the bill may not come against me again; and I must of course protect myself." The accountant of the bank replied,—"You must either consent to Robertson's proposal, or, on delivery of the bill, pay down the £18 you got; for I can give no guarantee whatever. By agreeing to the proposal now made by him, you are just in the same position as you would have been had the bill been discounted." Vignes offered, on getting up the bill in the same state as when he left it at the bank, to pay the £18 to Robertson, or to deposit it in the hands of a third party till the bill became due; but he, at the sametime, intimated his determination to execute his summons against the bank if the bill were not delivered on the following day,—adding, "the expenses incurred by me in the matter will, of course fall to be paid either by you or Robertson." The bank having declined to admit their liability for the expenses, but offered to do what they could "to recover the amount from him (Robertson) before liberating him," Vignes, thirteen days before the bill arrived at maturity, executed his summons, concluding against the bank for delivery of the bill as deposited, or its proceeds, with interest from the date of its becoming due, and also for "all expenses, loss and damage, which the pursuer has incurred, or may sustain" in consequence of the unwarrantable delivery of the bill to Robertson, together with the expenses of process.

The bill having arrived at maturity, and been duly retired by the acceptor, the bank pleaded—1. That as they had always been willing to pay the full amount of the pursuer's interest in the bill, the action was unnecessary and groundless: 2. That the conclusions of the action were irrelevant and untenable, (1.) as to the delivery of the bill, which the acceptor, who had paid it, was entitled to retain; (2.) as to payment of the full amount, in respect that to the interest of £18 of the proceeds the pursuer had no right whatever; (3.) as to damages, in respect that none had been sustained, or were relevantly averred; (4.) as to expenses, which ought, on the contrary, to be awarded to the defenders, "in respect that it is attributable to the duplicity, and otherwise blameable conduct, of the pursuer himself that any expenses have been incurred."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and thereafter made avizandum with the whole process, and having considered the same, in respect of the admission of the defenders in the defences, Finds them liable in payment to the pursuer of his full share and interest in the bill libelled on, with interest, and appoints a statement of the amount thereof to be given in: Quoad ultra, sustains the defences, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, subject to modification: Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The circumstances of this case are very peculiar. The pursuer, in the month of April 1840, left a bill in the Edinburgh and Leith Bank in St Andrew's Square, Edinburgh, drawn and accepted by persons at Tain, who indorsed it to Donald Robertson, who also indorsed it to the pursuer. It is said in the summons, that the pursuer's object was, that it should be retained in the bank in the ordinary way of business. It is admitted that Robertson had an interest in the bill to the extent of £18. It is stated by the bank, who are defenders, that the manager refused to discount it, and ordered it to be returned, and that, while it was in the hands of a clerk, a person, who appears to have been Robertson, the previous indorser, called for the proceeds of the bill in question, which he stated he left the day before; and, when it was found that there was such a bill, but that the manager had refused to discount it, it was given to Robertson, not doubting that he was the person who had left it the day before. It is stated by the bank, that, within half an hour afterwards, the pursuer called at the bank, and demanded the bill. A long investigation and correspondence took place afterwards, and, although the circumstances of the case are very extraordinary, the Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that there was any collusion betwixt the pursuer and Robertson; but it appears to him that the bank, in the correspondence which took place in the months of June and July, offered all that the pursuer was entitled to demand, viz., that the bill would be paid in the same manner as it would have been if the bank had discounted it.—(Process, 23, 24, 25, and 27.) The pursuer was not satisfied with this, but brought the present action, in which the defenders, after stating that the bill has been retired by the acceptor (defence, p. 4), tender the pursuer the full amount of his share of the bill, with interest, which they say they had repeatedly done before the action was raised, and in which they are confirmed by the correspondence. In these circumstances, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the defenders are entitled to some portion of the expenses incurred in defending this action."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Gillies.—The Lord Ordinary has very properly found the defenders liable in the full amount of the pursuer's interest in the bill, but he has at the same time found that they are not liable in the expenses of process. I have very great doubt of the soundness of this finding. Bankers must have not only honour and integrity, but also perfect accuracy, no less for their own sake than for the sake of their employers. Now, what happened here? The pursuer had a bill which was to arrive at maturity in about three months. He carried it to the bank, and they took the custody of it. There was thus an implied contract that he, and he alone, was to call for it and obtain delivery. The bank, therefore, are bound to restore it. If they could show that there was any gross fraud on the part of the pursuer, and that he was in league with Robertson, it would be a different matter; but this, though at one time insinuated, is not now alleged or suspected. In these circumstances, the bank were bound either to restore the document or its proceeds. The pursuer had nothing to do with the spuilzie by Robertson; and the bank were not entitled to make any stipulation with regard to it. They were custodiers, and all they had to do was simply to restore. Suppose a party, on leaving town, were to deposit £500 worth of plate with his banker, would it do for the banker, when he demanded it, to say, another person called and got it, and I protest against being held liable? I am clear that the pursuer is entitled to his expenses.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The bank were bound to restore the document, or pay the whole amount of it; but they offer only a part, and refuse to guarantee the pursuer against being ultimately made liable for more than he had received. He was entitled to this guarantee or delivery of the document; and I therefore think he was entitled to prevail in the action, and ought to receive his expenses.

The Lord President and Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses; but in respect that the matter relative to the restitution of the bill is at an end, find it unnecessary to dispose of the other conclusions of the libel."

Lord Ordinary, Murray.—Act. Inglis; William Wishart, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Macfarlane; Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, W.S., Agents.—Adv. Clerk.—[H.B.]

16th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 221.—ANTHONY MACTIER and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. SIR JAMES CARNEGIE, Bart., Defender,—Et à contra.

Property—Common—Declarator.

Special case. These actions were brought for the purpose of ascertaining the mutual boundaries of the estates of the parties, situated within the parishes of Banchory-Ternan, Durris and Strachan, and Mactier's right, as alleged, to possess a portion of land in common with the defender, which the latter alleged belonged exclusively to him. Sir James Carnegie moved the Lord Ordinary to find that Mactier

"is excluded, by his own titles, from having acquired by prescription, or from now claiming any common property or servitude along with the pursuer, in any part of the baronies of Strachan and Culpershaugh, situated not within the parishes of Banchory-Ternan and Durris, but within the parish of Strachan."

His Lordship refused the motion hoc statu, appending the following note to his interlocutor in the case, which sufficiently explains the circumstances of the case and the pleas of the parties:

"The Lord Ordinary was formerly of opinion, and decided that the defender is excluded, by his own titles, from claiming any common property in the lands conveyed to the pursuer in his (the pursuer's) titles. But the pursuer now wishes to advance a step farther, and to apply this principle by a finding that the whole baronies of Strachan and Culpershaugh are disposed to him, in so far as these baronies are in the parish of Strachan, and consequently, that the defender is excluded from claiming any common property or servitude over these.

"But these baronies are not disposed to the pursuer. His titles give him a right only to parts and portions of them, and the exception in the title of the defender is only of the 'parts and portions' formerly sold to the pursuer's author. It does not follow, therefore, that wherever there is a part of either of these baronies in the parish of Strachan, that part necessarily belongs to the pursuer."

On a reclaiming note the Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Rutherford, Currie; Graham and Anderson, W.S., Agents.—Alt. P. Robertson, H. J. Robertson; T. Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

17th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 222.—AGNES BOYD, Pursuer and Advocate, v. GEORGE KERR, Defender and Respondent.

Parent and Child—Filiation—Proof—Semiplena—Circumstances which were held insufficient to establish a case of semiplena probatio.

Agnes Boyd brought an action against George Kerr, concluding that, as the father of a natural child which she had borne to him, he should be decreed to make payment of aliment and inlying expenses. The defender's judicial declaration having been taken, the Sheriff-substitute found the admissions contained in it sufficient to establish a case of semiplena probatio; but this interlocutor having been appealed to the Sheriff, was recalled, and a proof ordered. It appeared that on two occasions, when the parties met in the house of a Mrs Jardine, who keeps a small shop in the village of Cleuchbrae, they had been for about a quarter of an hour together in a box-bed in a corner of the shop, in presence of Mrs Jardine, her daughter, and a neighbour. The defender denied that on these occasions, or any other, he had had criminal intercourse with the pursuer, and maintained that he had acted only in frolic; while the pursuer, without averring that the intercourse had then taken place, condescended on other instances in which she averred it had.

The Sheriff having found that the proof had failed to establish a case of semiplena, the pursuer advocated.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"11th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process,—repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits to the Sheriff simpliciter: Finds the advocate liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The case depends entirely on the construction which is put upon the parties being in the bed; for there is no other fact. If it be supposed that they were there for the purpose, or to the effect insinuated, rather than averred, by the advocate, the sufficiency of the semiplena probatio is unquestionable. If it be supposed that that was a mere frolic, and that it took place in circumstances which excluded the idea of any thing else, the insufficiency of the proof is equally clear. The last view is the one which the Lord Ordinary thinks is the most reconcileable to the truth."

The pursuer reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Sandford, Brown; Charles G. Reid, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Mure; Joseph Mitchell, W.S., Agent.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

18th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 223.—POOR ANNA MARIA BROWNE, Pursuer, v. ROBERT BURNS, Defender.

Husband and Wife—Proof—Statute 6 and 7 Will. IV.—In Consistorial causes, the proof must be led before a Commissary-Sheriff.

In a declarator of marriage (the parties being resident in Dumfries) the Lord Ordinary, "in respect the pursuer issuing in forma pauperis," granted commission to the Sheriff-depute of Dumfriesshire, whom failing, to his substitute, to take the proof; but on a reclaiming note, the Court altered, and found that, in terms of the Statute, the proof could only proceed before the Commissary-Sheriff, or one or other of them.

22d June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 224.—WILLIAM and DAVID STEWART, Suspenders, v. DAVID FERGUSON, Charger.

Reference to Oath—Suspension and Interdict—Process—Circumstances in which a note of suspension and interdict against a poiding for feu-duties having been presented without caution or consignation, in which the suspender referred the question in dispute, which was in regard to whether or not a piece of ground was conveyed by a certain feu-right, to the oath of the charger, it was passed on juratory caution; and thereafter, without going into the reference, the suspenders having raised a declarator in regard to the matter in question, the Court sisted the process of suspension, on condition of the suspenders paying over to the charger the rents of the subjects feued out by the charger to the suspenders, leviable during the period embraced in the charge and subsequently, as due.

See ante, Vol. XIII. p. 292. The suspenders feued from the charger certain subjects belonging to him at the Seagate of Dundee, but it came to be a question, whether the agreement comprehended a stripe of ground which was at times wholly or partially covered by the sea on the south boundary. The suspenders averred that it had been claimed by other parties; and, on the ground that it was about to be evicted, they refused to pay the feu-duty which they had stipulated for the whole subjects, and accordingly presented a note of suspension against the superior's charge, but it was refused, in respect of want of sufficient caution. A second note of suspension was refused for the same reason. A poiding having been executed by the charger against one of the suspenders, a third note of suspension was presented, praying for interdict. Neither caution nor consignation was offered, but the suspender tendered a reference to the oath of the charger of the point in dispute. The charger, however, without declining the reference, pleaded that this course was incompetent, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, 24th December 1838, and that the terms of the written contract of feu could not be controlled by a reference to oath. Thereafter, the Lord Ordinary allowed the suspenders to amend their note, "to the effect of inserting an offer of juratory caution; farther, allows them at the same time to state in a minute the precise terms and extent of the reference which they propose to make to the charger's oath." The suspenders amended their note as suggested by the Lord Ordinary, who then made avizandum to the Court, when their Lordships passed the note (see ante, Vol. XIII. p. 292,) on juratory caution, and repelled the plea of the charger. The parties disagreed as to the grounds which the Court had taken in passing the note; but the import, as it appeared to the Lord Ordinary, is stated in the note to the interlocutor of his Lordship in this branch of the case.

Thereafter, the suspenders brought an action of declarator for the purpose of determining whether the stripe of ground in question had been feued out to them, and to reduce and set aside the same on the ground of fraud and misrepresentation, in case it should be held that it was not so conveyed; and they pleaded—1. That payment of the ground-annuals charged for cannot be exacted from the complainers, except on the footing that they have received from the charger a clear and unquestionable right and title to the whole subjects in dispute, including as well the houses and yard in the Seagate of Dundee, as the space or stripe of ground extending south thereof. 2. The complainers' right and title to the space or stripe of ground extending to the south of the Seagate, having not only been called in question by third parties, but being also denied and disputed by the charger himself, the ground-annuals referred to cannot be exacted till at least the complainers' right and title have been fully acknowledged and established; and there being now in dependence an action of declarator and reduction at the complainers' instance against the charger, in which the whole questions in dispute have been competently raised, and may be competently tried and determined, this process of suspension and interdict ought either to be conjoined with that action, or sisted till the issue of it. 3. The complainers are not bound by the reference to oath which was offered by them in the Bill-Chamber, and the charger is not entitled now to insist on the reference being gone into: (1.) The reference was offered merely to induce the charger not to oppose the note of suspension and interdict, and with the view of bringing the point in dispute at once to issue, without any protracted or expensive litigation: (2.) But the charger made the most strenuous opposition to the note of suspension and interdict: (3.) He not only did not accede to, or accept of, the proposed reference to oath, but on the contrary, he rejected it, and denied and disputed its competency: And, (4.) the reference to oath was not sustained, but the note of suspension and interdict was passed, and has come into Court independently altogether of the reference.

The charger, who stated that he had never declined the reference, pleaded—1. That the suspenders having concluded in their note of suspension solely for a reference to oath of the disputed questions between them and the charger, and offered, in gremio of their statement of facts, to refer these disputed matters to oath, and having thereafter, and after the charger had lodged answers, and had intimated his determination to oppose in every way the passing of the note of suspension, lodged a minute of reference to the charger's oath, which, along with the note, was reported to the Court; and the note having been passed by the Court, containing the prayer above mentioned, the suspenders cannot now retract the reference to oath, or alter the conclusions of the note of suspension; and, 2. The reference to oath prayed for in the note of suspension is exclusive of every other mode of proof.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“ 20th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, as well in this process of suspension and interdict as in the separate process of declarator and reduction presently depending between the parties, and having made avizandum;—In the special circumstances of the case, and more particularly in respect—(1.) That the reference to the charger's oath, as originally proposed in the note of suspension, has never been either sustained by the Court, or its terms adjusted and settled between the parties, the charger, on the contrary, opposing the reference as wholly incompetent: (2.) That, more especially, at passing the note of suspension, there was no condition attached to their Lordships' deliverance which could render it incumbent upon the suspenders absolutely to abide by the said proposal: (3.) That, moreover, the said proposal having at first been made merely with a view to obviate objections which might otherwise (as was supposed) have lain to the competency of the suspension, and to enable the suspenders to 'have the note passed and interdict granted without caution or consignment,'—whereas the competency of the suspension was eventually sustained (so far as appears from the terms of the judgment) irrespective of the reference, and on the distinct and separate ground 'of this being a bill of suspension and interdict,'—and the note itself was passed, not without caution or consignment, as, according to its original prayer and the usual practice, it would have been had the reference been sustained, but only upon juratory caution,—there was no longer the same practical necessity for a reference; but, on the contrary, there were sufficient grounds, independently thereof, to warrant the passing of the note to the effect of trying the important question that had arisen between the parties: (4.) That at all events, when, with the original grounds of suspension, there came to be combined the circumstance of a depending process of declarator and reduction, and all the additional grounds set forth in this latter process, and substantially imported into and adopted in the record of the suspension, there could no longer, in any view, be a question as to the sufficiency of the suspenders' right to get into a discussion of the matters in dispute, independently of any reference: And finally, (5.) That until the issue of the declarator and reduction, it cannot be positively assumed how far there is any, or what available contract between the parties; and so it might be premature, in hoc statu, to enforce execution of that contract in the sense contended for by the charger, but disputed and repudiated by the suspenders: Finds that the suspenders are not bound to abide by, or repeat their proposal to refer their case to the oath of the charger: Finds, on the other hand, that they are entitled to have the said process conjoined with the other process of declarator and reduction, to the effect of their maintaining and making good in both their case, as set forth in the two several records, and that omni habili modo quo de jure: Conjoins the processes accordingly. Quoad ultra, appoints the processes (as now conjoined) to be enrolled, in order to the pronouncing of such other deliverance therein as may be necessary for advancing the same: And in the meanwhile reserves, hinc inde, all questions of expenses.

“ Note.—Had this case been now for the first time submitted in the shape of a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber, with the relative process of declarator and reduction in dependence; and had such a note been presented upon an offer of juratory caution, and entirely free from any question of competency connected with the refusal of the previous note, there could not, it is thought, have been a moment's hesitation in passing the note, although not accompanied with any reference to the oath of the charger.

“ But now that the objection originally taken to the competency of the suspension has been repelled, and that juratory caution has been found, this does seem, as to all practical considerations affecting the suspender's right to withdraw the offer to refer, to be still substantially the true position of the case.

“ If, indeed, the charger could make out that the suspenders stood in any way barred from withdrawing the reference, there might be more to be said on his part. But the case is quite otherwise: For (1.) there never was here any completed reference at all: And (2.) if there had, the suspenders would still (under such circumstances as here occur) have been entitled, according to all the authorities, to have resiled; the only question connected with their so doing being one as to expenses; and this the interlocutor reserves. (See Chalmers, 18th February 1813; Bennie, 28th January 1832.)

"As to the charger's argument, that the suspenders—having originally presented their note upon the footing of a reference—are not now entitled to take different ground, it is thought that the rule of practice given effect to in Binny, 26th January 1836, affords a sufficient answer. And see also Nicholson, 23d November 1810.

"There only remains the plea that the Court must be held to have passed the note of suspension upon condition that the suspenders should abide by the reference. But the judgment is silent as to any such condition; and indeed, it could not have been otherwise. For when that judgment was pronounced, the charger was still resisting the reference as utterly incompetent, and the note, as passed, left it of course open to try this point as well as the rest. It never could have been intended to tie up the suspenders' hands and leave the charger free.

"It may just be noticed, that in addition to the juratory caution on which the note was passed, the charger is at this moment in the possession and enjoyment of the entire present rental of the property in dispute. The suspenders, on the contrary, are drawing nothing, while, according to their averments on record, they have laid out very considerable expenditure in buildings and other meliorations. The charger, therefore, has nothing to complain of if the question is to be tried at all. On the other hand, it would be a very grievous hardship to the suspenders, if they really have a case capable of being made out in evidence, that they should be compelled to stake all upon their adversary's oath, and this merely because the embarrassments arising out of this very transaction had led them at first into a position of technical difficulty from their inability to find the caution offered in support of the earlier Bill-Chamber proceedings."

On a reclaiming note for the charger, the Court

"Recal the interlocutor complained of, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to sist the process of suspension, on condition that the rents actually drawn by the suspenders since Whitsunday 1839 inclusive, and also the amount of the rental to be fixed as aftermentioned, of such houses and property as may be beneficially occupied by the suspenders, be paid over to the charger, under deduction of any sums that may have been paid to account by the suspenders applicable to the period in question,—the money consigned in bank (if any) being upliftable, and paid as part thereof: And farther, to appoint the sums drawn as rents to be paid within three weeks, under certification that if not paid within that period, the letters will be found orderly proceeded: And farther, to authorise and remit to Mr Christopher Kerr, one of the town-clerks of Dundee, to fix a fair rental for such houses or other property as may be beneficially occupied by the suspenders; and to ordain the amount of the same also to be paid within three weeks after such rental shall be fixed by Mr Kerr; and also on the condition that all future rents drawn from the property, and the amount of the rental so fixed by Mr Kerr for future years, shall also be paid over to the charger periodically as due: Reserving all questions of expenses."

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—For Suspenders, Macfarlane; Greig and Morton. W.S., Agents.—For Charger, Moir; John Murdoch, S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G. D. F.]

22d June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 225.—ALEXANDER MORRISON and NEIL M'CALLUM, Advocators, v. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, Respondent.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Proof—Condition—Circumstances in which held, on a proof, that a landlord had intimated to a tenant possessing a croft on a verbal lease, the particular terms on which he was willing the tenant should remain, and that these terms had not been rejected by the tenant within the period allowed for that purpose by the landlord, and therefore found by the Court, that the tenant must, by continuing in the farm for another year, be held to have remained on the terms stipulated by the landlord.

Special case of proof. The advocators, and four other persons, had been for many years crofters, possessing separate crofts on the respondent's property without written leases,—the crofts being possessed separately, and the cattle belonging to three of the crofters having right to pasture in common in one of two parks, and the cattle belonging to the remaining three of the crofters in another park. Each of the six crofters had pastured two cows and a horse; but this having been considered by the landlord an overstock for the parks, he sent for the crofters before the middle of March 1839, and stated to them separately, that the terms on which he would allow them to remain for the year from the ensuing Whitsunday, were, that each crofter was to part with his horse at the then ensuing term of Whitsunday, and was to have no right to a waygoing crop at Whitsunday 1840, in consideration of which a proportionate deduction of rent was to be allowed; and in stating these conditions to the crofters, the respondent gave them eight days to consider, and directed them to return within that time if they had any objections, and said he would not allow them to remain on any other terms. The advocators, however, did not intimate within eight days that they would not agree to these terms.

The respondent presented an application to the Sheriff of Argyleshire, praying his Lordship

"to interdict, prohibit, and discharge them from keeping any horses, along with their cows, on the common pasture in the said possession of Kilduskland, in violation of the foresaid agreement, and failing of their instantly removing them, to grant warrant to the petitioners, or any person to be employed by them, for doing so; and upon again advising this petition, with or without answers, to declare the said interdict perpetual; and also find the said Alexander Morrison and Neil M'Callum liable to the petitioners in the sum of £10 Sterling each, less or more, in name of damages, or reserve action for the same."

After a conjunct probation, the Sheriff granted the prayer of this application; but on an advocacy, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and thereafter made avizandum with the whole process, finds, in matter of fact, primo, That the two advocators and four other persons had been for many years crofters, possessing separate crofts on the respondent's property without written leases,—the crofts being possessed separately, and the cattle belonging to three of the crofters having right to pasture in common in one of two parks, and the cattle belonging to the remaining three of the crofters in another park: Secundo, That each of the six crofters pastured two cows and a horse each: Tertio, That this was considered by the landlord an overstock for the parks, and that he, before the middle of March 1839, sent for the crofters, and stated to them separately that the terms on which he would allow them to remain for the year from the ensuing Whitsunday were, that each crofter was to part with his horse at the then ensuing term of Whitsunday, and was to have no right to a waygoing crop at Whitsunday 1840, in consideration of which a proportionate deduction of rent was to be allowed: Quarto, That the pursuer, in stating these conditions separately to the crofters, gave them eight days to consider them, and directed them to return within that time, if they had any objections to state against them, and said he would not allow them to remain on any other terms: Quinto, That there is no proof that at this time the pursuer said any thing about removing the crofters: Sexto, That there is no evidence that any precise sum was stated as the deduction to be made from the rent, or that the advocates at any time expressed, verbally or otherwise, their agreement to the landlord's proposal, though it is proved that certain of the crofters, at least Robert Peffers, the second witness, went back and expressly agreed to the landlord's terms: Septimo, That, according to the recollection of the witnesses, the eight days elapsed before the period of warning had expired: Octavo, That the pursuer's gardener called on the advocates at their houses, and asked them to sign what he calls 'the agreement,' which they refused doing. 'That this might have taken place in the month of April, and after the period for warning had expired.' Finds, in matter of law, primo, That where tenants possess lands under a verbal agreement, any new lease, differing as to possession, way-going crop, or amount of rent from the former verbal tack, must be expressly agreed to, verbally or otherwise, or the former agreement will be held to subsist: Secundo, Finds that in this case there is no evidence that the advocates ever expressed their assent to the new terms of lease proposed by the pursuer: Therefore advocates the cause; alters the interlocutors complained of; recalls the interdicts which have been granted; dismisses the application to the Sheriff, and decerns: Finds expenses due, and appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Notes.—It is with great reluctance that in this small matter the Lord Ordinary has come to an opinion different from that of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, for whose judgments he has the greatest respect; but he feels himself obliged to decide the case regarding a trifling possession upon the same principles of law as he would do if the rent was considerable, and the crop and grazings large.

"It has been held that the landlord having announced the terms on which he would allow the possession to be held, which were acquiesced in by others, and no special dissent being proved by the advocates, though they were allowed a reasonable time to do so, they must be held to have agreed by their failure to object, and that there was therefore a concluded agreement by this failure to announce dissent. The Lord Ordinary apprehends that no agreement with regard to land can be concluded without an express assent of some sort or other. There is no proof of any assent whatever here on the part of the advocates, and as the statement was made by the landlord to the tenants separately, what others did, did not affect the advocates. The landlord's witness, his gardener, says, that when he brought what he calls 'the agreement' to sign, the advocates refused to do so. The Lord Ordinary has given the landlord the benefit of what is rather matter of inference than of positive proof, according to the evidence even of this single witness, upon that point, that it was then too late to bring an action of removing. But 'the agreement' might have been equally brought at the end of the week on the advocates not giving their consent then, as it appears the witness Peffers did. The landlord has alleged in the proceedings in the Inferior Court, that he had told the advocates that if they did not state objections he would hold them to agree; but he has not proved that by any of his witnesses, even by his gardener Niven. He, when interrogated under a leading question, whether he 'understood from what passed on the said occasion that the pursuer, Mr Campbell, had generally told all these crofters that they would get a week to consider of his terms, and if they objected to them, to come and intimate so to him within that period?' Depones that the deponent decidedly understood so. But the question is not put to him whether the landlord told them that he would hold them to agree if they stated no objections. It may, however, be maintained, that when the landlord said, as he did to Peffers, that he would agree to no other terms, and gave them a week to state their objections, it was to be inferred that if they did not state objections they would be held to agree. That is only proved by Peffers in his own case; and he went back to give his assent.

"As the law has hitherto been understood between landlord and tenant, even if the landlord had proved his averment, that he told the advocates that if they did not object in a week, he would consider them to have agreed—That would not convert a failure to come back into an agreement. The agreement must be direct, and concluded on the one side as well as on the other. Neither landlord nor tenant can singly lay down a new law on the matter, and say, if you do not DISAGREE, I will hold you as AGREEING. The case might be different if there were any proof that the advocates had agreed to this, and said that if they did not come back to object, then the landlord might consider them as agreeing. They might then be said to have agreed that their not objecting should be held, after the lapse of eight days, a consent. But there is no evidence of any assent of any sort on the part of the advocates, or that they did any thing but hear what the landlord said, and leave the room, and went away. It is not proved that they gave any token of assent at any time. The pursuer's witness, Niven, who, after having had a 'considerable conversation' as to the new arrangements with the advocates, after they had seen the landlord, depones, 'that neither of the respondents stated to the deponent that they had agreed to the terms proposed by Mr Campbell, the pursuer.'

"It has been argued, that the advocates were not in bona fide to allow the time for bringing a process of removing to expire without declaring to the landlord that they did not agree to the terms which he proposed. If such a plea of mala fides were sustained, the Court would never have pronounced the judgment they did in the case of Gordon v. Bryden (13th January 1803), and in many other cases. In that case, the tenant appears to have acted in a manner totally inconsistent with good faith. Having received an intimation by letter of the new lease, to which he sent no answer, he showed the farm to the future tenant, sold a part of his stock, and dismissed his servants; which were all positive acts on the part of Bryden, tending to mislead the landlord and the person to whom the farm had been let. But the Lord Ordinary has not been able to discover any evidence in this case which proves that the advocates were in mala fide, or did any act tending to mislead the landlord. In order to make out that view of this case, Niven, the gardener, was examined, to state what passed privately between him and the landlord, from which he inferred that the landlord would have brought a removing, if he had believed that the advocates objected to his terms. But what passed between him (the landlord) and his servant cannot be evidence against the advocates, unless it was communicated to them; and the mere failure to come back at the given time to state objections, though it might be disobedient, perhaps, and disrespectful, cannot, without some previous agreement on their part, be considered as either an act of agreement or of mala fides."

The respondent reclaimed, when the Court, holding that the circumstances above set forth were amply instructed by the proof,

"Find, in point of law, primo, That it was incumbent on the advocates, possessing from year to year on a verbal lease, if they did not agree to the terms stated to them as aforesaid, to make intimation of such resolution to the landlord within the eight days allowed to them for consideration as above: Secundo, That as no such intimation was made by the advocates within the eight days so allowed to them for consideration, they must be taken and held to have agreed to, and acquiesced in, the terms and conditions stated to them as aforesaid, by the pursuer, as the only terms on which they could be allowed to remain for another year in possession of their crofts: Therefore, repel the reasons of advocacy; adhere to the interlocutors of the Sheriff, so far as they continued the interdict granted against the defenders on the 3d of June 1839, and 19th of March 1840; and remit to the Sheriff simpliciter: Find the defenders liable in expenses in this Court, as well as in the Inferior Court, as the latter are already taxed and modified; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Murray.—Act. Rutherford, W. E. Ayton; John Blair, W.S., Agent.—Alt. C. Robertson; T. S. Paton, S.S.C., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G. D. F.]

22d June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 226.—ANDREW LOUSON (Craik Senior's Trustee), Advocator, v. JAMES CRAIK, Junior, Respondent.

Sale—Stoppage in transitu—Cautionary Obligation—Bankrupt
 —A senior requested A junior to order from a mercantile company a quantity of goods to be sent by them to his (A senior's) premises. This was agreed to, on A junior accepting a bill along with A senior for the price, and the goods were sent by the common carrier, who, owing to an error of the clerk in addressing them, left them in possession of A junior. On the bankruptcy of A senior, his trustee claimed them from A junior, as part of the bankrupt estate, but A junior refused to deliver, on the ground that, as guarantee, he was entitled to retain possession till freed of his cautionary obligation. The Sheriff, in an application for delivery, held that A junior had not acquired the goods by any valid title, and therefore, that he could not retain them in relief of his guarantee, and accordingly decerned against him in the application for delivery; and the Court, in an advocacy, affirmed the Sheriff's judgment.

James Craik, senior, residing in Forfar, requested his son, the respondent, who also resided there, to purchase on his (the father's) account, from Messrs Aberdeen, Gordon and Company, of Montrose, a quantity of yarn of a particular description, to be delivered by them at his, Craik senior's, premises in Forfar. The respondent, who admitted the terms of this request, accordingly performed the commission, and Messrs Aberdeen, Gordon and Company, agreed to the same, on condition of the son becoming security for the value. The respondent interposed his credit to the sellers by accepting a bill along with his father, at four months, for the price. The sellers despatched the goods by the common carrier, with the intention, it was said, of being delivered, according to orders, to James Craik, senior, but, owing to some mistake of the clerk, the goods were addressed to Craik, junior, instead of Craik, senior, in consequence of which the carrier left them in the custody of the son, who took possession, though, as admitted by him on the record, he had not ordered them from Messrs Aberdeen, Gordon and Company, on his own account.

A few days after the purchase of the yarns, Craik, senior, was sequestrated, when Louison, his trustee, demanded the goods from Craik, junior, on the ground that they were his father's, and were vested in him, the trustee, as part of the bankrupt stock. On refusal to deliver, the trustee presented an application to the Sheriff of Forfar to enforce the demand; but the respondent, who admitted the preceding statement, contended that, as guarantee, he had a right to retain the goods, and to stop them in transitu, by the same title that the sellers themselves could have done; and further, that he was entitled to keep possession till relieved of his guarantee.

The Sheriff-substitute found that the respondent had no legal title to the goods, and had no right to apply them in relief of his cautionary obligation, and therefore ordained him to make delivery to the trustee.

The following note was added by the Sheriff-substitute:

"The bankrupt, Craik senior, asked the defender, his son, to purchase some yarns for him. Neither of them seems to have had any intention that the defender, in making the purchase, should incur any responsibility for the price, or derive any emolument from the transaction.

"The defender accordingly bought the yarns in question for the bankrupt, and by the bargain, these were to be delivered to him by the sellers; the yarns were not to pass through the defender's hands, and he was not, in the character of agent for his father, to have any concern in the matter after concluding the bargain. From that time the defender's character of agent in this transaction ceased to exist.

"The price was payable four months after the delivery of the yarns to the bankrupt, and it so happened that the sellers demanded security for payment of the price. The defender of his own accord became that security. The stipulation for security shows, that both the sellers and the defender held that the defender was under no responsibility for the price in his character of agent for his father, and that his responsibility for the price rested solely on his express obligation as cautioner therefor.

"After the bargain was completed, the only character therefore which the defender held in the matter was that of cautioner for the price. The sellers immediately forwarded the yarn to the bankrupt, and while these were in transitu to him, the defender, without any authority from the bankrupt or sellers, took possession of the yarns 'as guarantee for his father,' and still retains them.

"The ruling question in the case therefore is,—Had the defender, as cautioner for payment of the price, right so to take possession of the yarns in relief of his cautionary obligation? It appears to the Sheriff-substitute, that in judging of that question, the defender falls to be held as standing in the same position as any other person who had become security for the price of the yarns, and he thinks that the defender had no right to lay hold of the yarns, and has no right to keep them in relief of his cautionary obligation.

"If the Sheriff-substitute be right in this, then the yarns fall to be held as still in transitu to the bankrupt as at the period the defender took possession of them, and must now be delivered to the petitioner as trustee for the bankrupt's creditors,—the sellers having interposed no objection to their being so."

The judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was reversed, on a reclaiming petition, by the Sheriff, who stated his views in the following note:

"The parties are here placed in very opposite situations. The pursuer's plea is directed ad lucrum captandum at the expense of the defender, while the plea of the latter is directed de damno evitando. The pursuer proposes to take possession of the yarns in question, and to pay some small fractional part of the sum at which they were purchased, and to apply the surplus as a gain to Craik's creditors, leaving the defender the joint debtor for the price, who gets no share of the goods, to make up the difference to the vendors. Such a plea would require to be well founded in strict law; for it is clearly at variance with equity and natural justice.

"There seems to be no room to doubt as to the precise matter of fact which gives rise to the question.

"The goods were purchased by the defender from Aberdeen, Gordon and Company, for the use of his father, the bankrupt, and to whom they were to be delivered. But as a condition of the bargain, the defender was required to grant bill along with his father for the price, and thereby became a joint debtor with his father.

"The goods were sent off by the vendors from Montrose, by the carrier to Forfar, along with a note or invoice of the goods, but which, by mistake, was addressed to James Craik, junior, the defender. The goods were accordingly brought to his warehouse, instead of being carried to the warehouse of the bankrupt; and he took delivery of them.

"The bargain is said by the pursuer to have been made 'on or about 5th August,' and it is further said, that immediately after the purchase (which affords no precise date), the goods were sent from Montrose to Forfar, but the precise day of their arrival there is not given; and finally, it is stated by the pursuer in his petition, that on the 21st August the estates of James Craik, senior, were sequestrated by the Court of Session. The pursuer, as the trustee, now claims the goods from the joint debtor (who holds them in relief and security of his obligation to Aberdeen, Gordon and Company), leaving the defender liable to pay the price to the vendors, with the power of ranking on the bankrupt estate for his relief, by which he must be a considerable loser.

"The equity of the case is very clearly with the defender, but it remains to be inquired whether he has also law on his side.

"The defender being in the possession of the goods, must have a title to retain possession for indemnification of the obligation which he came under to the vendors, unless the pursuer can show that he has a better title to insist for delivery than the defender has to retain possession. The main question, therefore, turns on the title of the pursuer to deprive the defender of the possession of the goods which he has acquired, and which he retains for his indemnification of the obligation he undertook for the bankrupt.

"In considering that question, it is important to recollect, that the bargain between the vendors and the bankrupt never was completed by delivery to him, or to any one acting for him, of the goods sold (for the pursuer has in his pleadings utterly disclaimed the notion that the son, in taking possession of the goods, was acting as the mandatory of his father), and consequently the bankrupt at no period had a right of property in the goods (ius in re), but a mere personal claim on the vendors for delivery. In the meantime, two very important circumstances take place: Firstly, by a pure accident the goods are allowed to go into the defender's warehouse; and secondly, at that very moment the affairs of Craik, senior, must have been in the very worst state, as in a few days thereafter preparations were made to sequestrate his estates, and which took place on 21st August.

"How soon the defender came to be alarmed regarding the solvency of his father it does not appear, but it is only reasonable to hold, that nothing short of a perfect belief that his father was insolvent and unable to pay the price, can account for his availing himself of the accidental possession of the goods, and retaining them instead of forwarding them to his father.

"If the vendors had entertained the same suspicions, they would have had it in their power to have stopped the goods in transitu, and the subsequent bankruptcy would have justified them in doing so. For though the defender remained solvent, yet their bargain being with the defender and his father jointly, the insolvency of either of them would have authorised such a measure, and one of the points maintained by the defender is, that being bound to the vendors for the price, and as he had a right, on paying the price, to demand an assignation to all their rights, he might lawfully stop delivery in transitu, in order to prevent loss, which would have been consequent to him on Craik's bankruptcy, if the goods had gone into his possession. The defender, in support of that view, and for showing that, to a certain extent, he had a power over the goods on the supposition of the father being insolvent, has maintained that he might have prevented (had he been in due time apprised of the true state of his father's affairs) the vendors from sending off the goods from Montrose, or he might himself have taken possession of the goods at Montrose and brought them with him to Forfar, and kept them there till he was satisfied that his father was able to pay the price and relieve him of his cautionary obligation; and it appears to the Sheriff that there is much in the plea, that under the circumstances that occurred, the defender might have stopped delivery in the hands of the carrier. Nor was it requisite, as the pursuer so strongly contends for, that the defender should put on the record an averment that his father was actually insolvent, or vergens ad inopiam, at the moment he stopped the delivery; as it could not be necessary to state as an averment that which never could be made the subject of proof, viz., the precise opinion which he formed of the state of his father's affairs at the moment of the arrival of the goods in Forfar, in respect of which he did not forward them to his father. It was enough that he thought he had grounds for doing so, which he could afterwards justify; and the fact of the father's bankruptcy within a few days thereafter, would have been a full justification, if he had taken such a step, by stopping the goods in the hands of the carrier. But the defender has, as a separate plea, maintained that the goods having come into his possession, though by an accident or blunder on the part of the vendors, he must have a right to retain them till he obtained himself indemnified or secured against the obligation he came under for his father; and the Sheriff is of opinion that that plea is well founded.

"The title to seek delivery of goods to which the bankrupt never had more than a personal claim, cannot be better than the title of the defender to retain possession in security of his claim of relief against the bankrupt. Both claims may be equitable in the abstract; but the pursuer, who seeks equity, must give equity, and the possession is with the defender.

"The pursuer has argued that it was not 'a lawful possession,' as it was part of the contract with the vendors that the goods should be sent to the bankrupt. But the defender did not acquire possession of them by any scheme of fraud, but by one of those accidents which sometimes occur in business. It could not, therefore, be called an 'unlawful' possession, though it is very true that it inferred an obligation on the defender to forward the goods to his father, provided he had had no claim of relief against his father in regard to the price, for which the defender had bound himself as a joint debtor along with his father. But having, without fraud, come into the possession of the goods, and with which he was materially connected, as a joint debtor for the price, he was entitled, if he believed, and could afterwards show that his father was insolvent, to avail himself of the accident that had occurred; because, in retaining the yarns till his father either satisfied him he was in good circumstances, or, on the supposition, gave him security that he would be relieved of his obligation to the vendors, he was taking no undue advantage of his father; and if his father could not have forced the goods out of his possession, without giving the defender satisfaction in one or other of these two ways, it seems difficult to see how the trustee should now be in a better situation than the bankrupt before his estates were sequestrated. Nor is it unimportant to observe that it is not averred by the pursuer that any demand for delivery of the yarns was ever made by James Craik, senior, from the period of their arrival in Forfar. On the contrary, he appears to have acquiesced in the right of his son to retain them for his own indemnification. The first claim made for delivery came from the trustee."

The trustee presented a note of advocacy against this latter judgment on various grounds, but principally founded on the following pleas:—The respondent having admittedly obtained possession of the yarns, by directing the carrier (who ought, in conformity with an agreement to which the respondent was himself a party, to have delivered them to his father, and who by mere accident stopped at the respondent's warehouse,) to unload and give delivery to him, without any authority whatever, must be held to have taken possession of the goods improperly, and was bound to have immediately delivered them to his father, or the parties in his right. The assumption of the Sheriff, that the respondent obtained possession by a mere accident, and without any active interference on his part, is erroneous. A mere cautioner for the price of goods has no right to stop these goods in transitu: Bell, I. 225. Besides, it was essential to the validity of any claim of retention that the goods sought to be retained should have come into possession of the party pleading retention by a just title. As the apprehension of the goods on the part of the respondent on their way to his father's warehouse, was unwarrantable, no right founded on possession of these goods so acquired could be set up against the demand for delivery to the parties in right of the goods. The view of the Sheriff, that the respondent's case was supported by equity, was also erroneous; because the respondent was attempting, by reason of his own improper and unauthorised apprehension of the goods, to establish a preference in his own favour over the general creditors of the bankrupt.

Answered—1. The yarns in dispute not having been delivered to James Craik, senior, they never formed part of his estate. Neither he nor his trustee ever acquired the property or jus in re of these articles. 2. There being no proof that the carrier was instructed to deliver the goods to the bankrupt, but, on the contrary, it being averred by the advocator that the note accompanying the goods was addressed to the respondent, it was perfectly lawful for him, who had made the bargain and had joined in the bill for the price, to take delivery and possession of the goods. 3. It was in the circumstances perfectly lawful and competent for Aberdeen, Gordon and Company, to send the goods to the respondent, and thus to make him (who had made the bargain, and was answerable for the price,) the medium of delivery to his father the purchaser. 4. By the possession of the goods so obtained, the respondent was enabled and entitled to avail himself of the privilege of retaining them in security of the price for which he was liable. 5. No proof having been adduced, and no allegation having been made, that the respondent's father, between the time when the yarns were received by the respondent and the date of his own sequestration, applied to the respondent for delivery of the goods, it is to be presumed that he was at this period conscious of insolvency, and would not have received, or been justified in receiving the goods in question into his stock, had they been offered to him. 6. A cautioner, by the law of Scotland, is entitled to have communicated or assigned to him the rights of the creditor as against the principal debtor; and upon the principle of the vendor's right to stop in transitu, the cautioner for the price, as an equitable vendor, is entitled to stop the goods in transitu, or to retain them, if, in passing from the seller, they come into his hands before final delivery to the purchaser. 7. The advocator's demand in this case is eminently opposed to equity, according to the rule nemo debet locupletari damno alterius, in respect he is seeking to enrich the creditors for whom he acts, by inflicting a corresponding loss upon the respondent, by requiring from him delivery of goods, the price of which the advocator is not to pay, but which must be paid for by the respondent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"12th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and made a vizandum—Sustains the reasons of advocacy, and remits the cause to the Sheriff, with instructions to recal his interlocutor of 21st January 1841, dismiss the appeal against his substitute's judgments of 10th December 1840, and 7th January 1841, and decern of new in terms of said judgment, and decerns: Finds the respondent liable in the expenses incurred in this Court; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report, and decerns.

"Note.—The Sheriff-substitute seems to have taken the sound view of this case. And so far as the respondent defends himself, 1. Upon his right to stop in transitu, which implies that the yarns in dispute had never become the property of the bankrupt; and 2. Upon his right to retain in security and relief of his liability as cautioner, which, on the other hand, implies that the yarns are the bankrupt's property (for otherwise they could not be subject to retention for his debts), the argument is contradictory and incompatible.

"If the yarns are to be dealt with as still in transitu, the case against the respondent is very clear. For as a mere surety for the price of the goods, he had not in his own right any privilege of stoppage (1 Bell's Com., 225, and 6 East, 371, ibi cit.), and as in right of the sellers, while there is no sufficient averment on the record to establish that even these parties themselves would at the time, and under the circumstances in which delivery was made, have been entitled to stop in transitu, there is still less any thing to show that the respondent was substituted in their place.

"The case is not less clear as regards the plea of retention; for in this view, 1. It must be held, either that the transitus was at an end, or that the power to stop in transitu did not exist, so as to make way for the yarns coming into the respondent's hands as the bankrupt's property; and, 2. The question would then come to be, whether the respondent legally obtained possession of them, as being the bankrupt's property; for if he had no good original title of possession, he could have no proper right to retain. Now, in reference to this aspect of the case, it is admitted, 1. That while the yarns were purchased by the respondent as his father's agent, they were not to pass through his hands in the delivery; but, on the contrary, it was agreed or understood that the said yarns should be delivered by the seller to the said James Craik, senior (the respondent's father), at his warehouse or place of business in Forfar (answer to cond. art. 2); and 2. That the yarns having been despatched by a common carrier for the purpose of such delivery, and the carrier having stopped at the warehouse of the respondent, the respondent 'on discovering that the yarns were those the price of which he had guaranteed, ordered the carrier to disload, and took delivery of them on his own account as guarantee for his father, AND WITHOUT ANY AUTHORITY FROM HIM, ASKED OR GIVEN, and still retains possession.' But the respondent had plainly no right thus to intercept the goods at his own hand. In his character of agent he had none, for the original contract stipulated delivery to his father, and it is confessed that subsequent consent to the contrary was neither asked nor given. It is accordingly in the character of guarantee, and not in that of agent, that he says he interposed. But here, again, there being a total absence of authority from the principal debtor, he had no right to usurp possession at his own hand. It is conceded, indeed, that he could not have done so in respect of any claim against his father, whether as cautioner or otherwise, unconnected with the transaction as to these yarns. But, in point of principle, there was nothing in the terms of that transaction to entitle him to take possession of the yarns to which it related, more than to take possession of any other piece of property belonging to his father.

"The only shadow of pretext that the respondent has for his proceeding is to be found in a statement of the advocators, (cond. art. 5), that the note which accompanied the yarns had been by 'one of the clerks of Aberdeen, Gordon and Company (the sellers), by mistake addressed to James Craik, junior, manufacturer, Forfar (the respondent), in place of James Craik, senior, manufacturer, Forfar, the bankrupt.' But if so addressed, the respondent evidently was aware of, and was not misled by the mistake. Accordingly, he defends his usurpation upon entirely different grounds, stating (answer to article 5), that he 'does not now recollect whether it was addressed to him or his father,' and (answer to article 6,) that it was not therefore by force of any supposed warrant or authority from the form of address, but entirely on his own right 'as guarantee,' and 'on discovering that the yarns were those the price of which he had guaranteed,' that he 'ordered the carrier to disload.'

"Indeed, the Lord Ordinary has great doubts whether the most express warrant from the sellers would have entitled the respondent to withhold or retain the yarns delivered as his father's property, and by the very contract of sale, bargained to be directly delivered to his father. But the respondent does not upon the record aver that he either had, or understood himself to have any such warrant from the sellers. On the contrary, as the record stands made up, he must be held as substantially admitting, that so far as there was any semblance of such warrant, it existed through the mere clerical blunder fallen into by a clerk, who had himself no authority to that effect.

"Some argument was raised upon the ground that the respondent's father might not himself have been in a situation, from his state of bankruptcy, to take delivery of the yarns, supposing them to have been duly forwarded. But here, once more, the record is not sufficiently precise, either as to the date of delivery of the yarns, or as to the date of the bankruptcy, to let in a question of this kind. At all events, there seems reason to doubt the validity of the plea in the respondent's mouth, seeing that he can only defend his own possession through the medium of some basis of right in the bankrupt, and must therefore inevitably assume that the property had lawfully passed to the latter."

The respondent reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

Authorities for Advocate.—Smith's Compend. of Mercantile Law, p. 451. Brodie's Stair, p. 879. Bell's Dic. v. Retention. More's Stair, Notes, p. 133. Ersk. III. 4, 20. Brodie, 27th June 1837. Haswell v. Hunt, 5 Term. Rep., 231. Scott v. Pettit, 3 Bos. and Pull., 471. Inglis v. Royal Bank, 8th Dec. 1736. Robertson and Aiken v. More, 3d July 1801. Steins, 16th Nov. 1810, F. C. Collins, 23d Nov. 1804, in Note to Bell's Com., I. p. 228.

Authorities for Respondent.—Archbold on Bank. Law, 8th Ed., p. 225. Hawkes v. Dun, 1 Compton and Servis, p. 519. Bell's Com., I. 225.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Anderson, Patton; Graham Binny, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (McNeill), H. J. Robertson; James Burness, S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

22d June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 227.—JAMES RITCHIE and JOHN CRAICH, Suspenders, v. JAMES MOIR and ROBERT JAMESON, Respondents.

Bill of Exchange.—Suspension.—At a roup of certain tolls of several lines of road, managed under different Acts of Parliament, a party took the lease of one of the bars, and granted his bill for the rent. On the averment that he had been induced to take the lease on the supposition that the tolls on the different lines were managed together, and for joint behoof, and that nothing would be done by the trustees on the one line to affect the traffic on the other, he presented a note of suspension of a charge for payment of the bill; and further, on the averment that their understanding had been broken through by the trustees, by taking compositions and lower tolls on one of the lines, whereby his bar was injured,—he prayed for suspension of the charge, and for interdict against the trustees taking compositions or lower tolls. Note refused, in respect the Road Acts were distinct and separate in their provisions, and that the one set of trustees had no control over the management of the others.

There are three lines of turnpike which run through the county of Clackmannan, generally known as the Clackmannanshire or Coast Road Trust, the Kinross and Alloa Trust, and the Ochil Turnpike Trust, for all of which separate Acts of Parliament had been obtained. The respondent, Jameson, who is Sheriff and Commissary-clerk of the county, was appointed clerk and treasurer for the first-mentioned line of road, by the trustees acting under the particular Road Statute; and he also holds the like, but separate, appointment under the trustees of the Ochil trust. The other respondent, Moir, acts as clerk under the appointment of the trustees of the Kinross and Alloa trust; and the trustees under these Acts are different parties, and entirely separate and independent of one another. It appeared also, that the respondents were in business together.

The different toll-bars on these lines of road were advertised by the respondents to be let for the year to Whitsunday 1841, at the same place, viz., within the Tontine Inn, Alloa, in May 1840,—the table of tolls of all which were advertised to be seen at the Sheriff-clerk's office, Alloa, where the respondents carried on business. On that occasion (May 1840) the suspender offered for the Gateside bar on the Kinross and

Alloa line, and was accepted at the rent of £205, for which he granted his bill along with the other suspender as security, and which was payable in twelve equal instalments. This bar, it appears, is about a mile and a-half from Alloa, and at no great distance from either of the other roads, both of which run in a manner parallel to the Kinross and Alloa turnpike. It was averred by the suspenders that the three branches of road were regulated by the same system, and were managed, as a joint concern, under the authority of the trustees, at the Sheriff-clerk's office, by the respondents, who, on the occasion of the let, held out this to the offerers present, and that relying on this, and that nothing would be done on the one line of road to hurt the other, he had made the offer and granted his bill. He condescended on a variety of particulars in regard to the way in which the respondents acted in the alleged management, and in their business, as giving ground for the inference that the management was for general behoof. He stated, that soon after he became bound for the rent, he discovered that the respondents had entered into certain arrangements with parties resident along the two parallel lines of road opposite his own turnpike, in virtue of which lower rates of toll, and compositions for toll, were taken, which withdrew the traffic from his line, and entirely prejudiced and injured his bar, contrary to the understanding and intention of parties at the letting. In particular, he set forth, that the greater part of the traffic on the road at the Gateside bar (as well as at the Gabberstone bar) arose from the passage of coal to Alloa from the adjacent collieries; and the suspender very soon found that, by an agreement of the kind alluded to, made with Mr Christie, tacksman of the Aberdona colliery, and Mr Maxton, manager of the Woodlands colliery, the source from which the rent of Gateside gate was to be paid by the suspender, was almost wholly taken away. The distance from the Aberdona colliery to Alloa by the Gateside bar, is a mile and three-quarters less than by the Whins bar, and the Whins bar can only be reached by a circuitous and bad road. Nevertheless, Mr Christie, whose carts formerly passed Gateside, began to send his coals round by the Whins, although the additional length of road was such that he was compelled to pay fourpence per ton of additional hire for carriage. Almost immediately after the roup, a printed placard also was issued by Mr Maxton, giving the following intimation:—"To the inhabitants of Alloa. Persons driving coal from this work (Woodlands colliery), by receiving a ticket from the griever, will pass toll free at Whins." A reduced rate or composition was not only to be taken for Mr Maxwell's own carriages, horses, and carts, but he was to receive power to communicate the privilege of passing for a low rate, or nothing at all, to any one who chose to take coals from his work; and persons, accordingly, who produced Mr Maxton's tickets, were allowed by the trustees to pass free at the Whins. The trade at the Gabberstone bar was injured in a similar way, and more particularly by the public who used to frequent the Clackmannan colliery, which is situate between the Gateside bar and Alloa, and who passed the Gabberstone bar, sending their carts to Woodlands and Aberdona collieries.

The suspender complained to the respondents, and protested against this procedure, and also refused to pay an instalment falling due on 15th July 1840. A charge of payment having been given by Moir, as treasurer of the Kinross and Alloa turnpike trust, of certain instalments which had fallen due, the suspender presented this note, praying for suspension of the charge, and to interdict the respondents and the trustees on the Ochil road, from taking reduced toll at the Whins toll-bar, &c. There were various grounds of suspension, several of which were objections taken on the General Turnpike Road Act; but the leading objection was, that the suspender, as lessee of the Gateside bar, was entitled to be kept and protected in the possession of the toll-duties as let, as the condition on which the rent is exigible. More particularly, the bar, along with the others on the Ochil, Clackmannan, and Kinross roads, was let at the joint roup, under the concurring act and arrangement of the trustees on these roads, adopted, as in previous years, for their common benefit, before the same individuals assembled, and through the representations and information given at the same business-place by the same public officer and his assistants, who were not entitled thereafter (nor any of the trustees represented by their acts and proceedings), in any way to impair and take away the produce of the bar. So far as the rights acquired at this roup were concerned, the Kinross trustees were bound to know what the Ochil trustees intended to do, and the latter to attend to what the former had done; and it was incumbent on all of them to respect the rights so acquired.

In answer, it was explained by Moir, that it was entire misapprehension to suppose that there was any joint management, as the three trusts were entirely separate and distinct; that in regard to the arrangement by which lower tolls were taken on the Ochil branch road, he was no party to it; that it was the other respondent who took compositions for toll on that road; and that he, Moir, had nothing to do with that, as the trusts for which Jameson acted, were in no way connected with the Kinross and Alloa line, for which he acted, and on which the suspender leased a bar; nor was he, as an officer of that trust, in the least degree connected with, or responsible for such acts of management as Mr Jameson considered he was entitled to perform, in the execution of the duties confided to him by the trustees of the other and separate trusts. And he specially denied the statements of joint management, or that such had been held out at the letting to the suspender or the offerers present. And he maintained accordingly, and in opposition to the application for suspension and interdict, that the bill charged on being a valid document, the suspender was bound to pay the instalments charged for; and that when the suspender took the Gateside bar, neither the respondent nor the trustees for whom he acted, came under any obligation with him, express or implied, respecting the Whins toll, or any other bar situated on a different road from that which was under their management; and the respondent, therefore, was not responsible for the proceedings of other trustees managing different trusts under their local Acts. Further, that as neither he nor the trustees of the Kinross and Alloa turnpike-road were parties to, or in any way connected with, the agreements for composition of tolls exigible at the Whins gate, it was impossible for the complainers to found on these agreements as in any way altering or affecting the obligations entered into by them with the respondent and the trustees of the Kinross and Alloa turnpike-road.

Jameson, in reference to the reason for taking the lower tolls at the Whins bar, explained, that that bar had been for several years past kept by the Ochil trustees in their own hands; certain agreements between them and the Devon Company rendering it necessary, or at least convenient, for them to do so. During these years it had never been let, or even advertised to be let, but the toll-dues have been received by a confidential person for behoof of the trustees, and by him they were regularly paid into the Commercial Bank. While this toll had been managed in this manner, the trustees found it expedient to enter into composition-contracts, by which means a considerable part of the revenue of the gate was paid directly to the respondent as their treasurer, and not to the collectors at the Whins. In this manner the composition-contracts complained of were entered into with Mr Maxton and Mr Christie. Both these contracts were in terms of the Statutes, and it was denied that the suspender had either any interest or any title to object to them. Both Mr Maxton and Mr Christie were parties using the road in terms of the Act, and it is in that character that the composition was made with them.

He pleaded—That never having entered into any agreement or contract with the complainers, either direct or implied, he consequently was not liable to them for having violated his agreement. The Ochil trustees were a separate and independent body, altogether unconnected with, and independent of, the trustees of the Kinross and Alloa turnpike, and in no degree responsible to them for their management, and still less were they responsible to the complainers, the tacksmen of a toll belonging to a trust with which they have no concern, and in which they have no interest: That the Ochil trustees, in the execution of the trust committed to them, had in every respect and particular acted in strict conformity with the provisions of the local Statute and of the general turnpike Act. The conclusions for interdict against the respondent, to prohibit him from entering into compositions for tolls, were unwarrantable and absurd, and directly contrary to the terms of the 53d section of the general turnpike Act.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"3d March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the reasons of suspension and interdict: Finds the letters orderly proceeded; refuses the interdict and decerns; finds the respondent entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, when lodged, remits to the auditor of Court to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary does not think that the suspender has been successful in attempting to detect anything unlawful in any of the proceedings even of the Ochil road trustees. But though it had been otherwise, the Kinross road trustees, from whom Ritchie took his toll, and to whom his bill is due, form a separate and independent trust, and Ritchie cannot withhold payment of the liquid debt due to them on account of any illiquid claim of damages which he may suppose that he has against an adjoining trust.

"The case of Fairley has no application; because, though there was a separation of trust quoad management, the warrandice given there to the lessee was held to be the general trust of the county. Here there is an entire statutory separation."

The suspenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Meadowbank.—The trustees are entirely different parties, and acting under three different Road Acts; and the respondents, who are appointed respectively under different Acts, are not connected with one another in the business of the different roads. They seem to be engaged in other business together, but that is not prohibited by the general Act, or by the Statutes in question. His Lordship did not consider that it would have made any difference, even supposing that one of the respondents had been clerk under the different acts, and had advertised them, as was here done, for the same occasion. The procedure that took place at the letting, must be construed with reference to the separate Statutes, and then there was no difficulty. His Lordship considered that the Lord Ordinary was right, and that it was impossible, in the circumstances, to suspend the diligence on such averments, particularly as it was not set forth by the suspender that the respondents, on the day of letting, told him that the Ochil trustees were not to act as they did.

Lord Medwyn concurred, and said the suspender was bound to have known that the respondents were acting separately under different Statutes. There was nothing in the Act of the Kinross line which gave these trustees a title to control the trustees of the Ochil line in taking compositions. His Lordship did not think that it affected the question that the respondents carried on other business together, and agreed that the interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

Lord Justice-Clerk was not prepared to differ, though he had had some doubts whether it was not a case which ought to go to a jury, if the facts which were stated were sufficient to create the belief that the management and letting was a joint matter. His Lordship, however, concurred.

The Court accordingly adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Robertson, Henderson; Graham and Anderson, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Solicitor-General (McNeill), H. Bruce; H. G. Dickson, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

23d June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 228.—THE EARL OF BUCHAN, Pursuer, v. HARRY SHIPLEY ERSKINE and OTHERS, Defenders.

Entail—Fetters.—An entail prohibited selling, disposing, contracting debt, 'or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, or the persons above named,'—resolved the right of any heir who should 'failzie herein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment,'—and irritated 'all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination'—Held that these fetters were effectual.

The Strathbrock entail contains the following fettering clauses:

"It shall noways be leisum or lawfull to any of the heirs of tailzie and provision above specified to sell, dispone or wadsett the lands, barronie and others above written, or any part thereof, or any annualrents or yearly duties to be uplifted of the samen, or to sett tacks thereof for longer space than their own lifetimes, or to contract debt for which the samen may be appraised or adjudged, or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, and of the persons above named, and their foresaids;" and if any of the heirs of tailzie "shall, in any time coming, failzie herein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment, then and in that case the person or persons swn failzieing and doing in the contrair hereof, and the heirs of their bodies, shall amit and lose their right and haill benefite of this present bond of provision, and infetments following hereon, and of the haill lands, barronie and others above written, and the samen shall in all time thereafter pertain, belong and access to the next person for the time, who be vertue of the said tailzie and provision would have succeeded to the said lands and estate failzieing the said persons contraveeners, and the heirs of their bodies; and all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination, with all that shall follow yron, shall be ipso facto voyd and null without any declarator, and shall noways affect nor burden the said lands, barronie and oys above written, or any part thereof, as if the same had never been done."

The Earl of Buchan, the heir in possession under this entail, brought the present action of declarator, in which—subsuming that the bond of tailzie does not contain effectual irritant and resolutive clauses against "selling, disposing, or wadsetting" the lands, or "setting tacks" for a longer period than the lifetime of the heirs in possession, or "contracting debt for which the same may be appraised or adjudged, or alienating or affecting the said lands, barony and others in any manner, or on any motive whatsoever"—he concluded to have it found and declared that he had full power, at pleasure, to alter and infringe the order of succession—to sell, alienate, dispone and convey the lands, or any part of them, for a price or onerous consideration, without any obligation to reinvest the same—to contract debts that would affect the lands,—and to alienate and dispone them gratuitously in favour of any person or persons whatsoever.

The record having been closed on summons and defences, and mutual cases lodged, the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to the First Division, and issued the following note:

"This question is taken to report as it is prepared for judgment by elaborate cases on both sides, which are printed, and ready for the consideration of the Court; and both parties expressed a desire to obtain a judgment with as little delay as possible.

"The question relates to the validity of the entail of the estate of Strathbrock, which has been for some time an inheritance in the family of the noble pursuer; and it is one of the many cases now raised on exceptions taken to the phraseology and efficacy of the statutory clauses. These are objected to on grounds which the Lord Ordinary has not been able to satisfy himself can be sustained without giving a greater effect to a verbal and hypercritical construction than the Court has ever yet admitted in any preceding cause.

"The entail is said to be defective in the resolutive and irritant clauses, each of which, therefore, require to be carefully examined.

"1. The resolutive clause follows the prohibitory, (see printed entail, p. 6, E F), and it is a fundamental point of the case, deserving notice, that the prohibitory clauses are admitted to be complete, embracing the three heads of prohibition authorised by the Act 1685.

"It is next important to remark, that the resolutive and irritant clauses, in point of collocation in the present deed, immediately follow the prohibitions; after an enunciation of the prohibitions, the resolutive clause proceeds thus:—'And if my said daughters and their heirs, or any other the heirs of tailzie, &c., &c. shall in any time coming failzie herein, or do any thing contrary to this my destination and appointment, then and in that case the person or persons swn failzieing, and doing on the contrary hereof, shall amit and lose their right,' &c., &c.

"And the irritant clause declares, that 'all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination, with all that shall follow thereon, shall be ipso facto void and null.'

"With regard to the first of these clauses (the resolutive), the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it must be held as a general, and not as an enumerative clause. It bears a reference to the whole of the preceding part of the deed; and the provision as to any of the heirs who shall failzie herein, seems alike comprehensive and unqualified, as well as the declaration that 'the persons swn failzieing and doing in the contrary hereof, shall amit and lose the right,' &c.

"This provision hardly admits of any other construction than this, that if any heir 'shall failzie herein by acting contrary to any part of the preceding deed,' or if they shall fail 'to observe the conditions and limitations imposed on them,' they should amit and lose their right, &c., &c. These exegetical words, it is well known, are used in many tailzies. But when the clause is directed in short and unqualified terms against all who 'failzie herein,' it is equally effectual, as it applies to all failures of whatever kind they may be, contrary to any conditions of the tailzie.

"No doubt the resolute clause also contains the alternative words applicable not only to the heirs who shall 'failzie herein,' but also who 'shall do any thing contrary to this my destination and appointment'; but it is not thought that these words can be held, on any fair construction, as qualifying the general term which precedes it. The reference to 'my destination and appointment' cannot be viewed as applying to the clause of destination only, as, even in the strictest construction, the word 'appointment,' which is also used, is a peculiar and generic term, referring to the constitution or appointment of heirs under all the preceding provisions and conditions of the settlement. Suppose it had been declared that the heirs who shall do any thing contrair 'to my settlement hereby made,' shall forfeit their right, &c., that provision would certainly have been sufficiently explicit to embrace the whole of the preceding clauses of the deed; but the Lord Ordinary has not been able to satisfy himself that the term 'appointment' is not as effectual and comprehensive as 'settlement.' More especially ought that construction to be adopted when the preceding words are taken into view, which apply, without exception or limitation, to all 'who shall failzie herein.'

"2. The objection to the irritant clause is different, but it depends much on the right construction which is due to the resolute clause. The irritant follows the resolute clause, and it provides, that 'all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination, with all that shall follow thereon, shall be ipso facto void and null,' &c. &c.

"The objection to this clause seems to be founded on the plea which was sustained against an entail in the case of Speid (21st February 1837), in which an irritant clause, directed against all who should 'act and do in the contrary of the provision above set forth,' (thus using the term in the singular number), was held void for uncertainty, as it was not made perfectly clear to which of the foregoing provisions it applied.

"Without impeaching the authority of Speid's case (which was not an unanimous decision, and was not carried to appeal), it appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the very strict rule of construction there adopted, cannot be extended to any other entails where there is any essential difference in the structure of the deed from that on which the question arose in Speid's case. The Lord Ordinary views the present as an entirely different deed. In Speid's case, the irritant clause followed the prohibitory, and preceded the resolute: and certainly when there were a great variety of provisions, and when it was declared in the next sentence, that any who acted contrary to the provision above set forth only—there was room for arguing that the maker had not pointed out with precision which of the provisions he intended to irritate.

"But the present is a very different case. Here the irritant clause immediately follows the resolute, and, like that clause, it is general and not specific. And the argument sustained in Speid's case is inapplicable here; because, although the word 'provision' is used in the singular number, it refers, from its collocation and grammatical construction, to the general provision in the resolute clause immediately preceding, which was a general provision restricting the right of all heirs who should 'failzie herein.' In short, the irritant clause just irritates all the deeds of the heirs whose rights shall fall within the forfeiture of the resolute clause,—and that is sufficiently broad to apply to every act and deed at variance with the entail.

"Besides, in this particular tailzie, and in the resolute and irritant clauses themselves, the term 'provision' is evidently used in a generic sense. Thus, in the resolute clause, the deed of tailzie is referred to as 'this present bond of provision,' and, in the same sentence, it is declared that the estate, in case of contravention, shall pertain to 'the next person for the time who be vertue of the said tailzie and provision would have succeeded to the said lands,' &c. Hence, when it is further declared in the irritant clause, that 'all dispositions made and done contrair to the said provision and destination' shall be void and null, it seems clear, from the use of the term in the immediately preceding sentence, that the maker of the deed used the term 'provision' as synonymous with 'tailzie.' This is not a matter of remote inference. Any other interpretation of the term would, it is thought, be contrary to the plain and unmistakable import of the deed.

"If these views of the leading pleas in this declarator be correct, it is unnecessary to enter into the other questions discussed in the revised cases. But if the Court shall be of opinion that the entail is ineffectual from any defect in the resolute or irritant clauses, then the extent of the heir's powers to make gratuitous alienations will fall to be considered. As the Lord Ordinary has called the attention of the Court to this subject in sundry recent cases, particularly in those of Eglinton, Polmaise, and Duthie, it is sufficient to suggest that these cases should be kept in view in deciding the present."

The Court ordered a consultation of the whole Judges.

The following opinions were returned:

Lords Murray, Cunningham, Cockburn, Moncreiff, Meadowbank, Medwyn and Jeffrey:

"We agree in the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary. The entail prohibits selling, disposing, contracting debt, 'or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, or of the persons above named.' The resolute clause is immediately connected with the prohibitory clause, and provides, that if the heirs shall 'failzie herein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment,' their right shall be resolved. This is not ambiguous. It provides for the heirs either failing in what the deed enjoins, or acting in opposition to what the granter had appointed by it. The irritant clause is connected with the resolute, and declares that 'all dispositions, and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination,' &c., shall be void and null. The terms here used, 'SAID provision and destination,' are as comprehensive as those of destination and appointment, and comprehend the whole entail. This case is therefore materially different from that of Speid (21st February 1837, 15 Shaw, 618). There the deed contained complex clauses, which formed distinct and substantive provisions in the entail, and the irritant clause was so framed that it could only apply to one of them, but the deed left it altogether uncertain to which particular provision it applied. Here the deed, although made before the Act 1685 was passed, has been framed with greater clearness, and is much in accordance with the language and enactments of that Statute, which sanctions tailzies 'with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell, annailzie, or dispoise the saids lands, or any part thereof, or contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the samyn may be apprysed, adjudged or evicted from the other substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrate or interrupted, declaring all such DEEDS to be in themselves null and void,' &c. The Statute was probably framed having that or some similar deed in view."

Lord Ivory:

"I am, on the whole, inclined to think that this is a good entail. The only point, indeed, on which I entertained a doubt was, whether the irritant clause was sufficiently expressed to reach the contraction of debt: And upon that head, though my scruple has finally given way, I cannot help still thinking that the case is a very narrow one.

"Looking, however, to the whole context, and observing—(1.) that the prohibitory clause classifies, as it were, the 'contracting debt' under the same general category with those non-enumerated cases of contravention, which it describes as the 'DOING any OTHER fact or DEED in prejudice of the said tailzie;' and, (2.) that the resolute clause strikes at the contraction of debt (as well as the other matters prohibited) under such general words as 'failzie herein, or DO any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment;' or again, 'failzieing and DOING in the contrary hereof.'—I have finally come, though still not without hesitation, to hold that the irritant clause, in declaring that 'all dispositions and other DEEDS whatsoever, made or DONE contrair to the said provision and destination, shall be void and null, and shall noways affect nor burden the said lands,' is sufficient to meet the case of debt,—as a 'DEED in prejudice of the said tailzie,' under the terminology of the prohibitory clause,—as a 'thing DONE contrair to this my destination and appointment,' or 'DONE in the contrary hereof,' under the terminology of the resolutive clause;—and finally, under the terminology of the irritant clause itself, as a 'DEED whatsoever DONE contrair to the said provision and destination,' and calculated to 'affect and burden the lands';—And that, on the whole matter, the words 'other deeds whatsoever,' as they occur in the irritant clause, are not to be construed in the mere limited sense of deeds ejusdem generis with the 'dispositions' mentioned in a preceding portion of the clause,—that is to say, as deeds in the technical sense of written instruments, in contradistinction to the more natural sense of ACTS or DOINGS of the party.

"The words 'the said provision and destination' as they occur in the irritant clause, I hold with Lord Murray to be synonymous with the words 'this present bond of provision'—or 'this my destination and appointment'—or 'the said tailzie and provision'—or simply 'the said tailzie,'—all of which expressions occur in close juxtaposition in this part of the deed; and therefore it follows, that the words 'deeds whatsoever done contrair to the said provision and destination' are not to be confined merely to deeds done in alteration or prejudice of the destination or order of succession, but embrace debts as one of the forms of 'deeds done' generally as a contravention of the entail.

"I may just add—1. That even were the entail to be held defective as regards the contraction of debt, I can see no ground whatever for sustaining the conclusions of the libel in any other respect: But, 2. I have great doubt whether, in any view of the case, the present pursuer would be entitled to succeed in this action. The ground of action, as he has laid it in the summons, raises a question exclusively inter hæredes. It is not set forth that any sale of the estate has been attempted, or that debt has been contracted, or that a gratuitous alienation has been executed, or that any thing has been done to affect or alter the order of succession. The fact may or may not be that some of those things have been done, but the summons does not raise the point; and there is here, accordingly, no question with any third party, whether as creditor or otherwise. Now there can be no doubt that the entail, under the prohibitory clause alone, is effectual at all events inter hæredes. And, to borrow the words of Lord Moncreiff's opinion in the case of Aboyne (now also before the consulted Judges), 'it is a mistake to say, that if there be an effectual entail inter hæredes, the Court will try a question concerning the possibility of a valid sale, &c., being made where no sale, &c., has been attempted. They have repeatedly refused to do so.'

The Court assoltizied.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Rutherford, Park; C. H. Miller, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (McNeill), Marshall; Nairne and Bertram, W.S., Agents.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

23d June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

NO. 229.—THE EARL OF BUCHAN, Pursuer, v. HARRY SHIPLEY ERSKINE and OTHERS, Defenders.

Entail.—Irritant Clause.—A clause irritating "all the debts and deeds" of the heirs of entail, and also "all adjudications or other legal diligence" used upon the same, found to be an effectual irritancy.

The irritant clause in the entail of Dryburgh provides and declares, that "all the debts and deeds of the said whole heirs of tailzie and substitutes above mentioned, or of any one of them, contracted, made or granted, as well before as after their succession to the lands and others above disposed, and all adjudications or other legal execution or diligence that shall happen to be obtained or used upon the same (excepting as is above excepted), shall not only be void and null, with all that shall follow, or may follow thereon, in so far as they might any way affect the said lands and others."

The Earl of Buchan, the heir possessing under the entail, brought the present action of declarator, subsuming that the above clause does not contain an effectual irritancy, and concluding as in the previous case.

The Lord Ordinary, in making avizandum to the First Division, issued the following note:

"This case is taken to report from a desire to accommodate the parties, who have printed elaborate cases on the question at issue, and have united in a request, with reference to the interest of creditors, that the cause may be put into the course of final decision as speedily as possible. In acceding to this request, the Lord Ordinary must add, that he does not view the question at issue as attended with any serious difficulty.

"The action relates to the validity of the entail executed by the late Lord Buchan, of the estate of Dryburgh, in 1810; the chief object of the declarator being to have it found and declared that the irritant clause of that deed is partial or incomplete, and ineffectual. That clause is repeatedly brought into view in the argument of both parties (revised case for pursuer, p. 3), but notwithstanding the ample commentary on the deed of tailzie, and the learned exposition of the authorities given in the revised case for the noble pursuer, the Lord Ordinary must own that he conceives that no ingenuity can successfully assail this irritant clause.

"It is hardly possible for a provision more general and comprehensive to be put into legal language than that which forms the subject of the present question. It provides and declares, 'that all debts and deeds of the said whole heirs of tailzie and substitutes above mentioned, or of any one of them, contracted, made or granted, as well before as after their succession to the lands and others above disposed, and all adjudications or other legal execution or diligence that shall happen to be obtained or used upon the same (excepting as is above excepted), shall not only be void and null, with all that has followed or shall follow thereon,' &c. &c. When it is thus declared that all debts and deeds of the heirs, contracted, made or granted, shall be null, under the exceptions before specified, that provision is of itself a complete irritant clause, voiding all debts contracted, or deeds of sale, alienation or alteration of whatever kind, that may be attempted by any of the subsequent heirs. So far the case bears a strong similarity to the case of Finzean (18th June 1840.) and to the late case of Auchendoir, (26th November 1840.)

"It is argued, however, on the part of the noble pursuer, that as the provision in this irritant clause voiding all debts and deeds, is accompanied with the farther declaration, that 'all adjudications, or other legal execution or diligence that shall happen to be obtained or used upon the same (excepting as above excepted) shall be void,'—that therefore such debts and deeds only were vacated as may be the subject of adjudication or legal diligence. But the Lord Ordinary does not think this a legitimate construction, in the most critical view of the clause. He conceives that the general avoidance of all debts and deeds 'contracted, made or granted,' applies to all voluntary acts of contraction, alienation or alteration, excluded in the prohibitory clause; and it surely cannot derogate from that irritancy, that the maker of the tailzie, in addition to the nullity of debts and deeds, provided (perhaps with superfluous anxiety) that all adjudications and other legal diligence used for the same should also be void.

"The plea of the noble pursuer proceeds on the supposition, that there may be prohibitions for which adjudications could not be led, which, according to his Lordship's construction of the irritant clause, would thus be unprotected by any effectual avoidance. But that plea is not fairly maintainable. It is manifest that adjudications may be led on acts and deeds done under each of the heads of prohibition authorised by the Act 1685. If debt is contracted, adjudications may of course be led for it; if sales or alienations be made, or if deeds of alteration of the succession be granted, adjudications in implement may be led on the deeds by which these acts are attempted to be carried into effect, and therefore, it forms no ground for any presumed limitation or qualification of the debts and deeds, which are all irritated under the first branch of the clause, to find that adjudications led for the same are also specified as void in the subsequent part of the same sentence.

"The Lord Ordinary holds the present question as decided by the case of Elibank in 1833, brought fully into view in the defender's revised case (p. 11-14), in which the entail was supported after a very full argument. It is contended here, indeed, that certain words have been omitted in the Dryburgh entail which were inserted in the corresponding clause of the Elibank entail, as well as in the form of entail published in the Juridical Styles; but the words omitted do not appear to be in the least degree material either to extend the scope of the irritant clause or to illustrate the meaning of the maker. All the material terms used in the Elibank entail occur here; and it is thought that both the note of the Lord Ordinary, and the opinions of the Court delivered in the Elibank case, apply with equal force to the present question."

The Court having ordered a consultation of the whole Judges, the following opinions were returned:

Lords Murray, Moncreiff, Meadowbank, Medwyn, Jeffrey, Cockburn and Cuninghame:

"The pursuer, in this case, maintains that the irritant clause does not apply to sales and alienation of the estate, or to alterations of the order of succession. The entail contains direct prohibitions against altering the order of succession, against selling and alienating, and against contracting debt, or doing any act that shall be the ground of an adjudication. The irritant clause, the validity of which is questioned, declares, that 'all the debts and deeds of the said whole heirs of tailie and substitutes above mentioned, or of any one of them, contracted, made or granted as well before as after their succession to the lands and others above disposed, and all adjudications or other legal execution or diligence that shall happen to be obtained or used upon the same (excepting as is above excepted), shall not only be void and null, with all that shall follow, or may follow thereon, in so far as they might any way affect the said lands and others. But also, &c.

"The pursuer contends, that it is only in so far as there are adjudications or other legal executions, that the debts and deeds are made void and null. But that construction is contrary to the express terms of the clause, which first enumerates all debts and deeds, and next adjudications, and declares 'that they shall not only be null and void, so far as they affect the lands, but the rights of the heir forfeited.' There is no room for holding that the irritancy applies only to debts and deeds on which adjudications happen to be obtained. In plain and unavoidable construction, the clause applies directly, in the first place, to the debts and the deeds of the heirs of entail, and it next applies to adjudications or legal execution that shall happen to be obtained. The irritancy is as clearly applicable to the one as to the other. It was perhaps superfluous, as the Lord Ordinary has observed, to declare that the adjudications and legal diligence that might be obtained were to be null and void,—but the nullity is noway confined to these adjudications, but as clearly applies to the debts and deeds, in so far as they might affect the lands, as to the adjudications.

"Second, The pursuer has stated as another ground of action, that the irritant and resolutive clauses are not inserted in the precept of sasine. As they are contained in the deed of which that precept forms a part, and which orders the sasine to be granted on the conditions therein specified, and no otherwise, they form part of that precept. Lord Kilkerran's report of the case of Kynninmound shows that this construction was recognised in this Court nearly a century ago, and it does not appear to have been ever disputed since.

"We are therefore of opinion, that the objections made by the pursuer to this entail are not well founded."

Lord Ivory:

"I concur. On the first point, more especially, the cases of Elibank and Auchendoir are substantially in point.

"N.B.—This case is also open to the remark which I have already made in Strathbrock (between the same parties), in respect of its raising a question solely inter hæredes."

The Court assoilzied.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Rutherford, Park; C. H. Miller, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Marshall; Nairne and Bertram, W.S., Agents.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

23d June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 230.—THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Raisers, v. MRS JOAN BLACK or HAINING, Claimant, and JOHN HAINING, Claimant.

Husband and Wife—Jus Mariti.—A sum of money, identified as the amount of a bequest to a wife, independent of her husband, not chargeable with his debts or engagements, and payable on her receipt alone, and lying in bank on a receipt in her name—held to be her sole property, exclusive of the jus mariti.

Captain John Stothart, by his last will and testament, appointed his executors to place at interest on Government, or real securities in any manner they should think proper, the proceeds of one-third part of his whole estate and effects,—the interest to be paid to his father, Joseph Stothart, during his lifetime, and after his decease the principal to be paid to his niece, Joan Black,

"provided, or as soon as, she has attained the age of eighteen years, independent of her then present, or any future husband or husbands, and without being subject or liable to, or charged or chargeable with his or their contract, debts or other engagements,"—"her receipt alone for the same" being "a good and sufficient discharge," "notwithstanding of her then present or any future coverture."

John Stothart survived his father, Joseph Stothart, and died in 1803; and in 1812, Joan Black having attained her eighteenth year, became entitled to payment of her uncle's bequest. It was, however, allowed to remain in the executor's hands till 1816, when Joan Black was married to Robert Haining, and then its amount (£600) was lent out by the executor on heritable security in her own name, and for her exclusive behoof. In 1818, £100 of the bond was paid up, and in 1838 the remaining £500, which was thereupon deposited in the Commercial Bank upon a receipt taken in Mrs Haining's name. The sum remained thus deposited; and the marriage having been dissolved in 1839 by the death of Robert Haining, intestate and without issue, a competition arose between John Haining, the brother of the deceased, and the widow, Mrs Haining,—the former insisting that the £500 formed part of the moveable estate of the deceased, and the latter claiming it as her exclusive property.

To determine the preference, the present multipointing was raised by the Commercial Bank.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor preferring the claim of Mrs Haining, and stated in a note:

"1. The identity of the sum in medio with the sum bequeathed by her uncle to Mrs Haining, is clearly proved, independently of the admission on the record, by her competition in this multipointing. 2. There was an unquestionable exclusion of the jus mariti, in so far as this sum was concerned. 3.

And there is nothing whatever to show any intention on the part of the wife to abandon this privilege, and to make the money a part of the goods in communion."

John Haining reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I have no difficulty. The claim depends on the terms of the bequest in Captain Stobart's settlement, and to these terms I cannot give any other interpretation than that the testator meant to confer the sum on his niece, exclusive of any right or claim on the part of her husband. He does not use the common legal words—"exclusive of the jus mariti;" but he uses others equivalent to them, and equally clear and intelligible. It is impossible to adopt the idea that the words have merely the limited effect of excluding the husband's curatorial powers. The sum bequeathed remained in the executor's hands four years after it became payable. Then the lady married, and the money was lent, it is said by the executor, on heritable security in the lady's name. Take the fact to be that it was not lent by the executor but by herself—still there is no reference to the husband; and the bond is taken in terms conformable to the uncle's will. Then the bond is paid up, and the amount deposited in bank in the lady's name. The money is thus clearly distinguished as the proceeds of her uncle's bequest; and the decisions reported by Baron Hume, p. 218, show that no act of the husband alone could alter the destination of a sum thus conveyed, exclusive of the jus mariti. I am clear that the interlocutor is right.

Lord Gillies.—I concur entirely, and have nothing to add. I was glad to find the decisions in Baron Hume; for there appeared some room for doubt as to the effect of the changes which the sum had undergone; but these decisions appear to be a fortiori to the present case.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur, and for the reasons stated. I may only add, that the question is not with the husband's creditors, but his heir, and that the widow's right might have been pleaded much higher. At the utmost, her allowing the sum to pass into the husband's hands would only have been a donatio, and as such was liable to recall. Here the wife is claiming the money; and there cannot therefore be any doubt as to the fact of revocation. The object throughout was to fulfil the uncle's intentions, and keep the money from the husband's control. Had he defeated this intention, he would have been in perissima fide, and of course his heir could not have been permitted to profit by it.

Lord Fullerton.—I also concur, on the ground, first, that the husband's right was excluded by the testator; and, secondly, that the sum in question is clearly identified with that which was bequeathed. The cases quoted from Baron Hume are a fortiori, and prove that the original exclusion of the husband's right cannot be removed without an express consent of the wife to that effect. Here there is nothing of the kind, but a great variety of circumstances to prove the contrary.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For Mrs Haining, Inglis; John Walker, W.S., Agent.—For John Haining, Whigham; John Jopp, W.S., Agent.—For Commercial Bank, M. Bell.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

24th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 231.—JANET YOUNG or STEEDMAN and OTHERS, Suspenders, v. ALEXANDER MALCOLM and OTHERS, Respondents.

Title and Interest to Sue.—Trust.—Society.—Corporation.—Pactum Illicitum.—Nobile Officium.—A public society, denominated the "Prime-Gilt," existed in Kirkcaldy for upwards of two centuries, and the funds, which arose from rates levied on masters and mariners, were dedicated to the support of the contributors in necessity, and their widows, &c. Owing, it was alleged, to difficulties in the way of levying any longer the rates on common mariners, and other causes, the managers of the society called a meeting, at which, on the ground that it was a private society, it was resolved to realise the property of the society, and to divide it equally among the members, providing for any widows on the fund, but refusing to recognise the right of the mariners, or thereafter to receive their rates. In a conjoined process of suspension, reduction and declarator, brought in regard to these proceedings, at the instance of certain widows on the fund, and common mariners who had long contributed their rates—the title of these parties to sue was sustained by the Court, and interdict granted against the resolutions and proceedings of the managers; and found that the property in possession of the defenders was held in trust for the Prime-Gilt, and the persons or members entitled to be members thereof, and such parties as may hereafter become members, or as are or may be entitled to derive support or assistance from its funds, and that the defenders are bound to denude of, and convey the property of the society in trust to such person or persons as the Court may name, and in such terms, and under such conditions as the Court may hereafter direct.

There has existed in the port of Kirkcaldy for upwards of two centuries, a public society, denominated the "Prime-Gilt," or "Prime-Gilt Box," similar in its objects and origin to the Trinity House of Leith, and other such institutions in various ports of the country. It was alleged by the suspenders in the present action, that it originally possessed a public charter or Seal of Cause, which, however, no longer existed; but the records drew back to 1614, from which, as the suspenders alleged, the purposes of the society were sufficiently obvious. They averred, that for upwards of two centuries the society, as empowered by their Seal of Cause, levied certain rates or duties, as its principal source of support, from the wages of the masters and mariners employed in vessels at the port of Kirkcaldy, whether belonging to the port or not, or whether in the foreign or coasting trade; and these rates would seem to have been regulated, declared and levied, at least, as it would appear at one time, from some of the documents produced at meetings of the body, described to consist of "the haill maisters, owneris of ships, sailers, and hyresmen within the burghes." The mode of levying was said to be this:—A pass-book was generally kept for each vessel, in which was entered a separate and distinct statement, for each voyage, of the names of the officers and seamen, and the sums contributed by or deducted from the wages of each for the Prime-Gilt Box. At the end of the year, these sums were paid over to the treasurer of the fund, who docketed each statement in the book. In these entries the duty or levy was called "poors' money." In some instances, 8d. per pound was levied on wages,—at other times, 4d.; but in 1827–8, when the present cause of action arose, the rate stood at 6d. per pound. Strangers—that is to say, mariners not residing at the port—were assessed in half the ordinary dues; and it was averred that the Lords of the Admiralty, before settling with the owners of vessels belonging to the port, who had been employed by their Lordships, required evidence that these rates had been paid. In regard to the objects of the institution for which these rates were collected and paid into the "box" of the society, the suspenders alleged that the object was principally for the support (at the sight of the box-master, according to certain rates) of old and disabled seamen,—their widows and orphans,—and the relief of shipwrecked mariners,—and sometimes also charity was bestowed from the box on kindred subjects of necessity which were worthy of support; but the funds were never diverted from these objects, nor applied towards the personal use of any of the managers, unless in a state of helplessness, &c. The surplus, after meeting the demands of charity, was invested, from time to time, in the purchase of heritages; and from some of the productions, it would appear that the titles had been taken to the "present boxm^r of the Prime-Gilt Box of Kirk^d, for himself and in name of the remanent masters, mariners, and owners of the ships within the said burgh, and the said masters, mariners and owners, for themselves, and as managers for the poor of the Prime-Gilt Box."

In the course of time, the property and effects of the society were said to have accumulated to the amount of several thousand pounds.

It did not appear from the statement of the suspenders who the parties were who were entitled to enter the society as members, nor the exact rule according to which support was distributed; for, besides the want of any copy of the charter, which was said to have been lost, there was no copy of the regulations or articles under which the management had proceeded.

In 1827, the parties who were then in the management entered into a deed or contract, by which they agreed to remodel the society, thenceforward to be carried on as a new society. By it they declared that the parties who then subscribed the contract were to be the constituent members; and also, that for the future the association should consist exclusively of shipowners and shipmasters residing in the port; and by a subsequent resolution, they transferred the whole funds and property of the "Prime-Gilt" over into the possession of the new body, for answering its purposes. It was also provided, that with the exception of parties receiving aid at the time, as to whom the society reserved to itself a right to reduce or alter the allowance if they saw fit, no parties were to be entitled to aid except members, their widows and orphans, and that the funds should be wholly applied in providing for them, with the exception of such sums as might be paid to shipwrecked seamen.

The suspenders alleged that this step, which was taken under pretext of remodelling the society, had the effect, in reality, of entirely altering and setting at naught the old constitution: That it was agreed to without any notice to the parties interested, many of whom were abroad, and that it entirely limited the persons who were entitled to be connected with the society. After the above procedure, the managers then, as the suspenders averred, in furtherance of their own purposes, and by resolutions adopted in December 1838, cut off all parties, but without notice from the society, who were in arrear. In consequence of this step, the association came to be reduced to eight in number; two of whom, Messrs Brown and Mackie, are since dead. The remaining parties, several of whom only lately came to be introduced into the society, were—Alexander Malcolm, the box-master; his son, John Malcolm; his brother-in-law, George Oliphant; Robert Tod, Oliphant's nephew; Thomas Bell, Tod's brother-in-law; John Bell, son of Thomas Bell, and Tod's nephew;—Malcolm senior and George Oliphant being married to sisters.

After these measures, the parties now in the management were proceeding to realise and sell the property and effects of the society, for the declared purpose of winding up and apportioning the fund among themselves. In consequence of this the suspenders—who are widows who had been receiving aid from the society, and mariners who had contributed, as they alleged, for a great length of time, but whom the respondents refused any longer to recognise, or to receive their rates,—feeling themselves aggrieved by the proceedings of the respondents, presented this note of suspension, in which they prayed the Court

"to suspend the proceedings complained of, and to interdict, prohibit and discharge the said respondents from dissolving the said Prime-Gilt Box Society, and from selling or disposing of the property belonging to the said Prime-Gilt Box or Prime-Gilt Box Society; as also from appropriating, dividing, or otherwise disposing of the property, funds and effects of the said Prime-Gilt Box, to the private and personal use and benefit of the respondents as individuals."

In their answers the respondents did not deny that the "Prime-Gilt" had existed for upwards of two centuries, and that from the funds in the hands of the managers, received very much in the way pointed out by the suspenders, charity was bestowed on a variety of objects; but it was denied that the society was ever incorporated, or possessed a Seal of Cause, or that, like certain benefit societies, its funds were held exclusively for the objects set forth by the suspenders. In illustration of this they adduced from the extracts in process various instances where the funds had been applied to objects which were not of a charitable nature. It was also denied that common sailors were ever considered as constituent members, though it was admitted that they contributed to the funds; but it was said that these contributions were levied by the masters of their own accord, for the poor, and not under any authority of the society for its behoof; and that latterly the subject had given rise to misunderstandings with the mariners, who refused any longer to allow of any such deductions. The respondents averred that the society was entirely private, and entitled to manage its own concerns by any rules or regulations they thought proper; and that from time to time it had been suggested that a new constitution should be adopted. Thus, in 1786, it was stated that the society had remitted to the box-master and three other members to draw up a new form of laws; that this was not done; but the subject was renewed from time to time, till at last, in 1826, it was resolved, instead of applying to Parliament, which had been in contemplation, that the society should be regulated by private laws, and they accordingly appointed a committee to prepare a set of laws for consideration. New laws were accordingly adopted, and after due intimation, as the respondents averred, received the approbation of the whole constituent members, being eleven in number. Thereafter, in 1839, at a general meeting of the body, five out of the eight members then constituting the society, agreed to wind up the concern, and to realise and divide the funds among the remanent members; and this, the respondents also averred, was resolved upon after due intimation to all parties. They stated that they never intended to deprive any of the complainers who derived benefit from the funds or property of the late association, at the date of dissolution, of any of their rights or privileges; and on the contrary, by their recorded resolutions, the respondents reserved to widows and all others the full benefit derivable by them from the funds of the association. From these resolutions the respondents had no intention of departing; and they would amply secure to these parties the whole benefit which they could have derived from the funds of the association had it remained undissolved. This might be done in various ways; and, inter alia, by purchase of annuities from insurance associations, or the National Security Savings Bank. The respondents stated their readiness to secure the rights of these parties at the sight, and to the satisfaction of the Court.

The suspenders pleaded—1. As the respondents hold the property of the Prime-Gilt Box Society as trustees in trust, not merely for the present members, but also for all those who may have claims on the society, or are entitled to become members thereof, any attempt to dissolve the society, and to appropriate its funds among the respondents individually, is illegal, and ought to be interdicted. 2. In respect they are now endeavouring to sell the property, with a view to the illegal and unjust appropriation of its funds among themselves as individuals, there are sufficient grounds for interdicting the sale. 3. The Prime-Guild or Gilt-Box is an incorporation, and its constituent members are not merely masters but mariners. Its object is the provision of poor and disabled seamen, and the widows and orphans of mariners, with casual support of shipwrecked sailors; and its funds and property having been realised by rates leviable for these specific uses, cannot be legally diverted by its managers into sources of individual gain. 4. The change in the constitution and purposes of the society in 1828, whereby common seamen, from whose earnings contributions had been exacted, and for whose benefit the society was mainly intended, were excluded, was unwarrantable and illegal; and all of them have now, as before, a common interest in insisting for the continuance of the society, and in preventing the gross misapplication of its funds contemplated by the respondents. 5. All and each of the complainers have a sufficient interest to insist in the present proceedings; and, as some of the complainers are present claimants on the fund, the respondents are expressly debarred, by the present regulations of the society, from dissolving it without their consent in writing.

The respondents pleaded—1. The Prime-Gilt Box Association was not a corporation; nor was it by any law, public or private, declared to be a society of perpetual succession or endurance. 2. The members of the association had ample power to make the deed of 1828; and the regulations and stipulations contained in that deed were valid and binding until altered by the members. 3. The constituent members of the association had full power to dissolve it, to convert the joint property into money, to satisfy and provide for payment for all debts and obligations existing against the association, and to divide the residue among the members. 4. The complainers not being members, have no title to object to the dissolution of the association; nor did the 21st article of the contract of 1823 vest in persons having merely a jus crediti in the funds a right to object to the dissolution of the association, and the sale of its property, on the grounds now maintained by the complainers. 5. Neither have the complainers any proper or legitimate interest to object to the respondents' resolution of January 1839, seeing that the full rights of parties deriving, or entitled to derive, benefit from the funds or property of the association at the date of dissolution, are thereby preserved entire and uninjured. 6. The complainers are not entitled to found on alleged grievances of persons who are not complainers or parties to the present suit.

The suspenders also raised a summons of reduction, which was held as repeated in the process of suspension, for the purpose of setting aside the resolutions and proceedings in reference to the dissolution of the Prime-Gilt, and the constitution of the new society, and also of the titles to certain heritage made up in the persons of the new society. The reasons of reduction were much of the same description as the pleas stated in the suspension; but, combined with the reduction, they concluded that it should be declared, "that the pursuers are not in any respect bound thereby (i. e. the new constitution), but are entitled to all the rights, privileges, emoluments, and benefits arising to them as members, widows of members, and contributors to the funds of the said Prime-Gilt Box, as if the said pretended contract, laws and regulations, and minutes, and resolutions, had never been made or entered into; and that the defenders hold the property of the Prime-Gilt Box as trustees, in trust, not merely for the present members, but also for all those who may have claims on the society or incorporation, or are entitled to become members thereof: That the said society is still subsisting for the purposes for which it was originally instituted, and is not dissolved, or in any way put an end to; and that its funds and property are applicable to these original purposes, and not to the private or personal benefit of the defenders."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"29th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the conjoined processes, sustains the title of the pursuers, and decerns: In the suspension, sustains the reasons, and declares the interdict perpetual: In the declarator declares, reduces and decerns, in terms of the libel: Finds the defenders liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that this is a corporation; but he is clear that it is a society, with funds provided for a permanent object, of which funds the defenders are the trustees, and that they cannot appropriate these funds to themselves.

"The precise origin, and purpose, and first constitution of the society, seem to be lost in the obscurity of antiquity; but throughout all the irregularities of above two centuries, it is clear, 1st, That one great object has always been, to provide for the relief of the poor sailors of Kirkcaldy, and their families: 2d, That the contributions have alone been made and taken for this particular purpose, not merely for the relief of the contributors, or of existing sailors, but for the formation of a fund for the relief of this class of persons in all time coming: 3d, That though some of this class may have formed themselves into what they called a society or incorporation, still, quoad the fund, they have always been, and now are, mere trustees.

"The substance of what these trustees (the defenders) have lately done or attempted is, that they have first, by certain new rules in 1828, narrowed the number of the society, till at last it is composed solely of them six selves—so related as to be almost one family—and that, then, they have divided the whole £3000 of which the stock consists, by each taking £500 to himself.

"A court of justice cannot support the managers of a charitable fund in so bold an experiment.

"It is because the Lord Ordinary holds this to be the correct view of the nature of the institution, that he thinks that all the pursuers have a good title.

"The title of the five widows who are actually at present anannuitants on the fund, is clear. Have these annuitants no title to object to the destruction of a fund created partly for their relief? It is said that their interest has been secured, and that if it be not adequately secured, the defenders are ready to do so to the satisfaction of this Court: but so long as they are alarmed, they have a title to complain. The very admission that the Court may control their alleged security, is a recognition of their title to seek the Court's protection. And, moreover, they have a title and interest to have the fund preserved, liable to increase. Future contributions may raise it, and thus augment their annuities; but the defenders prevent this for ever, for they dissolve the society.

"Then there are six or seven sailors, who, it is admitted, did at one time belong even to the society, but who, the defenders say, were justly expelled from failure to pay their dues. The facts as to these expulsions are disputed; but that of Captain Beveridge, who got no notice, is clearly very questionable. But let all these expulsions be assumed to be legal, still they were only expulsions from the society. These persons, being sailors who had long contributed, are of the class for the relief of which all the contributions were taken, and they are entitled to object to their misapplication.

"The four seamen's widows are in a similar position."

The respondents presented a reclaiming note of a qualified nature, praying the Court

"to alter the foregoing interlocutor, in so far as it relates to several title-deeds of heritable property libelled, the resolution of 28th December 1827, and the laws and regulations of the society of 1828, specified in the summons of reduction; and also in so far as the defenders are found personally liable in the expenses of process; to assolisie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, so far as regards these title-deeds, resolutions and laws; and to find the expenses of process payable out of the funds of the Society."

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:

"Of consent, vary the interlocutor reclaimed against, so far as it might be held to reduce and annul in toto the titles to the properties libelled; and find that the writs and titles called for are valid and subsisting, to the extent that they are necessary for supporting the feudal rights standing in the persons of the defenders, or of vassals holding of them: But find that the whole property of the society, heritable and moveable, is held in trust for the society, called the Prime-Gilt Box of Kirkaldy, and the parties now members are entitled to be members thereof, and such parties as may hereafter become members, or as are or may be entitled to derive support or assistance from its funds; and that the defenders are bound to denude of, and convey the property of the society in trust, to such person or persons as the Court may name, and in such terms, and under such conditions as the Court may hereafter direct: Quoad ultra, refuse the reclaiming note, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties farther, and make the necessary inquiries with a view to the adjustment of the rights of parties, in consistency with the nature and purposes of the institution and its altered circumstances: Find the defenders liable in additional expenses; allow an account," &c.

Authority for Respondents.—Prestonpans, 10th February 1801.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. A. Anderson, Patton; H. Tod, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Hector; W. Pollock, S.S.C., Agent.—N. Clerk.—[G. D. F.]

25th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 232.—THE REV. DAVID DEWAR and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. THE REV. JOHN CRUICKSHANK and OTHERS, Defenders.

Process—Expenses—Suspension and Interdict—Church—Implied Condition—Where a party, duly cited in a process of suspension and interdict, allowed the interdict obtained therein in absence against him to become final, and the suspender did not ask expenses, but the respondent afterwards brought a reduction of the process and whole procedure—Held that the defender in the reduction (the suspender) was not bound to go into the merits of the reduction till the pursuer paid him, in the first place, the expenses he had incurred in the process of suspension: the ground of decision apparently being, that it was to be implied that the claim for expenses which the respondent passed from, was relinquished only on condition that the interdict was to be obeyed—not challenged.

The pursuers, who are the minority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie, brought the present action, calling for reduction of the procedure in the application for suspension and interdict presented by the defenders, who are the majority of said Presbytery, the interdict in which became final by interlocutor of Lord Cuninghame, dated 17th March 1840. The proceedings in this suspension are fully reported previously; and it appears that the suspenders were paid the expenses incurred by them, as decreed for—(see ante, Vol. XII. pp. 249, 344.) The pursuers also called for reduction of the procedure following on a second note of suspension and interdict, presented by the same parties on 11th June 1840 (advised 11th July 1840), and which also had become final—(see ante, Vol. XII. p. 635.) It appeared that the Lord Ordinary in this case passed the note, on which the interdict afterwards became final, and of consent found no expenses due. The grounds of the present reduction were, that the proceedings were in absence, and also, that the Court had no jurisdiction in the matters raised by the several suspensions.

The defenders lodged preliminary defences to the action, in which they set forth, that the pursuers were duly cited as parties to the proceedings in the Bill-Chamber and the Court, the interlocutors and decrees in which are now brought under reduction. They made no appearance, but allowed those interlocutors and decrees to be pronounced in absence. The defenders accordingly maintained, that before the pursuers could be heard upon the grounds of the present action, or require the defenders to satisfy the production, they must, in conformity with the established rule of practice, pay the whole of the expenses incurred by the defenders in the Bill-Chamber and the Court, in the proceedings complained of: Smyth, 9th March 1826; 4 Shaw, 397. So soon as this should be done, the defenders would then satisfy the production, and state their defences on the merits of the reduction.

A supplementary reduction of certain other interlocutors was brought by the pursuers, and supplementary defences applicable to it was also lodged, but as the judgment of the Inner-House does not refer to this latter procedure, it is unnecessary at present to refer to it.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"3d March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the parties on the dilatory defences, repels the defence against the original action, and also repels the defence against the supplementary action, in so far as it is dilatory, reserving it, quoad ultra, to be discussed along with the merits.

"Nota.—The expenses sought for from the pursuers, before they be allowed to proceed with the original action, were incurred in two suspensions, in which, though personally cited, the pursuers made no appearance.

"Now, it is admitted that the expenses under one of these have been paid, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders' claim for the expenses under the other is excluded by the terms of the last interlocutor under that suspension (17th March 1840), which, 'of consent of the suspenders, finds no expenses due.'

"The defenders, after thus declining to take expenses, and getting it fixed against themselves that none were due, and possibly allowing thereby the pursuers to continue absent, cannot be allowed to claim expenses now; no more than if these expenses had been found due, and on their own motion, modified, they could now claim a larger sum.

"Whether there be or be not anything in the defence against the supplementary summons, the Lord Ordinary does not say. But he is clear that there is nothing that is properly dilatory."

The defenders reclaimed, stating, that the expenses which they now demanded were those incurred in the second suspension, in which, of consent, the Lord Ordinary had found none due. They argued, that their meaning was, that they consented at the time not to ask expenses provided the respondents (present pursuers) obeyed the interdict, and nothing else; and that it must be implied as a condition, that since they refused to obey it—that is to say, as they had now brought it under challenge—they could only be allowed to do so by paying the costs as a penalty.

The Court

"Recal the interlocutor complained of, and sustain the dilatory defence in the original action of reduction: Find the defenders entitled to the expenses incurred in the discussion of the matters brought under review by their reclaiming note; and allow the account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. R. Bell, Moncreiff; William Young, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Whigham, Pyper; A. Peterkin, S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

29th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 233.—JOHN BLACK, Claimant and Respondent,
v. DANIEL M'FARLANE, Claimant and Advocate.

Debtor and Creditor.—Account.—Submission.—Circumstances in which a clerk to a submission obtained full payment of his account out of a fund consigned by one only of the submitters.

Daniel M'Farlane and Hugh Cameron entered into a submission to Thomas Carmichael and Thomas Aitken. The submission expired without any decree-arbital having been pronounced, and John Black, who had acted as clerk to the submission, claimed payment from the submitters of his account, amounting to £28. 4. 4½. Payment being refused, and Black having arrested M'Farlane's funds, it was agreed to submit the account to the original arbitrators—M'Farlane consigning £28 in their hands to await their decision, and Black discharging the arrestment of his funds. The submission having fallen, the arbitrators brought a multiplepoinding, in which they called M'Farlane and Black as claimants, and consigned the £28 as the fund in medio.

Black pleaded, that the fund in medio was his property, in respect that it had been consigned for the special purpose of liquidating his account; and, more particularly, that he had discharged his arrestment on the faith that it had been consigned for his behoof.

M'Farlane pleaded, that he was entitled to repetition of the consigned money (the object of consignment having been frustrated), or at least, that as Cameron was equally liable for the account, he could not be decerned against for more than his share.

The Sheriff preferred Black; and M'Farlane having advocated, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the record and whole process, approves of the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and remits the cause simpliciter to the Inferior Court; finds the respondent entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has no doubt of the soundness of the Sheriff's judgment.

"The only plea on the part of the advocator which at first sight seems plausible is, that a fund belonging to M'Farlane, as an individual, has been adjudged by the Sheriff to the creditor of a partnership of which he was a member, while Cameron, the other partner, against whom he has relief, was no party to the action in the Inferior Court.

"But the answer made seems to be quite satisfactory. Mr Black, the respondent, had at one time an ordinary action against both parties. On that libel he raised arrestment, and attached M'Farlane's funds. Thereafter, M'Farlane, by himself alone, consigned the fund in the hands of the raisers of the multiplepoinding, and empowered them to decide on Mr Black the respondent's claim. As they differed in opinion, and gave no decision, no other course could be followed than that taken here, viz., to bring a process of multiplepoinding to try Black's right to the consigned fund. In such a case, it seems clear that M'Farlane, the consigner, was bound to take the same place and onus in the process that he previously undertook in the submission, and to meet the respondent singly, in so far as he chose to oppose his claim.

"The Lord Ordinary's idea is this:—The fund in medio, by deposition with the arbiters, was specially appropriated to Mr Black's claim, as clerk of a prior submission, if he had any legal claim under his action. The latter point was referred to the arbiters; and when they declined, or could not agree upon it, the claim must be determined by the law. The respondent could never be deprived of his preference over a fund deposited for his behoof, in consequence of a discharged arrestment, unless his claim itself was found to be competently extinguished.

"The advocator pleads, that it is hard his funds should be taken in payment of a company debt, without his getting any contribution from his copartner. But if the advocator wishes relief against his copartner, he must just secure that in the same way he would have done if the arbiters had decided against him in the submission. He must then have raised an action of relief against Cameron, and he is not put to more hardship by the proceedings in this process. It appears that Cameron resides beyond the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and it possibly might have required a process before the Supreme Court to have had him and the advocator competently cited in the same action. That would have been an oppressive step for the respondent to take unnecessarily; and accordingly, it does not appear that the advocator insisted in limine, in the present action, that Cameron should be cited. If he had, the plea does not seem well founded.

"On the merits of the case, as well as the form, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is well founded. He cannot have a doubt that the clerk of a submission, which lapses by an irreconcilable difference between the arbiters, or from any other cause not imputable to the clerk, has a legal claim against the parties for his professional labour and expenses, and no grounds are assigned in the record for holding that claim as not maintainable in the present case."

M'Farlane reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—For John Black, Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Macfarlane; John Duncan, W.S., Agent.—For Daniel M'Farlane, G. Bell; William Muir, S.S.C., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

29th June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 234.—DAVID ANDERSON, Pursuer, v. JAMES WRIGHT, Defender.

Bill of Exchange—Indorsation—Assignment—Obligation—Stamp—The drawer of a bill of exchange discounted it at a bank, and thereafter retired it with the proceeds of another bill discounted by the bank. He afterwards transferred it to the bank agent, with an acknowledgment indorsed upon it, that it had been retired with the funds of the bank agent, for repayment of which he, the drawer, bound himself with the acceptor. In an action by the bank agent against the acceptor—Held that this was not an indorsation to the bank agent, but a separate obligation, which, 1st, was not binding on the acceptor, in respect he was not proved to have authorised the drawer to grant it; 2d, was not, as an obligation, receivable in evidence, or actionable, in respect of not being duly stamped; 3d, not being a document in re mercatoria, could not prove its own date; and, 4th, could not be regarded, and was not libelled, as an assignment, nor stamped as such.

Sequel of case ante, Vol. XII. pp. 547-550, which see.

Since the previous report of this case the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"25th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, and having thereafter called the case, Finds that it is now a settled point in the cause, that 'the pursuer is not entitled to hold the bill in question with the privileges of a bona fide onerous indorsee, or to maintain action upon it against the defender otherwise than in the right of James Miller the drawer thereof, and subject to all objections competent to the defender against the said James Miller.' (Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor of 28th January, adhered to by the Court, 17th June 1840): Finds it, moreover, to be legally established by the evidence already in process, that the said bill having been discounted by Miller with the Western Bank, it was, on the 7th July 1834 (at which time it lay past due and unretired), paid to the bank by Miller, and so came into the possession of Miller as a retired bill: Finds, that up to this time the pursuer had never had right to said bill, and that if he now have such right, he must have acquired the same by some act of transfer on the part of Miller of a date posterior to the said 7th July 1834: Finds that the only title by which he alleges himself to have so acquired right, as the same is set forth in his libelled summons, is, 1st, The said bill itself, as having been 'indorsed by the said James Miller to the complainant;' and 2d, 'The said James Miller's holograph obligation on the back thereof, of date the 5th day of July 1834.' But finds, as to the first, that the said bill was never indorsed by Miller to the pursuer,—the only indorsation having been an indorsation by Miller to the bank, and that indorsation having become functio officio, and extinct when the bill was retired from the bank with the funds of Miller,—the pursuer himself being in the knowledge of its having been so retired: And as to the second, finds that it is in no sense to be considered as an indorsation of the bill at all, but is a distinct and separate obligation per se, whereby Miller is made to 'bind and oblige himself, along with the acceptor, for the amount of the bill and interest thereon from this date till paid;' Finds, more especially as to this obligation, 1st, That even if valid otherwise, it is not binding on the defender, who is not proved to have given any authority to Miller to execute the same in his behalf: 2d, That as an obligation apart from the bill, it is not receivable in evidence, and cannot be read by the Court, in respect of its not being duly stamped: 3d, That it is not such a document as is entitled to privilege as a writing in re mercatoria, and so, inter alia, does not prove its date; and that, moreover, the date which it actually bears, viz., 5th July 1834, is proved by the evidence already in process not to be a true date, the bill upon that date being still in the hands of the bank unretired, and only having been so retired on the 7th July, being two days thereafter: 4th, That neither is it habile to prove the averment expressed in it, that the pursuer had advanced his own funds to retire the bill, this being but the averment of Miller, plainly in arrangement with the pursuer, and it being, moreover, proved by evidence in process, which the pursuer cannot repudiate, that the bill was paid to the bank by other means: Finally, that in the most favourable view of the said writing, it is not to be regarded as an assignment of the bill, and indeed is not so libelled on, but is a substantive obligation to pay the amount of the bill, and can competently only be so dealt with. Besides, that even if it were to be regarded as an assignment, it is not stamped as such, and therefore can receive no effect in judgment: Finds, in these circumstances, that the pursuer has failed to substantiate his title on either of the grounds libelled: Finds, separatim, that in the absence of legal evidence as to the date of his acquiring right to the said bill as alleged, the legal onus of which proof lies with the pursuer, and still more in the absence of any evidence that the pursuer's right as constituted by force of the said obligation, viewed in the light of an assignment to the said bill, was ever intimated to the defender, so as to have the legal effect of an intimated assignment, there are no grounds for presuming in favour of any date prior to the time when notice was first given to the defender that the bill was outstanding; and that this not having taken place until after Miller had declared his bankruptcy, and communicated to his creditors a holograph statement of his debts, in which the very bill now in question is set forth as a debt due by him to the defender, thereby dealing with it as having been from the first an accommodation to himself, the pursuer is not entitled, in the face of such an acknowledgment, to call in question the fact that the said bill was from the first a bill granted without value as between the defender and Miller: Finds more especially, that the pursuer having himself pleaded upon the state of matters as thus declared and acknowledged by Miller, and having done this absolutely and unqualifiedly, without any contrary protestation on his part, not only in the record as closed upon condescendence and answers (condescendence, arts. 12 and 13), but likewise in various passages in the replies which he subscribes as 'drawn by himself,' thereby making the same his proper writ, it is no longer open to him to dispute the state of the fact as thus set forth: Finds, therefore, that it has been sufficiently established (even supposing the onus in the circumstances to have lain with the defender) that Miller was not creditor in the bill for value: And upon the whole matter, assolizes the defender simpliciter from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds him entitled to his expenses both in this Court and the Court below; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary, in the greater number of the above findings, has but embodied the views upon which Lord Moncreiff (with whom he in all points unqualifiedly concurs) rested his judgment of 28th January 1840; and he has done this mainly in order to apply these views to the questions now more immediately decided; 1st, As regards the pursuer's own title to the debt; and 2d, As regards the party on whom the legal onus falls to be imposed, of proving ultra (if that be necessary) how far the bill was originally held by Miller for value or not.

"Some of the points that have been made the subject of findings, are possibly more clear than others. But if it be once determined that the pursuer took nothing by the blank indorsation, it is thought to be pretty plain that the obligation subsequently written by Miller on the back of the bill, cannot be received as affording (in huc statu at least) legal evidence of title. The case might have been more doubtful had the pursuer chosen to stamp the document (whether as an obligation or assignment), and thereafter undertaken a proof, 1st, of Miller's authority to subscribe for the defender; and, 2d, of the actual advance of funds on the pursuer's part. But even then, the false date assigned by him to the alleged transaction, and the contradiction otherwise afforded by the evidence already in process, to his allegations as to the means by which the bill was retired, must have left him in a position of the greatest difficulty.

"The Lord Ordinary had at first some hesitation as to the second alternative branch of the interlocutor. He is aware that, 'in the matter of probation,' it is not open to prove by the oath of the cedent, so as to affect the assignee, after the cedent has been fully divested by intimated assignment.—Ersk. III. 5, 9. Stair, III. 1, 18; and he felt the full force of this analogy, as applied to the case of a writing under the cedent's hand, not obtained and not existing until after the like divestiture. If, therefore, he could have held the writing on the back of the bill equivalent to an assignation, and had seen satisfactory evidence that it truly bore date, and had been intimated prior to Miller's declaration of bankruptcy, when (in the holograph state of his debts) he acknowledged the bill in dispute to be an accommodation, the Lord Ordinary would perhaps have hesitated before finding such an admission by Miller to be per se probative of the fact. But it is thought the uncertainty, in the first place, in which the pursuer has left the case as to the real date of the obligation, but secondly, and still more, the total absence of any evidence whatever as to the supposed assignation thereby effected having been intimated until some time posterior to Miller's bankruptcy, by which time Miller's written admission of the true relation in which he stood towards the bill had gone forth, must operate here as most important considerations. For even the oath of the cedent is operative against the assignee if emitted 'before the assignation be intimated.'—Ersk. and Stair, sup. citing Pitfodds, 15th February 1662, D. 12,454. And seeing that, 'except in the matter of probation, all exceptions competent against the cedent before the assignation or intimation, are relevant against the assignee' (Stair, III. 1, 20), and that, even in the matter of probation, they may be established by the cedent's oath if emitted before intimation, it would seem to follow that the cedent's writ, executed and given forth before the assignation is intimated, must be no less operative in a question with the assignee.

"The part of the interlocutor most open to observation is, perhaps, its concluding finding as to the effect of the pursuer's admissions upon the record, and in his replies. And had the matter stood simply upon these, without any thing else to fortify and bear them out in the other circumstances of the case, the Lord Ordinary might possibly have deemed it advisable, before answer as to this particular branch of the case, to have allowed the pursuer a proof prout de jure, with a view to strengthen, if he could, his general position. This, however, would have implied the necessity of a jury trial, and therefore was not to be resorted to unless of strong necessity. Accordingly, as the judgment otherwise had been given for the defender, and as the case, even in this aspect of it, derived, from the important bearing of the whole other facts and circumstances, a strength which it might not have possessed if standing isolated and alone, the Lord Ordinary thought it just as well to exhaust the matter by a finding expressive of his views on this point also. He is certainly satisfied (with the former Lord Ordinary), 'from the statements in the record, that the pursuer cannot seriously allege that the bill was a bill for value as between the drawer and acceptor.'"

The respondent reclaimed. At advising,

Patton, for the respondent, stated, that they had presented a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but as they considered that that judgment was a necessary sequence arising out of Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor of 28th January 1840, it was hopeless for them now to contend with the Court that Lord Ivory's interlocutor was ill founded. If Lord Moncreiff were wrong, then Lord Ivory's interlocutor would also be erroneous. But there was no other way for them to obtain a review of Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor, in the House of Lords, than by now reclaiming against Lord Ivory's, which was deduced from it; and accordingly, a reclaiming note had been presented, to enable the respondent to appeal, by their Lordships refusing it.

The Court were for refusing the note,—when G. G. Bell and Cowan, for the advocate, requested that some notice should be taken by the Court of this in the record, as, if not, it would appear in the House of Lords that the case had been decided without hearing parties; and the House of Lords would, besides, see no grounds on which the Court here proceeded in refusing the reclaiming note, and might consider it was done without full consideration, and accordingly make a remit, which would be attended with great inconvenience.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The Court cannot do what is now asked, nor can we ask the party to put in a minute to show what they have now said. The reclaimer had no course open to him but the one he has taken—to obtain a review of Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor. There could be no review in the House of Lords of a Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and accordingly, the reclaimer has followed the proper course. But I have no hesitation in saying, for the satisfaction of the parties, and I am satisfied I speak the mind of the Court, when I say that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, both in point of fact and in point of law. We cannot enter this on the record, but it will appear in the reports; and I have no doubt that will be enough to show that we have fully considered the case. I read over the whole of the papers last night.

Lord Moncreiff and Lord Medwyn concurred.

Lord Medwyn.—What has now been stated by your Lordship is enough; and I am sure, if it appears in the appeal cases, it will not be disputed.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court refused the interlocutor.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Patton; H. Tod, W.S., Agent.—Alt. G. G. Bell, Cowan; Campbell and Traill, W.S., Agents.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

22d June 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 235.—WILLIAM F. HOME, Esq., and DAVID MILNE, Esq., Appellants, v. JOHN PRINGLE (William Pringle's Trustee), JAMES HUNTER and OTHERS, Respondents.

Trust—Trustees, Liability of.—Factor—Principal and Agent—A trust-deed of a very extensive property, and involving very considerable trouble, provided the three trustees named in £100, to be divided among them annually, as a gratification for trouble. The deed contained a clause of the following nature: The trustees "shall noways be obliged to do diligence, otherwise than as he or they shall think fit, nor shall he or they be liable for omissions, but only each of them for himself, and his own actual and personal intromissions, nor shall they be farther liable for their factors than that they shall be habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon their office." The trustees named in the deed appointed one of their own number to be factor, another to be cashier, and a third to be country agent; and they appointed an accountant, with a salary, to audit the accounts annually. The factor and cashier, by authority of the trustees, were to get an annual salary for these offices: that of the cashier amounted to £50. The trust-deed gave no authority for the creation of these offices in the persons of the trustees themselves. Considerable balances were allowed to accumulate in the factor's hands from year to year, with which circumstance the trustees were acquainted. Ultimately the factor became bankrupt, with a large balance in his hands—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That the trustees were not liable to make up the deficiency; and, 2. That the fact of one of the trustees being cashier, with a salary, and thereby having a special superintendence over the factor, did not of itself, without proof of wilful misconduct, infer liability against him.

The late Mr Home of Wedderburn, with a view to the settlement of his estates of Billie and Paxton, and of other property which he destined to be conveyed with them, executed an entail and relative trust-disposition on 16th July 1816, in favour of David Renton of Greystonelees, William Pringle, one of the deputy-clerks of Session, and John Renton, W.S., each of those parties to be sole trustee in succession; but with a declaration, that failing the trustees, or their nomination of a successor, the trust should not thereby become void, but should subsist and devolve upon, and vest in the Sheriff-clerk of the county of Berwick. The trust was executed generally for payment of annuities, legacies and donations; for payment of public burdens on the estate, and of debts which the testator left to a very large amount; for the accumulation of the rents and revenues of the trust, in order to replace, by the purchase of land of equal value, any part of the estate which the trustees, under powers to that effect, might think it necessary or expedient to sell, in order to the liquidation or payment of debt; and finally for denuding of the whole in favour of such heirs of entail, and under such conditions as the granter should appoint in any deed of nomination which he might please to execute; the heir of entail, if major, being put in immediate possession of the mansion-house and estate of Paxton.

The trustees were to have power to "name and remove factors from time to time, with such powers, and liable to such diligences as the said trustee or trustees shall think proper, and to give such salaries to the factors, and gratifications to any other persons who shall be employed in relation to the premises, as the said trustee or trustees shall think expedient at the time, and to settle accounts annually with the said factors, and upon payment of what shall be found due, to exonerate and discharge them of their intromissions and management; and within six months after each clearance with the factors, the said David Renton, William Pringle, and John Renton, or other trustee or trustees acting in the order above mentioned, for the time, shall make up the accounts of his or their intromissions during the period of the factors' accounts, and get the same examined and approved of by an accountant of character in Edinburgh; and if the account is approved of by the said accountant, such approbation is hereby declared to operate as a full exoneration of the said trustee or trustees for their whole management during the currency of said account."

The following protecting clause was inserted for behoof of the trustees:

"It is here further provided and declared, that the said David Renton, William Pringle, and John Renton, or other trustee or trustees named, or to be named as aforesaid, shall noways be obliged to do diligence, otherways than as he or they shall think fit, nor shall he or they be liable for omissions, but only each of them for himself, and his own actual and personal intromissions, nor shall they be farther liable for their factors, than that they shall be habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon their office."

The second purpose of the trust was thus expressed:

"For payment of all the public burdens affecting the estates hereby conveyed, and the due and lawful interest of all bonded debts, or other debts due by me; and of all necessary charges and expenses to be disbursed by the said trustees or their factors, in executing this trust-right; which charges and expenses are to be taken on the honest word of the acting trustee or trustees for the time, and not to be subject to challenge on any account or pretext whatever: and for payment of such salaries and gratifications as the said trustees shall give to factors, lawyers, arbiters, or others, who shall be employed with relation to the management of this present trust; and of the yearly sum of £100 Sterling, as a gratification to the acting trustee or trustees for their trouble in the management; it being hereby declared, that in case there be at any time more than one acting trustee, the said yearly sum of £100 Sterling shall be equally divided among the said acting trustees."

A deed of nomination of heirs was executed of the same date with the trust-disposition, but afterwards another deed of nomination was executed in favour of the present pursuer, Mr Home; and on 6th August 1819, a supplementary trust-deed was executed, recalling the nomination of trustees in the deed of 1816, and conveying the estates of the truster

"to and in favour of William Molle of Mains, the said William Pringle, and James Hunter (defenders to this action), writer in Dunse, and to the survivor or survivors of them who shall accept. Declaring, that a majority of my said trustees, accepting and surviving, shall at all times form a quorum for executing the purposes of the said trust, ratifying and approving the said nomination, and declaring that the said William Molle, William Pringle and James Hunter, as trustees foresaid, shall have the same powers, and be subject to the same declarations, conditions, provisions, and reservations, as if named and appointed as such in græmio of the foresaid trust-right, to which this supplementary trust-deed has an express relation, excepting in so far as altered by these presents."

Mr Pringle, who was a depute-clerk of Session, was the personal friend of the truster, and he was, it appeared, his creditor to the amount of £9000. Mr Molle was a deputy-lieutenant of the county of Berwick, where he possessed extensive estates in right of succession, and practised as a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh. He enjoyed a close intimacy with the trustees, and at the time of accepting the office of trustee, he was habit and repute solvent, and continued in exuberant credit with the public till the very day of his bankruptcy, in the end of 1830. Mr Hunter, like the other trustees, was the friend of Mr Home, and was in practice as a country writer at Dunse, in the vicinity of Mr Home's residence.

In February 1820, Mr Home died, on which event the three trustees accepted and entered on their office. In virtue of the settlements, it appeared that the pursuer, who was a practising attorney at Berwick-on-Tweed, was the first-named substitute under an entail which the truster took his trustees bound to execute, after the purposes of the trust were accomplished.

The minute of the first meeting of trustees (17th March 1820), bears,

"that the trustees hereby appoint Mr Pringle to be their ~~cashier~~; Mr Molle to be factor; Messrs Molle, Turnbull and Brown, writers to the Signet, to be agents in Edinburgh, and Mr Hunter to be agent before the Sheriff, Commissary, and other Courts in Berwickshire, and they directed a factory to be made out in favour of Mr Molle."

Mr Hunter was prevented attending this meeting, but he acquiesced in the proceedings. A factory was executed in March 1820, in common form, in favour of Molle; but no writing was prepared nominating Pringle or Hunter to the respective functions assigned to them by the trustees. The trustees likewise appointed James Brown, accountant in Edinburgh, to be the auditor under the trust; and he directed the several parties under the trust to make up their accounts to the 31st December annually, and to transmit them to him for examination and approval. In the appointment to the different offices of factor and cashier, the trustees had not fixed the quantum of remuneration, but left it to the judgment of the auditor, who accordingly fixed the factor's salary at £180 per annum, the cashier's at £50, and by a reference to a third party, the auditor was to be allowed £73. 10s. per annum. These several sums were annually paid over to the different parties, so long as they continued in the management.

In consequence, as it was stated by Pringle and Hunter, of their calling upon Molle to pay up a considerable balance due by him to the trust, and his failing so to do, or evading payment, they, in October 1830, executed a revocation of the factory in his favour. This step had the effect of obliging Molle, very unexpectedly, to declare himself bankrupt.

The present action was accordingly brought by W. F. Home, as the party beneficially interested in the trust and entail, and likewise in name of D. Milne, advocate, who had been appointed judicial factor on the estate being sequestrated subsequent to the crisis occasioned by Molle's bankruptcy. The summons contains, inter alia, the following statement:

"That on the 22d March 1820, a deed of factory was granted by the said trustees in favour of the said William Molle, constituting him factor over the said trust-estates, with power to collect the whole rents, profits, and issues thereof, and taking the said William Molle, as factor, bound 'to hold just count and reckoning with us for his whole intromissions in virtue hereof, at all times, when required, and shall make payment to us, or our order, of whatever balance shall then appear to be owing by him to us.' In virtue of which appointment the said William Molle had personal intromissions with the trust-funds to the amount of about £8000 yearly; but he did not find, nor was he required to find, any caution or security whatever for his intromissions and management: That his co-trustees had no annual settlement of accounts, or clearance with the said William Molle, their factor, nor did they ever insist for payment of the large balances which his co-trustees knew were improperly retained by him, and applied to his own private purposes; although it was the duty of the saids William Pringle and James Hunter to insist on an accounting, and on a clearance with the factor annually, upon payment of the balance due by him; more especially, it was the duty of the said William Pringle, as cashier, to superintend the cash operations of the factor in the most rigid manner, and to insist for, and to obtain from the factor, such an accounting and clearance annually: That at intervals of years, but not in terms of the direction and provision of the trust-deed to that effect, the trust-accounts were laid by the saids William Molle, William Pringle, and James Hunter, before an accountant in Edinburgh, who, in April 1828, wrote to the said William Molle:—'I beg to mention that I have now completed my audit of the Billie trust-accounts for the year eighteen hundred and twenty-six, and prepared the usual states; but before closing them, it will be necessary that some arrangement be come to for the settlement of the balance on your accounts. It occurs to me, that the best plan is for you now to pay up the balance with interest, which I can state in a note in my report. Feeling the responsible and delicate situation in which I am placed, I could not doquet the accounts as approving of them, till a settlement takes place.' That the balances due by the said William Molle on the accounts of 1826, and years preceding, were never paid, and the amount of them continued yearly to increase, as was well known to the saids William Pringle and James Hunter, without either payment or caution ever being required by his co-trustees, who were perfectly aware of their extent and misapplication, and who, nevertheless, wilfully and purposely violated their duty, by abstaining from calling the said William Molle to account, and from dismissing him from the said office of factor, upon his failure to account duly in terms of the trust: That the said William Molle was, notwithstanding this defalcation, and his embarrassed circumstances, known to his co-trustees, most improperly and culpably permitted by his co-trustees, the saids William Pringle and James Hunter, to continue in the office of factor, and to intromit with the trust-funds, without any caution or control whatever, and the grossest system of malversation and neglect prevailed, with the knowledge and connivance of the said William Pringle and James Hunter, in every department of the trust."

The summons then libels several letters passing between Pringle and Hunter, tending to show their knowledge of Molle's circumstances, and then it proceeds:

"That at length the said James Hunter and William Pringle, who had been guilty of the most gross and culpable negligence, and of wilful and corrupt violation of their duties as trustees, began to take serious alarm on their own accounts, and deemed it prudent to recal the factory granted to the said William Molle, which they did by a letter addressed to him by them, as late as the 29th October 1830."

In consequence of that communication the libel stated, that Molle intimated his bankruptcy, and confessed to a balance due by him to the trust of £5729,

"after most unwarrantably taking credit to the amount of about £11,000 for salaries and emoluments to trustees, factor, cashier, and law-agents (the whole duties of which offices he and the other trustees had grossly abused and neglected), so that after the disallowance of these illegal and unjustifiable charges, which were made under the pretence of being a recompense for business and duties honestly performed, and for supporting interests, which, in truth, were wholly neglected and betrayed, the balance due to the trust-estate, at the period of the said William Molle's bankruptcy, was £16,729, (exclusive altogether of fraudulent transactions with debtors to the trust-estate, which the said James Hunter himself judicially stated at £9072.)"

The summons concluded for payment of the £5729, and farther, of £11,000

"improperly taken credit for by the said trustees in the name of salaries, and as reimbursement in the alleged management of the said estate, and for discharging the duties of trustees, cashiers, factors, and agents, which, in truth, they abandoned and neglected, and for accountants and others who were not employed in terms of the trust, or for its purposes, with interest of the several sums charged by the said trustees in name of salary to trustees, cashier, factors, and others, as aforesaid, since the said sums were respectively received by them, until payment thereof."

Defences were lodged to this action in name of the representatives of Pringle and Hunter,—these parties having meantime deceased. A record was made up, in the course of which documentary evidence was lodged by all parties, extending to upwards of five hundred pages of print. Among the documents produced, the trust-accounts, for the period embraced down to Molle's bankruptcy, were lodged in process, audited by Mr Brown.

The gross rental of the estate amounted to about £8000; the personal funds to £21,000, and the debts to about £68,000. It was stated, that the period at which the accounts had to be rendered to Mr Brown, viz., the 31st December, was attended with inconvenience, and that much misapprehension existed as to the apparent large balances, seemingly in the hands of the factor as of that date. There were on the estate about one hundred feuars, and from seventy to eighty tenants, and in most instances, the rents were payable at Candlemas and Lammas.

The following is a list of the balances stated to have been in the hands of the factor, as at 31st December of each year:—31st December 1822, £983; 1823, £764; 1824, £910; 1825, £2258; 1826, £1970; 1827, £1851; 1828, £2172; 1829, £1634; 1830, £3775. In regard to these balances, parties entered at length into statements and arguments, either to show that they ought not to have existed at all, or to explain their existence as at these dates; but it seems sufficient to advert to such of those statements only as will illustrate the views of the Court and the principle of decision. It appeared from notes issued by the auditor to the trustees, as well as from notes appended by him to the accounts which were not settled on the expiry of each year, but at considerable distances of time after the 31st December in every year, that the auditor made them aware of the existence of such balances. In June 1828, the auditor wrote Mr Pringle, that the accounts for 1826 were extended, and ready for closing, whenever a settlement of the factory balance was provided for. In consequence of this, Pringle wrote to Molle, calling on him to pay up the amount. In March 1829, Mr Brown wrote to Pringle in a similar strain, as to the then balance of £1971. In September 1830, Mr Pringle wrote Hunter in regard to the state of the trust, and expressed himself in a way which, the pursuer maintained, afforded direct evidence of Pringle's doubt of Molle's solvency; for he expressed himself distressed in regard to the balance in Molle's hands, and urged Hunter to address Molle on the subject. These notices by the auditor regarding the balances, were addressed to Pringle, and appended to the accounts, down to within a short time of Molle's bankruptcy. It further appeared, that in April 1830, when the balance seemed to have been largest, Pringle, at Molle's request, delayed sending in his accounts for crop and year 1829 to the auditor, till those of Molle were ready. On 29th April 1829, and previous to this time, Hunter had expressed from the country, great anxiety to see the accounts, and in May 1830, he complained to Mr Brown grievously of being kept in ignorance of the trust-affairs. It was only about the end of June that Mr Brown expressed himself as likely to complete the accounts, and call the annual meeting; but the accounts were not completed for a much longer period, and it was only on 21st September the annual meeting appears to have been held; and on perusing the account, Pringle wrote to Hunter the letter of 27th September, already referred to. When the large balance in Molle's hands was then ascertained, Pringle and Hunter wrote, individually and jointly, very urgent demands to get security or payment, and in consequence of their entreaties, Mr Molle's partner, on 30th October 1830, inclosed to Hunter, Molle's resignation, and stated that he meant to execute a trust-deed. Measures were then on the point of being taken against Molle, to benefit the trust-estate; but his estates were meantime sequestrated.

The pursuer pleaded—(1.) The late William Pringle and James Hunter, in consequence of having appointed their co-trustee, William Molle, to be factor, and without requiring him to find caution, and of their culpable neglect in not duly calling him to account, and allowing large balances to remain in his hands at his free disposal, were responsible for whatever sums he may, upon his bankruptcy, have been due to the estate. The said William Pringle was farther liable for the deficiencies of the said William Molle, in respect of his having held the office of cashier, and having culpably failed in his duty, as such, in calling the said William Molle to account for his intromissions as factor. (2.) The allowance given by the trustees to their co-trustee, Mr Molle, as factor, was unwarrantable under the trust, and exorbitant, and the allowance to Mr Pringle as cashier, and to other officers appointed by them under the trust, if not unwarrantable under the trust, were exorbitant in point of amount, or at least, one and all of the said allowances were not exigible, in respect of the duties of the offices to which they were attached, not having been duly and faithfully performed; and which last ground of objection is also applicable to the allowances charged by the said parties as trustees; and therefore, and for one or other of these reasons, Messrs Pringle and Hunter were bound to account, either for the whole sums intromitted with, whether by them or by Mr Molle, without deduction of any part of these allowances, or without deduction of the greater portion of them. Or at all events, if credit is to be given for these allowances, or any part of them, it can only be upon the footing of the trust-estate being fully indemnified for the balances due by Mr Molle, and its being placed in the same situation in which it would have stood, had the said several parties diligently and faithfully discharged the duties of the offices, for the due performance of which the said allowances are charged.

Pringle's representatives pleaded—(1.) This action, as one of count and reckoning, ought to be dismissed; because, first, The accounts have, in terms of the trust-deed, been submitted to "an accountant of character in Edinburgh," and examined, approved of, and docketed by him, and they cannot now be re-examined, and the doquets set aside, because the trust-deed declares that the approbation of the accountant is to operate as a full exoneration "to the said trustee or trustees of their whole management during the currency of the accounts." And, secondly, The whole trust-accounts which are in process, in so far as the late Mr Pringle was concerned, were properly vouched, the allowances therein charged reasonable, and fixed on reference to accountants, and because the entire management of the trustees was correct and judicious. (2.) As an action for payment of any balance said to be due by the late Mr Pringle, as cashier, under the trust, the action ought to be dismissed, because no balance was due by him, but, on the contrary, when he resigned the office, a balance was due to him of £59. 7s. 8½d. (3.) As an action directed against Mr Pringle's representatives, for payment of the balance due by Mr Molle, it ought to be dismissed; because, first, The pursuer is barred, by personal exception (alluding to the fact of the pursuer having attended the meeting when Molle and Pringle were severally chosen factor and cashier; but the pursuer, according to his statement, had merely attended to hear what was done), from objecting to Mr Molle's appointment as factor, by having concurred in that appointment: Second, The trust-deed declares, that the trustees shall not "be farther liable for their factors than that they shall be habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon their office;" and Mr Molle was habit and repute in good credit, not only at the time when he was appointed factor, but continued to be in credit to the day of his failure: Third, The trust-deed also declares, that the trustees "shall noways be obliged to do diligence otherwise than as he or they shall think fit:" Fourth, The trust-deed farther declares, that the trustees shall not "be liable for omissions, but only each of them for himself, and his own actual and personal intromissions;" and, fifth, Because all reasonable diligence was used by Mr Pringle to recover the balances due by Mr Molle.

In these pleas Hunter's representatives generally concurred, pleading separately, (1.) That there being a separate appointment of cashier under the trust, in whose nomination the pursuer concurred, and whose duty it was to superintend the factor, and levy and invest the balances due or accruing upon his accounts, any responsibility for these balances that may exist, must lie with the cashier or his representatives, and in no respect with the late Mr Hunter or his representatives. (2.) Even if it could be supposed that any responsibility lay with the late Mr Hunter for the balance due on Mr Molle's factory accounts, he sufficiently discharged himself of that responsibility by adopting every step that was necessary, prudent, or practicable, under the circumstances, for preventing the existence or increase of that balance, and for recovering it when ascertained. (3.) Under the facts, circumstances, and correspondence above set forth, there are no relevant grounds in law or justice, on which a personal liability can be raised up, or inferred against the late Mr Hunter, for the balance due on Mr Molle's factory accounts; and the pursuer having totally failed to specify or condescend on any such grounds, or to state a relevant case in support of the conclusions of his summons, the defenders ought to be assolizied therefrom, with full costs. (4.) The alleged balances claimed by the pursuer, as due on Mr Molle's factory accounts, are fictitious, and grossly exaggerated; and the pursuer's objections to the particular items referred to by him, especially the allowances to the factor, cashier, and law-agents, under the trust, are wholly unfounded, unwarrantable and in direct opposition to the terms of the trust-deed itself on which he founds.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, and appended a note which contains a resumé of the whole case:

" 17th March 1836.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the closed record between the pursuers and the representatives of the late William Pringle, depute-clerk of Session, and of the late James Hunter, writer in Dunse, and having also considered the process and productions, Finds, that by the settlements of the late George Home of Wedderburn and Paxton, William Molle, writer to the Signer, the late William Pringle, and the late James Hunter, were appointed trustees for carrying those settlements into effect: Finds, that on the 17th of March 1820, being the first meeting of the said trustees after the trustor's death, William Molle was appointed factor, and the said William Pringle cashier, each with a salary, in addition to the sum allowed to them by the trust-deed for 'their trouble in the management': Finds, that in virtue of this appointment, Mr Molle had large intromissions with the rents of the trust-estate: Finds, that from December 1822, large annual balances were due by the factor on his intromissions, and were never fully paid up: Finds that the management, in terms of the above-mentioned appointments, continued until the 29th of October 1830, when the said factory was recalled by the co-trustees, the late William Pringle and the late James Hunter: Finds, that on the following day, the bankruptcy of the said William Molle was declared, and that a large balance was then due by the said William Molle, as factor to the trust-estate, amounting, according to the pursuers' statement, to the sum of £5729 Sterling: Finds, that the object of the first conclusion of the present summons, is to fix upon the defenders, the representatives of the said William Pringle and of the said James Hunter, a liability for the said balance: Finds that the said late William Pringle being not only a trustee, but having been appointed cashier with an additional salary, undertook in that double character the special duty, and had the special means of superintending and controlling the actings and the accounts of the factor and co-trustee, Mr Molle: Finds it established by the documents in process, that the late William Pringle was apprised of the factor's irregularity in failing to pay up and account for the annual balances of his intromissions: Finds that the said William Pringle, though thus aware of the factor Mr Molle's violation of his duty, took no steps, either by requiring caution, or insisting for payment, or recalling the factory, for securing the trust-estate against the consequences of the irregularities of the factor, of which he was so cognisant: Finds, that in these circumstances, the late William Pringle did incur a liability for the loss ultimately occasioned to the trust-estate by the failure of the said factor, William Molle: Therefore, finds the defenders, the representatives of the said William Pringle, liable for the balance due by the said William Molle as factor, and appoints the case to be called, that this balance may be precisely ascertained, but assolizies the said representatives from the other conclusions of the libel, and decerns; and in regard to the defenders, the representatives of the late James Hunter, assolizies them from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds them entitled to their expenses, and allows an account thereof to be given in, and to be taxed by the auditor.

" Note.—There are various conclusions in this summons which present no difficulty, and which, indeed, were hardly touched on in the argument before the Lord Ordinary.

" 1st, Considering the large discretionary powers conferred by the trust-deed on the trustees, in regard to the expenses of management, the Lord Ordinary sees no ground for questioning the amount of the salaries allowed to the cashier, factors or agents; upon which it may also be remarked, that, comparing the present system of management followed by the pursuers themselves with that under the trust, the former is considerably the more expensive of the two. As to the appointment to those offices of persons holding the situation of trustees, the Lord Ordinary has to observe, that the impropriety, inexpediency and hazard of such a course, is well exemplified in the present case. Considering the evident consequences of such nominations, by which the interest of the same individual, as an officer under the trust, may, and in many cases must be placed in opposition to his duty as trustee, much might be said against their legality. But, taking into view the notoriety of the practice, and the extent to which it has been carried in this country without any attempt at challenge, the Lord Ordinary does not consider himself warranted in sustaining this circumstance as a substantive objection to the trust-management.

" 2dly, In regard to the conclusion for 'malversations' committed by the trustees, it must be at once dismissed, as the record contains no specific statements of any malversations requiring further inquiry.

" 3dly, The same remark applies to the general conclusion for accounting. The whole accounts, audited by an accountant of character, are now, and have been from the beginning, in process, and in so far as the Lord Ordinary is aware, there is no objection to any of the articles of them, except those connected with the balance due by the factor, Mr Molle. Indeed, from what took place at the debate, that appears to the Lord Ordinary to form substantially the only ground of dispute between the parties; and in regard to it, he has found it necessary to make a material distinction between the case of the late Mr Hunter and that of Mr Pringle. Against the former and his representatives, the claim seems to be groundless. Mr Hunter, though a trustee, took, or rather was allowed, little or no share of the management. He was resident in Berwickshire, and acted as the country agent of the trust. Mr Pringle and Mr Molle, the other two trustees, resided in Edinburgh; being a quorum, they had the means of carrying on the management without requiring the presence of Mr Hunter at their meetings, and the inference fairly to be drawn from the correspondence is, that they were not disposed to admit him into the management, farther than was absolutely necessary. Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, on a perusal of the documents, that the late Mr Hunter was, from the year 1822, entirely in the dark as to the true state of the factor's accounts, and the continued balances allowed to remain in his hands. It also appears, that from the 5th of February 1829, he made constant attempts, though unsuccessfully, to get access to those accounts; and it was not until the end of September 1830 that they were put into his hands. From that time he did every thing in his power to obtain payment from Mr Molle; and indeed, it is to his exertions that the ultimate recall of the factory may be ascribed.

" In these circumstances, considering the exuberant confidence reposed in the trustees by the trust-deed—the reliance Mr Hunter was fairly entitled to place in the acting quorum of the trustees, Mr Pringle and Mr Molle, two professional persons of the first respectability—the backwardness of those gentlemen to communicate with Mr Hunter—his ignorance of the factor's balances, and his anxiety and activity from the moment his suspicions were roused, and his attention called to the matter—the Lord Ordinary must hold that Mr Hunter and his representatives are fully entitled to the benefit of the protecting clauses of the trust-deed; and he may further observe, that the charge made in this clamorous summons against the late Mr Hunter, of entering into a corrupt compact with the late Mr Pringle, by which he, Hunter, abandoned the action he had raised against Mr Pringle, in consideration of Pringle resigning the trust in his favour, seems most absurd and unwarrantable, now that it is established by the documents in process that Mr Hunter truly acted in those matters as the instrument of the pursuer, the heir of entail, and an instrument which, considering the somewhat extraordinary and unscrupulous proposals made to him in the course of those proceedings, the pursuer evidently viewed as completely under his power. Upon all these grounds, the Lord Ordinary has thought himself bound to award expenses to the representatives of Mr Hunter.

“The case of Mr Pringle is very different, though in one particular, viz., the fairness and good faith of his actings, his character stands perfectly unimpeached. The whole charges made against him in the summons, of wilful violation of his duty, and corrupt connivance at the dilapidation of the trust-funds, appear to be utterly without foundation, and might have been spared. At the same time, the Lord Ordinary is compelled to hold that there was such a constructive violation or neglect of his duty, as to render him liable for the consequences. It is true, that by the trust-deed the trustees are protected from any further liability for their factor than that he shall ‘be habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon office;’ and it also appears that Mr Molle was habit and repute responsible, not only at the time of entering upon his office, but until a very short time indeed before the public declaration of his bankruptcy. But the present case, like every other of the kind, must depend upon its special circumstances. Now, here Mr Pringle was not merely a trustee receiving the allowance granted by the truster—he was the cashier appointed by himself and his co-trustees, with an additional salary. It was his duty, and he had the power to ascertain the state of the factor’s accounts, and to restrict his balances within a reasonable amount, whatever delay might occur in the formal auditing of those accounts by the accountant—a delay which, in this case, occasionally extended to years after the accounts were given in—the cashier, whose province it was to collect and apply the trust-funds to the proper purposes of the trust, was bound to inquire and to know how the factor’s accounts stood. It is proved by the documents in process that he did know, and that the irregularity of the large balances retained by the factor, was repeatedly noticed by the accountant. Mr Pringle’s case, then, is not merely that of a trustee relying on the circumstance of a factor being habit and repute responsible; for Mr Pringle, as trustee and cashier, had the means of knowing, and knew that whatever might be Mr Molle’s general character for solvency, he was in the habitual violation of his duty as factor, and was either unable or unwilling to account properly for the trust-funds. Having this information, Mr Pringle neither required caution, nor communicated the matter specially to his co-trustee Mr Hunter, for the purpose of recalling the factory; but knowing, as he did, at the end of the year 1829 the large balance in the account of that year due by the factor, he allowed him to go on collecting the rents for the year 1830, thus increasing the balance to a great amount, if not to the sum actually concluded for. It is quite possible, and indeed there is no reason to doubt, that this conduct on the part of Mr Pringle proceeded from an ill-founded reliance on Mr Molle’s solvency, and from a reluctance to take strong measures against a person with whom he was on a footing of intimacy and confidence. But it appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the consequences of this mistaken confidence must be borne by him, and not by the trust-estate, of which he was the guardian.

“Before concluding, the Lord Ordinary feels himself called upon to notice the enormous accumulation of documentary evidence with which this process has been encumbered. That of the pursuer extends to 300 pages of print, while on the part of the defenders there are about 200 more. It is true that this case, turning much upon written evidence, required the printing of documents to a certain extent. But he must say, that this mass of pretended evidence, whether the indiscriminate admission or confused arrangement of its contents be considered, has had the effect of obscuring rather than of elucidating the points in dispute, and may form a fit subject of consideration in discussing the point of expenses.”

The pursuers reclaimed generally, as also Pringle’s representatives. At advising on 1st December 1837, the Court, on note for Pringle’s representatives, “Recal the interlocutor reclaimed against, assolisie the complainers from the conclusion of the libel, and decern; but find no expenses due to either party.”

On note for Home, &c.,

“Recal that part of the interlocutor complained of, which finds the representatives of the late James Hunter entitled to expenses, and find no expenses due to either party: Quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the desire of this note.”

Mr Home, and David Milne, Esq., factor for the estate of Billie, appealed; and there was also an appeal by the defenders on the question of costs.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, it appears in this case, that by the first deed, of the 16th of July 1816, George Home disposed and made over his estates, to and in favour of three trustees, David Renton, William Pringle, the respondent, and John Renton, who were to execute and manage the trust in succession, without the interference of the others; and it was provided, amongst other things, that they should have power to name and remove factors from time to time, with such powers, and liable to such diligence, as the trustee or trustees should think fit, and to pay such factors such salaries as they should see fit, and to settle accounts annually with such factors, and upon payment of what should be found due, to exonerate the factors, and within six months after each clearance with the said factors, to make up their own accounts, and to get the same approved by an accountant of character in Edinburgh; and if such accounts should be approved by the said accountant, such approbation was to operate as a full exoneration of the trustee or trustees during the currency of such account; and it was provided, that such trustees should nowise be obliged to do diligence, otherwise than as they should think fit, nor should be liable for any omissions, but only each of them for himself and his own actual and personal intromissions, nor should they be further liable for their factors, than that they should be “habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon their office.” Amongst other trusts for the application of the income was the payment of the yearly sum of £100, as a qualification to the acting trustee or trustees for their trouble in the management. The trusts, it appears, only affected the rents, which were to be applied in payment of the debts and legacies of the truster; and the interest of charges, and public burdens and repairs, and the residue in payment of all remaining debts of the truster, and upon fulfilment of all the purposes of the trust, to convey to the party entitled under another deed, by virtue of which the pursuer is entitled to the estate as first heir of entail, for himself and the heirs whatsoever of the estate, to whom the trustees are to account for their intromissions and management. By another deed, dated the 6th day of August 1819, George Home appointed William Molle, the respondent, William Pringle, and James Hunter, trustees, in the place of those named in the former deed, but with a declaration that the majority should be a quorum for executing the trusts, and not in other respects altering the provisions of the former deed. Soon after the truster’s death in 1820, the three trustees met, and, Mr Home, the pursuer, being present, appointed William Molle to be factor, with a salary of £180 per annum, and William Pringle cashier, with a salary of £50 per annum; and on the 22d of March 1820, a regular deed of factory was granted to Molle accordingly. The real question in the cause, is the liability of Pringle and Hunter for the sum due from Molle, as trustee or factor, at the time of his insolvency in October 1830; and the grounds upon which the charge is sought to be maintained are, principally, first, that the appointment of one of the trustees to be factor, was of itself a breach of trust, and subjected the parties to it to all the consequences resulting from it; and secondly, that there was such gross negligence in Pringle and Hunter, in permitting Molle to keep balances in his hand, as to subject them to liability for the balance due from him. Such, at least, are the points into which the claims of the pursuers are to be resolved, and which it is important to keep separate, in order to come to a right understanding of the principle of law applicable to this case, which has not, I think, been sufficiently done in some of the proceedings. As to the first, it is said that there is a difference between the law of England and of Scotland. In England, the appointment by trustees of one of their body to act exclusively in any part of the trust, under the authority of all, would, as to the others, have the effect of making the trustees appointing, responsible for the act of the one appointed,—that is, they could not treat acts done, or sums received by such appointee in the character so conferred upon him, as the acts or receipts of a co-trustee, for which they, as co-trustees, would not be liable, but as acts and receipts of their agent, for which they would or would not be liable, as there might be proof of culpable neglect in their dealings with such agent. The allowance of a salary to such appointee would clearly be a breach of trust, and would therefore be disallowed. But it is said that the practice, if not the law of Scotland, sanctions such appointment; and the case of Montgomerie v. Wauchope, Fac. Coll., 4th June 1822, is referred to in proof of that proposition. Nothing was decided in that case upon that point; but the Judges stated that such appointments were not inconsistent with the law of Scotland, and that a trustee appointed by his co-trustees was entitled to the usual remuneration of an agent or cashier. This is the real question, because it is not necessary to hold that the appointment is illegal in order to maintain the principle, that the party, who having accepted the office of trustee, which unless otherwise provided for by the trust must be performed gratuitously, accepts another office inconsistent with that of trustee, shall not be permitted to derive any emolument out of the trust-property in respect of such employment. That the office of trustee, and of factor or cashier to the property are inconsistent, cannot be disputed. If the execution of the trust require such appointments, it becomes the duty of the trustee to exercise his discretion and judgment in the selection of the officers, and his vigilant superintendence of their proceedings when appointed,—all which is lost to the trust when a trustee is appointed to the execution of those duties. Therefore, the Courts of Equity in England, in such cases, refuse to the trustee any remuneration which would come to others from the appointment, which produces the salutary effect of deterring trustees from making such appointment when not actually required; and when such necessity exists, preserves to the trust the superintendence and control of the trustees over the officer they may appoint. I should be sorry to give any sanction to a contrary practice in Scotland. There can be no reason for any difference in the rule upon this subject in the two countries. The benefit of the rule, as acted upon in England, is not disputed; and as there is no decision to the contrary, there cannot be any reason for sanctioning a contrary rule in Scotland. In the view I take of the present case, there will not be any necessity for expressing any further opinion upon that point. In England, the appointment of one of the trustees to act as receiver, and manage the property, and collect the rents, would not, per se, make the other trustee responsible for his acts, but it would make the trustee so appointed, the agent of the other trustees for those purposes, and render them responsible for his acts, so far as they would have been responsible for the acts and receipts of a stranger appointed to such office, but not otherwise; and in Scotland, where such appointments are treated with more indulgence, the consequences cannot be more stringent. It appears, indeed, from the cases of Sym v. Charles, (8 S. and D., 741), Moffat v. Robertson, (12 S. and D., 369), Ainslie v. Cheape, (13 S. and D., 417), and Deane v. Paterson, (14 S. and D., 361), that the Court of Session have acted upon this principle. The first ground, therefore, upon which the appellant seeks to fix Pringle and Hunter with the balance due from Molle, I think wholly fails. But, secondly, considering Molle as the agent and receiver of the other trustees, have they, in their transactions with him, been guilty of such negligence as to make them responsible for the acts of their agent? For I have not been able to follow the reasoning by which it seems to have been supposed that Mr Pringle, by accepting the office of cashier, incurred any additional responsibility as to the acts or receipts of Mr Molle. That office may, indeed, have afforded him opportunities of knowing the state of Mr Molle's accounts, and have given him earlier notice of his malversations,—and such knowledge and notice may be important in considering his liability; but such liability must attach to his office of trustee, and not of cashier. The question then is, what is the case established against Mr Pringle and Mr Hunter, of culpable negligence in dealing with their factor, Mr Molle? The trust-deed directs that the trustees should settle accounts annually with their factors, and upon payment of what should be found due, exonerate and discharge them from their intrusions and management, and within six months of each clearance with the factor, make up their own accounts, and get them approved by an accountant. This seems to assume that the account so to be settled with the factor, was to include the whole of his receipts and payments up to the time of the settlement; but that is not possible. It is the usual course that such accounts should be made up to a certain time, and there must necessarily be a running account not included in any such statement. No doubt this affords the means to a factor of keeping a balance in hand which does not appear upon the face of his accounts. He may delay receiving a sum of money until after the time to which the account is made up, in order to keep down the apparent balance. But however dishonest such contrivances may be in the factor, they cannot impose any responsibility upon the trustees by whom he is employed, unless they are parties to, or cognizant of them. And it is obvious, that in the management of a considerable property, it is indispensably necessary to have a certain balance in the hands of the manager to meet the current expenses. It appears, accordingly, that in Mr Molle's accounts for 1822, considerable balances were in his hands on the 31st of December of each year; but that in each of those years, such balances were more than paid by the month of March or April in the following year, excepting the year 1827, in which the preceding balance was not exceeded by subsequent payments till the month of September. It is true, that in the interval he had received sums equal to, or exceeding his subsequent payments, so that his actual balance was not reduced; but of that the trustees had not necessarily the means of information. The balance to the 31st of December 1829, was £1634, which was more than covered by subsequent payments by the 7th of April 1830. It appears, however, that the trustees, and particularly Mr Pringle, were aware that Mr Molle retained balances in his hands beyond what they thought necessary or proper, and that his so doing was the subject of remonstrance in 1828, which led to the reduction of what was then due; and in 1830, the correspondence proves that Mr Pringle insisted upon the payment of the balance then in hand, which not being done, led to the recall of the factory granted to Mr Molle, which was followed by an intimation of his bankruptcy on the following day, up to which time it does not appear that there was any ground for suspecting his solvency; and it is proved, that at the time of his appointment he was in high credit. The profit which arises from the use of a balance, is sufficient to account for the attempt to detain it, without attributing it to inability to pay. A passage in Mr Pringle's letter of 22d of September 1830, has been much relied upon, as showing that he had been aware of Mr Molle's bad circumstances in 1828. He says, speaking of a payment of £1500 received in 1828,—“I own I am a good deal pleased that this was done, from whatever quarter it was procured.” The meaning of this is very doubtful. It may mean that he doubted Mr Molle's having means of his own to pay that £1500; or it may mean, that it might have been paid out of subsequent receipts, so as not in fact to reduce the amount of balance due on the preceding December. It is much too slight a piece of evidence to support the case of Mr Pringle's having at that time been so cognizant of Mr Molle's difficulties, as to have made it his duty to interpose for the purpose of preventing his receiving any further part of the property, and to institute legal proceedings for the purpose of compelling payment of the existing balance,—the credit and supposed responsibility of Mr Molle having been unsuspected until very shortly before his bankruptcy. I cannot, therefore, find in the evidence given, any such proof of culpable negligence in the mode of dealing with the factor, as would, according to the decisions in Scotland, render a trustee liable for the losses sustained by his ultimate insolvency. The cases of Ainslie v. Cheape, 13 Shaw, 417, and Cowan v. Crawford, in 13 Fac. Coll., 628, are strong authorities upon this point. In 1828, the trustees finding their factor retaining balances in hand beyond what they thought proper, press him, by every means short of legal proceedings, to keep down such balances, which course continues till December 1830, when, finding their efforts ineffectual, they recal his appointment—which produces his bankruptcy, without any previous proof of his being insolvent. The result is, that, in my opinion, the judgment below was correct, in holding that Mr Pringle's estate is not liable for the loss sustained by the insolvency of Mr Molle; and if he did not make himself liable for such loss, it is clear that Mr Hunter did not; for every circumstance from which the responsibility of Mr Pringle could arise, exists in a less degree in the case of Mr Hunter. If the case fails so far, there is, I think, no ground for the general account; for if Messrs Pringle and Hunter are not chargeable with Mr Molle's balance, their own accounts have been regularly examined and settled, according to the provisions of the trust-deed, and no case is made for opening them. It is indeed said that Mr Pringle has in those accounts been allowed a salary of £50 per annum, to which, as trustee, he was not entitled; and if that question had arisen for decision in a proper form, and under circumstances calling for a judgment upon the point, whether a trustee could create an office for himself out of his trust, so as to derive profit from his trust, I should have had great difficulty in assenting to what appears to have been assumed, rather than decided, in Scotland. In such a case, there cannot be any good reason for any difference in the rules adopted in the two countries, and there cannot be any doubt as to the inconvenience and danger of such a practice; but in this case, if the £50 per annum were to be disallowed, and struck out of Mr Pringle's accounts, he would be entitled to charge for all actual expenses incurred by the duty he performed as cashier: so that there is no probability that the estate would profit by opening the accounts in that respect; and when it is considered that this allowance arose from an appointment made in the presence of the pursuer, and was to be paid out of rents, the surplus of which was his, and that it has been sanctioned by the accountant, who had authority from the trustees to settle the trustees' accounts, I cannot think that it would be advisable, for such a purpose, to interfere with the judgment below, particularly when it appears that such allowances have been usual in Scotland, and that there is something like judicial authority for them, as in Montgomerie v. Wauchope, Fac. Coll., 4th June 1822. I think, also, that the House would be very reluctant, when the principal object of the suit fails, to give any relief upon so small a part of the case,—particularly where the record is loaded with charges and accusations of personal fraud and wilful dereliction of duty against Mr Pringle and Mr Hunter, of which there is not only no proof, but for which there does not appear at any time to have been any reasonable ground for suspicion, and for introducing which into the pleadings I have not seen or heard any justification. And this leads to the only remaining question—that of costs, which is the only one upon which I have entertained any doubt; and if I had been sitting in the Court below—considering the failure of the case made against the trustees, and the unjustifiable charges brought against them,—I should perhaps have thought it just that they should be indemnified in costs, by directing the pursuers to pay them. But in this House the case is different. A court of appeal does not interfere in the question of costs, without reluctance, in any case, and generally, will not entertain an appeal for costs alone; and the question of costs can only arise upon the cross appeal. I am therefore of opinion, that both appeals should be dismissed, with costs.

Appeals dismissed, with costs.

First Division.—Lord Fullerton, Ordinary.—Spottiswoode and Robertson, Appellants' Solicitors.—George Webster, Respondents' Solicitor.—[W.H.D.]

22d June 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 236.—WILLIAM DIXON, Esq., Appellant, v. MRS MARGARET DIXON or FISHER, and her HUSBAND for his interest, Respondents.

Husband and Wife—Testament—Provisions—Jus Relictæ—Homologation—Reduction—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that a widow having, in the first instance, accepted and taken possession of various special subjects of value, to which she had right by the testamentary deeds of her husband; and having thereafter transacted with his disponees and executors, and discharged all her claims against the estate, it was not thereafter competent, either to her or any one in her right, to repudiate or reduce the settlements of her husband on the ground of inadequacy or otherwise.

This was an action of reduction raised by the pursuer in his own name, and in that of his now deceased mother, Mrs Janet Smith or Dixon, in aid of his pleas in a process of multiplepoinding raised by the present defenders in May 1823, and in which the pursuer, William, and his elder brother, John Dixon, as the general representatives of their father, the late William Dixon, are the nominal pursuers.

Mr William Dixon, the pursuer's father, an Englishman by birth, came in early life to Scotland, and was engaged as manager of Blackhouse colliery, near Ayr. While in that situation, about the year 1775, he married Mrs Janet Smith, without any marriage-contract. Mr Dixon afterwards gradually improved his circumstances; and in the latter part of his life they improved so much, that at his death in 1822, he was enabled to leave to his family a most extensive succession, consisting of heritable and moveable property. Antecedent to 1809, having acquired the lands of Palace-Craig, in the parish of Old Monkland, he secured to his wife a reasonable provision in the event of widowhood. On 14th December 1809, he executed the deed now sought to be reduced, which proceeds on the narrative that no antenuptial marriage-contract had been executed by himself and his wife, nor any provision made in her favour in the event of survivance; and therefore he binds and obliges himself, and his heirs and successors, to pay to her, if she survive him, a life rent annuity of £150 per annum, in security of which he disposed to her the lands of Palace-Craig. He farther granted to her a life rent of the mansion-house, garden and offices, and a park of ground extending to about twenty-two acres. By the same deed there is assigned to her

“in absolute property, in the event of her surviving me, the whole household furniture and plenishing, bed and table linen, and plate that shall be pertaining and belonging to me at the time of my death, likewise three of the best milch-cows which shall belong to me.”

In return for these provisions the deed bears:

“And I, the said Janet Smith, do hereby accept of the provisions before mentioned, in full of all I could ask or claim, by or through the decease of the said William Dixon, hereby renouncing the legal provisions I might be entitled to in the event of my surviving him.”

On 11th April 1817, Mr Dixon's affairs still prospering, he executed another deed, providing certain sums to his children, and disposing the universitas of his estates in favour of his two surviving sons, John and the present pursuer, William. By this deed an additional sum of £1000 is provided to Mrs Dixon.

On 23d November 1821, Mr Dixon executed a disposition in favour of his wife, by which her provisions were considerably enlarged. It bears to be granted "for the love, favour, and affection I have and bear to Janet Smith, my wife, and for other considerations me hereunto moving," &c. The additional provisions are, 1. The absolute right to two shops in Glassford Street, Glasgow; and, 2. Forty shares of the undertaking called the Monkland Canal Navigation, the value of which was £1400.

Mr Dixon died on 16th October 1822 at Govanhill, and was survived by his wife, and by two sons and four daughters,—viz, John; William; Isabella, widow of Hugh Mann, writer in Glasgow; Margaret, Mrs Fisher; Janet, wife of Mr Joseph Whitehead, tanner in Paisley; and Liliass, unmarried.

In virtue of the deed of settlement of 1817, Mr Dixon's two sons assumed possession, generally, of his whole property, under the exception of the subject specially conveyed to his widow. The pursuer, William Dixon, assumed the sole control and management of the business, estate, and affairs. Soon after Mr Dixon's death, the defenders intimated their dissatisfaction with the provision granted to Mrs Fisher (a liferent of £4000), and requested explanation of the value of Mr Dixon's estate, with the view to claim legitim. This produced a termination of all domestic intercourse between the defender and Mr Dixon's widow and family.

After her husband's death, Mrs Dixon took possession of the furniture, as provided to her by the postnuptial contract. She drew payment of the dividends on her shares of the Monkland Canal Company. She also uplifted the rents of the Glassford Street shops, in which she took infestment, and she gradually drew payment from her sons of sums to account of her money provisions. Mrs Dixon made no claim for terce or jus relictæ, nor did she enter appearance in the multipointing.

On 28th February 1826, a deed of agreement was executed by Mrs Dixon on the one part, and by her sons, John and William Dixon, on the other part. By this deed the two sons bound themselves to make payment to their mother of £5400 at the term of Whitsunday 1836 (ten years after), with interest from 16th October 1822. They engaged, moreover, to pay her a liferent annuity of £200, and to give her the liferent use of the house and garden at Govanhill. They farther bound themselves to provide and maintain for her three cows, and a carriage and pair of horses, and to make over to her the whole household furniture which had belonged to her husband; and, finally, they agreed that she should have right to the two shops in Glassford Street. On the other hand, as a counterpart (which forms the basis of this reduction, so far as stated in the libel),

"the said Mrs Janet Smith or Dixon not only declares herself satisfied with the provisions before mentioned, in lieu of, and in full of all claims of whatever nature, whether legal or conventional, she is entitled to from the estate of the said deceased William Dixon, her husband, but she hereby gives up, disposes, conveys, and renounces, to and in favour of the said John Dixon and William Dixon, and their heirs and successors, all such claims and rights, in whatever way conceived, and whether legal or conventional, and hereby binds and obliges herself, her heirs, executors and successors, to execute all revo-cations, conveyances or other deeds that may be necessary for investing them and their foresaids in the full right thereof, with full power to them and their foresaids to follow forth and make the same effectual by all competent and legal ways and means: Farther, the said Janet Smith or Dixon hereby acknowledges that she has, since the death of her said husband, received from the said John Dixon and William Dixon the sum of £1569. 16s. Sterling, to account of the sums provided to her as aforesaid."

Of the same date with this deed of agreement, Mrs Dixon executed, in favour of her two sons, a regular transfer in the usual style, of

"all and whole forty shares of the undertaking of the Monkland Canal Navigation, as the said shares stand divided by an Act of Parliament of the 53d year of the reign of his late Majesty, and which belonged to the said deceased William Dixon, and were conveyed by him in my favour, conform to disposition and assignation, bearing date the 23d day of November 1821, and recorded in the Sheriff-court books of Lanarkshire the 23d day of October 1822, with the dividends due on the said forty shares at and prior to the date hereof, and in all time coming."

John and William Dixon afterwards, in September 1826, found it necessary to execute a trust-deed in favour of Mr Cuthbertson, accountant in Glasgow, in order "to liquidate and pay off our debts, as well as the provisions left by our said father." To this deed Mrs Dixon, and all the other members of the family, excepting the defenders, acceded. In adjusting this matter, no mention was made, nor any conveyance granted to Mr Cuthbertson of the widow's terce and jus relictæ, as acquired by Messrs Dixon under the agreement of February 1826.

On 20th May 1827, John and William Dixon entered into an agreement, with consent of their trustee, by which the pursuer, William Dixon, took upon himself their whole joint obligations, and engaged to pay to his brother, John, the sum of £35,000; and, on the other hand, John conveyed to William his share of their father's estate and funds. In that agreement there was no conveyance by John to William of the rights acquired by them in virtue of the mutual deed executed by them and their mother, now libelled on, of 28th February 1826. By the agreement of May 1827, the pursuer, William Dixon, was taken bound to relieve his brother John of all their joint debts and obligations, and of the legacies and annuities left and bequeathed by their father, &c. Instead, however, of paying off those due to his mother and sisters, William Dixon prevailed upon them to grant a deed, on 23d and 25th December 1830, discharging the eldest son, John, of all liability to them under his father's settlements, and accepting of himself as their sole debtor.

The present action was raised on 14th December 1831, in name of the widow, Mrs Dixon, and her son William, concluding for decree of reduction of her postnuptial contract of 14th December 1809, and of all writs importing an acceptance of the provisions settled on her, and stating, that by an assignation embodied in the deed of agreement of 28th February 1826, the widow had conveyed to her two sons, John and William, her rights jure relictæ, worth £10,000, to which the pursuer, William, now had right, in virtue of the transaction by which he purchased his elder brother's interest in the whole funds and estate of the family.

Defences were lodged, but no steps were taken by the pursuer while his mother lived. She died in Deember 1834, and the action was revived in consequence of a summons of wakening raised by the defeuders, in order to clear the way for a decision in the separate process of multiplepointing, since which time the pursuer endeavoured to support it by various productions:—1st, By the following mandate:

"GLASGOW, 3d June 1823.—We hereby authorise you to appear for us in the process of multiplepointing raised by Mrs Fisher, in regard to the succession of the late Mr Dixon, against us and others, and to claim our legal shares of said succession. We are, gentlemen, your most obedient servants, (Signed) JANET DIXON, JANET WHITEHEAD, JOSEPH WHITEHEAD, LILLIAS DIXON, ISABELLA MANN, WILLIAM DIXON." (Addressed) "To Messrs Tod and Romanes, W.S., Edinburgh."

No use was made of this mandate by lodging claims in the multiplepointing. 2dly, There was put into the process of multiplepointing, on 23d May 1836, a deed of revocation, executed by Mrs Dixon of so early a date as 12th March 1824, by which, on a recital of all the provisions granted by her husband in her favour, she revoked and recalled her acceptance thereof, that she might be restored to her whole legal rights. This deed did not appear to have been delivered, and was not noticed in any of the deeds or transactions subsequently to its date, and was not labelled on in this process. The third document produced was a mandate, dated 11th March 1830, to Messrs Tod and Romanes, authorising them to raise an action of reduction, to the effect of enabling her "to make effectual the legal claims competent to me jure relictae or otherwise."

In support of the action the pursuer pleaded—

1. Mrs Dixon's alleged acceptance, stante matrimonio, of certain provisions in her husband's settlements in lieu or satisfaction of her legal provisions of terce and jus relictae, is null and void, in respect that any such acceptance was a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and as such was revocable, and was revoked accordingly. 2. Those provisions having been quite inadequate, and far less than the value of her legal provisions, either at the time that these conventional provisions themselves were made, or at the time of Mr Dixon's death, her alleged acceptance thereof was not onerous or irrevocable, nor could her power or right of revoking such acceptance be affected by other provisions, which were not so accepted, having been subsequently granted, or by her acceptance of provisions which were not declared to be in lieu or satisfaction of her legal claims. 3. Mrs Dixon's alleged acceptance of certain conventional provisions in lieu or satisfaction of her legal rights, was moreover void and ineffectual, in respect of her having signed the same at the solicitation of her husband, in ignorance of the nature and extent of her legal rights, and of the disproportion between these and the conventional provisions; and in respect, at all events, of her alleged acceptance having proceeded upon error in substantialibus. 4. Mrs Dixon's acceptance was legally and effectually revoked, not only by the deed of revocation and other writs which she granted in her own favour, and which were effectual in law before as well as after delivery, but likewise by her transactions with her sons, and the pursuer individually, and by the institution of the present action of reduction. 5. The alleged proceedings founded upon by Mrs Fisher and her husband, could not prevent Mrs Dixon from effectually repudiating the provisions in Mr Dixon's settlements after his death, and enforcing her legal rights, in respect that she never discharged or renounced her legal rights, otherwise than by conveying the same to Mr Dixon's disponees; that these proceedings did not take place, at all events, until after she had repudiated the settlements, and declared her option to enforce her legal rights, and that the provisions which were implemented or secured to her were not those contained in the settlements, but those afterwards made to her by John and William Dixon, or the latter individually. 6. Although she had received all that was provided to her in the settlements, the same would have been only imputable to account of what belonged, or was owing to her under her legal provisions; and she or her assignee would still have been entitled to enforce payment of the remainder of these legal provisions. 7. Mrs Fisher and her husband are not entitled to found upon any declarations in Mr Dixon's settlements, as preventing his widow from revoking the same, or from enforcing her legal rights, in respect that they themselves have repudiated and frustrated that settlement to a great extent, and that they are not entitled both to approbate and reprobate the same. 8. Mrs Fisher and her husband are not entitled to found upon the proceedings posterior to Mr Dixon's death, as preventing Mrs Dixon, or her assignee, from repudiating the settlement, and enforcing her legal rights, in respect that the share of Mr Dixon's effects, claimable by Mrs Fisher and her husband, became fixed and determined at the time of his death, and could neither be enlarged nor diminished by subsequent transactions, which were res inter alios acta, and were adopted for the very purpose of preventing them from claiming more than their legal share. 9. Moreover, Mrs Fisher and her husband are not entitled to found upon these proceedings to that effect, in respect that the fund to which these proceedings related, had previously been rendered litigious by the multiplepointing, and that the amount of the share of the fund in medio, which was claimable by them at the institution of that action, could not be affected by such transactions among third parties pendente lite. 10. The pursuer, as the assignee of Mrs Dixon, has right to her share of the goods in communion, and is entitled to have the right there-to declared, and to have the proceedings which are said to affect the same rescinded, all as concluded for in the libel.

The defenders pleaded—

1. If the deed of agreement of 1826, between the late Mrs Dixon and her two sons, was intended to convey to them her legal provisions as a widow, they were necessarily transferred by the trust-disposition executed by these parties in favour of Mr Cuthbertson for behoof of their creditors, and are vested in him, so that William Dixon is not a competent party pursuer of this action; and, at all events, Mr Cuthbertson ought to have been a party to it. 2. The provisions in favour of Mrs Dixon, contained in the heritable bond of annuity, or postnuptial contract of 1809, having been reasonable at its date, that deed was irrevocable. 3. In taking into consideration the question concerning Mrs Dixon's power to revoke the deed of 1809, it is necessary to take into view the provisions afterwards granted in her favour, and accepted. Mrs Dixon (the alleged cedent of the pursuer, William Dixon) having assumed possession of these provisions, could not effectually, by herself, or by an assignee, divest herself of these, and claim her legal provisions. The enjoyment and subsequent conveyance by her (in her settlement) of the household furniture, &c., granted to her by the postnuptial contract,—the receipt by her of the dividends on the canal shares, and the conveyance by her of these canal shares,—the receipt by her of the rents of, and the taking infestment in the shops, &c., in Glassford Street, as well as the payments which she received from the executors of her husband antecedent to February 1826, on account of the provisions made in her favour by her husband, were conclusive acts of homologation of her husband's settlements, and an irrevocable acceptance of her provisions under them. 4. The deed of 1809 did not require to be delivered by the husband to the wife, in order to complete the obligation which it created. The husband was the legal custodian of documents in which the wife had an interest, and the possession by the husband of that mutual deed (if it remained in his possession), must be held to have been the possession both of himself and his wife. 5. The deeds of agreement of 1826 and 1827, before mentioned, and labelled on in this process of reduction, afford no legal foundation for the claims now made by William Dixon, for himself, and as in right of certain of his sisters. If the agreement of 1826 conveyed Mrs Dixon's legal provisions to her two sons, it would have fallen under the trust in favour of Mr Cuthbertson, and is vested in him, and not in William Dixon. 6. The revocation of 12th March 1824, kept latent during Mrs Dixon's lifetime, and so recently, and since her death, produced in this action of multiplepointing, can have no effect, seeing that it was not a delivered document; and the other writings not put in to this process at any time during

Mrs Dixon's life, and only brought to light under a diligence against bayers at the instance of the defenders, Mr and Mrs Fisher, after her death, are equally ineffectual to support the claims here made by William Dixon. 7. A document (not testamentary) privately framed and kept latent till after the death of the grantor, cannot be successfully founded on, in opposition to the public and open acts of the maker of the document, so as to affect the interest of third parties, or to deprive them of the jus quasitum previously established in their favour. 8. A right to terce or jus relictae may be effectually compounded and discharged by the party legally entitled thereto. 9. The widow of Mr Dixon having expressly renounced, or, from her acceptance of the provisions granted in her favour under the settlements, having legally excluded herself from claiming her terce and jus relictae, the present action cannot be maintained, and the defenders will fall to be assoilized, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"22d June 1838.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record in this process of reduction, and having heard parties' procurators thereon, and made avizandum, Finds that the question raised by the original summons in the name of the deceased Mrs Dixon, and William Dixon as her assignee, and the supplementary summons in the name of the said William Dixon, the pursuer now insisting, depends mainly on two points, —1st, Whether the contract of marriage entered into by Mrs Dixon and her husband, the late William Dixon, in 1809, and in particular, the clause thereof, whereby Mrs Dixon, in consideration of the provisions settled upon her by the said contract, in the event of her surviving her husband, accepted of the said provisions as in full of all she could ask or claim by or through the decease of the said William Dixon, and renounced the legal provisions she might be entitled to in that event, was, upon the death of the said William Dixon, liable to revocation by Mrs Dixon, on the ground that the provision thereby made in her behalf were so greatly inadequate as to render such her acceptance and renunciation in law donatio inter virum et uxorem? And 2d, Whether the said Mrs Janet Smith or Dixon did competently and effectually repudiate the provisions made for her by the said contract and the other deeds of settlement subsequently executed by the said William Dixon, revoke the acceptance and renunciation expressed in the said contract, and prefer her claim to her legal provisions as the widow of the deceased, against the general representatives of her husband? Finds, that the first of these points depends, or may depend on matter of fact, on which the statements of the parties respectively are essentially opposed: Finds that the second question must be determined by a due consideration of the documents in process: Finds it established that the said Mrs Dixon did obtain possession of valuable property, provided to her by her husband, in virtue of the conveyances expressed in his deeds: Finds, that by deed of agreement on the 28th February 1826, between the said Mrs Dixon and her sons, John Dixon and William Dixon, the general disponees and executors of her deceased husband, the said John and William Dixon bound themselves to pay to Mrs Dixon the sum of £5400 at the terms specified, which sum of £5400 is, in the accounts of these parties, and in various other documents, uniformly described as a legacy or provision to which she had right under the settlements of her husband, —to secure her in an annuity of £200, and in the life-rent of a house specified, with certain other benefits, —to deliver to her the whole household furniture, plate, &c., of her husband, which furniture, &c., was also provided to her by the deeds of her husband; and by which agreement they farther stipulated, that she should have right to two shops in Glassford Street, which shops were expressly conveyed to her by her husband's settlement, and in which she obtained infeftment in virtue thereof: In consideration of which obligations, the said Mrs Dixon declares herself satisfied therewith, 'in lieu of and in full of all claims of whatever nature, whether legal or conventional, she is entitled to' from the estate of her husband, and gives up, disposes, conveys, and renounces, to and in favour of the said John and William Dixon, &c., all such claims and rights, in whatever way conceived, whether legal or conventional, and binds herself to execute all revocations, conveyances, or other deeds necessary for investing them in the full right thereof, with power to follow forth and make the same effectual; and she farther acknowledged, that since her husband's death she had received £1569. 16s. to account of the sums provided to her as aforesaid: Finds, that by a deed of transfer of the same date, the said Mrs Dixon assigned and transferred to the said John and William Dixon forty shares of the Monkland Canal which belonged to the deceased, 'and were conveyed by him in my favour by the disposition and assignation' specified, with the dividends due thereon, to be held subject to the same rules and on the same conditions that the deceased William Dixon or myself held the same immediately before the execution hereof; —which deed of transfer contains a clause, declaring it to be without prejudice to her legal rights, in respect of the property of the deceased: Finds that the said deed of agreement neither proceeds on the narrative that Mrs Dixon had, at any time preceding the date of it, repudiated the settlements of her husband, and revoked her obligation under the marriage-contract, nor does it itself either express or import such a repudiation and revocation: Finds, on the contrary, that it proceeds on the express assumption of specific rights vested in her, in virtue of the said settlements, and that the said deed of transfer is expressly founded on her title and possession, vested in her by the said deeds: Finds that by the force of the said deed of agreement, the said John and William Dixon, as the disponees and executors of the deceased, stood completely discharged of all claims competent to Mrs Dixon, whether under the settlements of her husband, or at common law, and that she had finally accepted of the provisions specified in the said agreement, as in full of all that she could claim: Finds that it was not thereafter competent to the said Mrs Dixon herself to make any claim to her legal provisions, or to repudiate the provisions made for her by the settlements of the deceased, or to revoke the obligations of the marriage-contract; and finds, that it was not competent to the said John and William Dixon, after having finally transacted and settled with the widow on such terms, either in their own names, under any general title as assignees, or in her name, to repudiate for her the settlements of the deceased, or to revoke or reduce the marriage-contract, to the effect of thereby altering or affecting the rights of other parties interested in the succession: Finds it farther established, that thereafter a transaction took place between John and William Dixon, whereby the former, upon certain considerations, renounced his rights as one of the disponees and executors of his father, and agreed that the said William Dixon should have right to the whole property, subject to the conditions therein expressed: and finds, that the said agreement, and the express discharge which was thereafter executed by Mrs Dixon, and the other persons therein interested, in favour of the said John Dixon, proceeded on the assumption that Mrs Dixon had not repudiated the provisions made for her by the deeds of her husband: Finds that, in these circumstances, Mrs Dixon having, in the first instance, accepted and taken possession of various special subjects of great value, to which she had right by the deeds of her husband, and having thereafter transacted with his disponees and executors, and finally discharged all her claims against the estate, it was not thereafter competent, either to her or to any one in her right, to repudiate or reduce the settlements of her husband, or the obligations undertaken by her in the marriage-contract, on the ground of inadequacy, or on any other ground set forth in this record: Therefore, sustains the defences to this effect; but before pronouncing decree of absolvitor, appoints the cause to be enrolled, and in the mean time reserves all questions of expenses.

"Note.—It would require a much longer statement than it would be proper for the Lord Ordinary to annex to the above interlocutor, to explain in detail the grounds on which he has come to the conclusion expressed in it. He will endeavour to state the leading points as shortly as he can.

"But it may first be proper to explain, that before giving out this judgment, he put it in the view of the parties, that as it would necessarily supersede the other question involved in the reduction,—viz., whether, if Mrs Dixon had in any competent form repudiated her husband's settlements, and brought a reduction of the discharge of the marriage-contract, she had sufficient ground in law for doing so?—it was for the consideration of the defenders, whether the matter of fact necessarily requiring to be ascertained for solving that question, should or should not be first inquired into. That question comprehends two points: 1st, Whether the provisions made for Mrs Dixon by the marriage-contract were, at the date of that contract, so inadequate, with reference to the state of Mr Dixon's fortune at that time, as to render the discharge given a donation by the wife, liable to revocation and reduction? And, 2d, Whether, in point of law, the date of the contract, or the time of the testator's death, must be taken as the rule for determining the question, whether there was such inadequacy or not; and what effect the additional provisions made for her by the other deeds may have on any such question? If the Lord Ordinary had thought it necessary to enter on this part of the case, he should have been of opinion, that the matter of fact, with relation to the state of Mr Dixon's fortune at the date of the contract, should be first ascertained. But the defenders having expressed their desire to have judgment on the question, whether, in the circumstances, the reduction was at all competent, he has felt it to be his duty to give out the interlocutor, which, after considering a most elaborate debate, and examining all the documents referred to, he had previously prepared.

"The Lord Ordinary is, in the first place, of opinion, that the present reduction cannot be supported on the ground of certain documents executed by Mrs Dixon in 1823 and 1824. The first is a mandate, dated June 3, 1823, (app. p. 23,) granted to Messrs Tod and Romanes to appear in the process of multipointing—which had been raised. It is signed by Mrs Dixon, by Mrs Whitehead, who had expressly discharged the legitim by marriage-contract, by Miss Dixon and Mrs Mann, and by William Dixon himself. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the authority thereby given to claim 'our legal shares of said succession,' simply meant that they should claim what was due to them respectively by the deeds of settlement. Mrs Whitehead could claim nothing else; and as little could Mrs Dixon, without taking some other proceeding. But the mandate was surely any thing but a universal rejection of the provisions of the settlement, and an assertion of rights at common law as opposed to it.

"The deed of revocation, of 12th March 1824, may seem to deserve more attention. That deed was certainly produced under very extraordinary circumstances. But it may be sufficient for the Lord Ordinary to say, that on full consideration, he thinks that it must be regarded as entirely a latent instrument which was never acted on, but on the contrary, was entirely superseded by the transaction which followed between Mrs Dixon and the general disponees and executors of her husband.

"It is indeed evident, that if the attempt now made to claim jus relictæ in the name of Mrs Dixon depended on any simple act of revocation by her, the title to maintain such a claim would not be vested in William Dixon, but in Miss Lillias Dixon, who is the executrix of her mother; and that such a claim could not be maintained against William Dixon is very clear. At any rate, if, in point of fact, Mrs Dixon did subsequently accept of the provisions made for her by the settlements of her husband, and discharged them, the question, what shall be the effect of such acceptance and discharge, cannot be affected by such a latent instrument, inconsistent with what she actually did.

"The material question therefore is, what was the true nature of the transactions between Mrs Dixon and her two sons in 1826 and following years, with reference to the possession which she had previously obtained of property conveyed to her by her husband's deeds? For it is clear that the present action is not an action for the benefit of Mrs Dixon or of her executrix, but simply a proceeding adopted by William Dixon in order to lessen the amount of the fund of legitim claimed by Mrs Fisher against him, as the donee and executor of their father. If he obtained a title to make such a claim for his own benefit, whether in his own name or in that of Mrs Dixon, by the deeds of 1826, that title could not be altered by the mere bringing of the reduction in Mrs Dixon's name, or by the terms in which the summons may be expressed. And if he did not obtain such a title by the transactions in 1826, beyond all doubt, any right to set aside the marriage-contract, to repudiate the settlement, and to claim jus relictæ, which Mrs Dixon might previously have had, was completely and effectually discharged by the deeds which then passed between the parties.

"The most material deeds are the deed of agreement, 28th February 1826, and the deed of transfer of the Monkland Canal shares, of the same date. (App. pp. 28 to 31.) It is evident that Mrs Dixon was previously in possession of the forty canal shares, valued at £4000 or £4400. She had right by the settlements to an annuity; to the liferent of a house, with twenty-two acres of ground and other advantages; to the whole household furniture, &c., and to two shops in Glassford Street, conveyed to her by her husband. Now, without going much into details, the Lord Ordinary can find nothing in the deed of agreement that has the least resemblance to a repudiation of the provisions of the settlement. The deed proceeds on no such narrative; and on the contrary, her right in the canal shares is expressly acknowledged, and a transfer of them is executed by herself, as of property conveyed to her by her husband, and held by her 'immediately before the execution hereof.' The two shops in Glassford Street are recognised as belonging to her; and in these she obtained infestment. Her right to the furniture is also acknowledged; and the whole effect of the agreement is, that for the transfer of the canal shares,—for her annuity of £150,—for the liferent of the house and ground,—and for the discharge of all her claims,—John and William Dixon bind themselves to pay to her £5400, at the postponed term of Whitsunday 1836, with interest from the death of her husband,—to pay to her an annuity of £200,—and to convey to her in liferent a different house and garden. In consideration of which she declares herself satisfied with the provisions before mentioned, in lieu of, and in full of all claims of whatever nature, whether legal or conventional, she is entitled to from the estate of her husband. Then she conveys all her rights to John and William Dixon, and binds herself to execute revocations, and all other deeds necessary for making the same effectual. And she acknowledges to have received since her husband's death 'the sum of £1569. 16s. to account of the sums provided to her as aforesaid;' which must mean sums provided to her by the settlements; because, till this deed was executed, nothing else had been provided to her.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this deed imports an acceptance, and not a repudiation of the provisions of the settlement. No doubt it is an arrangement by which those provisions are discharged on certain considerations. The defenders state, that it arose out of the difficulties in which John and William Dixon were at that time, which led to the trust-deed executed by them (app. p. 33,) in the same year: and the Lord Ordinary thinks that it probably was of that nature. But independent of this, it was manifestly a transaction which proceeded on the basis that Mrs Dixon did assert her claim to all the provisions of the settlement; that she was actually in possession of a part of the property, and exercised the rights of a proprietor in it; that no repudiation had taken place; and that the parties had never entered on any consideration of what her claims might have been if she had rejected the provisions of the settlements, and claimed terce and jus relictæ.

"After this John and William Dixon conveyed their estates to Mr Cuthbertson as trustee (app. p. 33, &c.); and it is apparent, that in that transaction it was assumed that the settlement was binding on Mrs Dixon, and no supposition was suggested that any other claim could be made in her right (see app. p. 51).

"Mrs Dixon was infest in the Glassford Street shops on the 23d March 1827, expressly on the conveyance by her husband, than which it is not easy to conceive a stronger act of acceptance of the provisions made by his deeds. These houses had from the first been recognised as the property 'of Mrs Dixon' in the books of John and William Dixon. See entry, October 31, 1825 (app. p. 124). Then, with regard to the other provisions, there is the following entry:—'September 30, 1828.—Stock Dr.,—to sundries for the following legacies, in terms of the disposition and settlement of the late Mr Dixon, viz., to Mrs Dixon, Govanhill, her legacy £5400. Do. an equivalent for her annuity of £200, £4000'—(app. p. 120); and throughout the accounts this debt is substantially stated in the same manner.

"In May 1827, an agreement was entered into between John and William Dixon, by which John, for considerations, conveyed to William all his rights and interest as joint donee and executor of their father. In that transaction it is most clear to the Lord Ordinary that Mr John Dixon, at least, had not the slightest conception that the transaction between them and Mrs Dixon had the effect of conveying to them any right or title to repudiate the settlement in her name, or to claim jus relictae as her assignees,—and he has accordingly stated the contrary, in the most positive terms, in his defences to this action. But the deeds speak for themselves. When it became necessary that Mrs Dixon should directly discharge Mr John Dixon of all her claims, both the letters which first passed (app. p. 63), and the formal deed of discharge (pp. 65-70), are perfectly distinct and explicit, as discharging the provisions made by the deeds of settlement.

"Without going into farther particulars, or enlarging on the application of these facts, the Lord Ordinary thinks it completely established, that Mrs Dixon had finally and irrevocably recognised and accepted the provisions made for her by the settlements, and that, if there had ever been any serious thought of revoking and reducing the discharge of the marriage-contract, it had been entirely abandoned, and the chequer closed against it by the acts and deeds of Mrs Dixon herself.

"The idea seems to be entertained, that Mrs Dixon could, at one and the same time, accept of the provisions, take what was equivalent to payment of them, and grant a discharge in full of these and all her claims, to the executor, and yet reserve, or rather convey to him a right to reverse the whole proceeding, to repudiate the settlement, and revoke and reduce the marriage-contract in her name; in other words, to make the discharge which she had granted to her husband, and confirmed to his executor in full satisfaction, operate in favour of the husband's representative, against the child or children claiming legitim. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this is incompetent. It brings the case exactly to the point which occurred in the case of Andrews v. Thomson or Sawyer, March 2, 1836; and therefore, instead of going into any detailed explanation of the principle, the Lord Ordinary will simply refer to the report of that case, and the full note of Lord Corehouse upon it. The facts of the two cases are not exactly the same; and in particular, Mrs Dixon has not in direct terms done what was attempted by Mrs Sawyer in that case. But they are the same in principle; and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the judgment must be the same in both. For if Mrs Dixon had effectually accepted the provisions, and discharged them by the deed 1826, the Lord Ordinary thinks it very clear, that nothing which she may have been induced to do afterwards could alter the state of the case."

"26th June 1838.—The Lord Ordinary having called the cause and heard parties' procurators, sustains the defences, repels the reasons of reduction, and assoilizes the defenders from the conclusions of the action, original and supplementary, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be lodged, and remits to the auditor to tax the same and report."

The pursuer reclaimed, but the Court (8th February 1839) adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

William Dixon appealed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, before I examine the grounds upon which the Court of Session have held that the pursuer cannot maintain this suit, I cannot but observe the situation of the parties litigant,—the question being, whether Mrs Janet Dixon, the widow, had by her acts precluded herself from claiming these rights and interests out of her late husband's property, to which she would otherwise have been entitled? She institutes the suit jointly with her son William, which William, as one of the general donees of the husband of Janet, and his father, and as claiming through John, the other general donee, was entitled to the whole of the father's property, subject only to the claims of the younger children, and of the mother; and the object of the suit is, to have it declared that the mother is entitled to her legal claims against the estate, and to repudiate and set aside all acts and deeds by which she may have accepted the conventional provisions made for her by her husband in lieu of such legal claims. But all those acts and deeds so sought to be set aside were between the widow and her sons, whose right is now vested in the pursuer, William; and both join in this suit. It is true that the younger children are interested in the effect of these acts and deeds, as they may affect the amount of the legitim; and what such effect may be, is in question in another proceeding. The question in the present suit is, whether the widow can, after what has taken place, renounce her conventional provision? and the object is, if necessary, to set aside what has taken place, in order to enable her to claim such legal right. To this suit the younger children are parties, and so far—as the question is, whether, after what has taken place, the widow can renounce her conventional provisions and claim her legal right,—the form of the suit may be very proper; but so far as the object is to set aside these transactions, there appears to be a peculiar impropriety in the formation of the suit. All the parties to a transaction join in praying that it may be set aside, because the result of it may benefit a third party, but such third party was a total stranger to the transactions sought to be set aside; and all the grounds upon which that relief is prayed, exist only as between the widow and the sons, the general donees; but as between them no relief is asked—all the interests of both sons and of the widow being vested in the pursuer, William. How such transactions affect the rights of the younger children may be a fair question; but that such rights are to be investigated without reference to these transactions, or how, as against them, these transactions are to be set aside, appear to me very difficult to comprehend. Certainly, in this country, no such proceeding could be allowed. But I proceed to consider what the facts are upon which this relief is prayed. By the deed of 1809, the husband secured to his then wife £150 per annum, and the house of New Palace-Craig, and twenty-two acres, for life, and the furniture, and three of his best cows,—she consenting to renounce the legal provisions to which she might be entitled. By a deed of 11th April 1817, he gave her £1000, in addition to the former provisions, in full of all she could ask or claim in and through his decease. By a deed of 22d November 1821, he secured to her two shops in Glasgow, and forty canal shares, but the gift was not expressed to be in lieu of her legal right. The husband died in October 1822. These provisions for the widow being all under postnuptial-settlements, it may be assumed that, upon her husband's death, it was competent to her to repudiate them, and to claim her terce and jus relictae. But some of these provisions were given, upon express condition of her renouncing all such rights; and it is clear, that she could not approbate and reprobate such gifts; or, in the terms of the English law, she was bound to elect between them and the legal rights they were intended to supersede. What ought to be evidence of such approbation or election, is a question of fact, and may be proved either by the general conduct of the party in her dealings with the property, or by express declaration. In considering the evidence upon these points, it is expedient to keep in mind, that very soon after the death of the husband, the daughter, Mrs Fisher, had intimated an intention of repudiating the provision intended for her by her father, and of claiming her legitim, which led to the suit of multiplepoinding in 1823. The extent of this claim, which was earnestly resisted by the mother, might much depend upon whether the mother accepted or repudiated her jus relictae, and to this may be attributed much of that which has been relied upon as evidence of her not having so repudiated it. But still the fact remains to be examined, did she, or did she not, accept the provisions intended for her by her husband? If she had not intended to accept those provisions, her title to terce and jus relictae accrued upon her husband's death in 1822. But there is no trace of any steps being taken to act upon or enforce any such rights, but there is proof, that to a certain extent, at least, she dealt with the subject of her husband's provisions; and such proof as there is of the dealings of the mother and her sons with the property, is referrible only to her title under her husband's provision, and not to her title to terce and jus relictae. The deed of the 28th of February 1826, admits that she had received from them "£1569. 16s. to account of the sums provided for her as aforesaid." That deed—though for the purpose of defeating the claims of the daughter, Mrs Fisher, ambiguous terms were introduced into it,—was clearly a settlement between the mother and the sons upon the footing of the husband's provisions. It could not, indeed, be otherwise, it being a fact admitted on both sides that she was offended at her daughter's attempt to disturb the provisions made by her husband. That such was the principle upon which this settlement proceeded is apparent, when it is considered, that what she would claim under her husband's provisions, was, first, an annuity of £150; 2d, the liferent of the house and grounds at Palace-Craig; 3d, the furniture; 4th, the £1000; 5th, two shops in Glasgow; 6th, forty canal shares; 7th, three cows;—and what she took under the agreement of 1826, was, first, an annuity of £200; second, the liferent of the house and garden at Govanhill; third, the furniture, &c.; fourth, £5400, she giving up to her sons the forty canal shares; fifth, the two shops in Glasgow; sixth, the keep of three cows; seventh, the use of a carriage and horses. It is impossible to refer this arrangement to her title to terce and jus relicte. It is an acceptance of, and dealing with, the conventional provisions of her husband, as between herself and her sons; and if so, there is no ground for relieving her from her own act, upon any ground of ignorance or surprise. If she accepted these provisions in lieu of her legal claims as between herself and her sons, it was not competent for her, as against her daughter, to keep alive those claims, but to the attempt to do so must be attributed the mandate of the 3d of June 1823, and the deed of revocation of the 12th of March 1824, of which there is no proof of its having ever been delivered or used; and the whole conduct of the parties proves that it was not intended that it should have any operation as between the mother and her sons. It appears to me, for these reasons, clear, that it is now too late for the widow to repudiate the settlement of her husband, and that the pursuer has no right to impeach the transactions which he seeks to set aside, and that the judgment of the Court below was right, as pronounced in the three interlocutors of the 22d and 26th of June 1838, and 8th of February 1839. As to the interlocutor of the 11th of March 1837, it appears to me to be unimpeachable here upon the merits, as well as upon form. I move your Lordships, therefore, that the interlocutors be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Second Division.—Lord Moncreiff, Ordinary.—Archibald Grahame, Appellant's Solicitor.—Spottiswoode and Robertson, Respondents' Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

1st July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 237.—JAMES STUART, Petitioner and Advocate,
v. JOHN SPOTTISWOODE and GEORGE SPOTTISWOODE, Respondents.

Burgh—Road—Police Act, 7 Will. IV. c. 32—Held, that under the Edinburgh Police Act, the Sheriff or Dean of Guild has a judicial power to determine the situations in which foot-pavements are required.

By the Edinburgh Police Act (7 Will. IV. c. 32.) it is enacted (§ 18), that “Whereas it would be greatly for the convenience and benefit of the inhabitants residing within the limits aforesaid, that proper foot-pavements were made in situations requiring the same, be it therefore enacted, that the owners or proprietors of all houses and other buildings, or of gardens and grounds, whether buildings are erected on the same or not, which are adjoining to or fronting any road, street, square, passage, or other public or principal place within the bounds before described (excepting always the gardens and grounds opposite to Princes Street, and the gardens and grounds opposite to Queen Street, which shall be paid and upheld as at present), shall at their expense cause the ground before their property respectively on the sides of the said roads, streets, squares, or passages, to be well and sufficiently paved with flat, hewn, or other stones, or in such other manner and form as the Dean of Guild of the city of Edinburgh, or the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, or his substitutes, according as the said street, square, or place shall be situated within their respective jurisdictions, shall, by decrees to be pronounced by them respectively in their proper courts, from time to time, on the application of the fiscals of these respective courts, or of any private party having interest, with concurrence of the said fiscals, or on the application of the superintendent of police, direct and appoint: Provided always, that in case such owners or proprietors shall refuse or neglect to cause such pavements to be made in the manner and form so directed, it shall and may be lawful to the said Dean of Guild or Sheriffs respectively, on the complaint of the said Procurator-fiscal, or party, or superintendent, to cause such pavements to be made at the charge and expense of such owners or proprietors respectively; and in case such owners or proprietors shall refuse or neglect to pay such charges when required, it shall and may be lawful to the said Dean of Guild, or Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute respectively, in their proper courts, to decree such charges and expenses to be paid by such owners or proprietors, either to the tradesman or tradesmen by whom the work shall have been done, or to any other person to be named by the said Dean of Guild or Sheriffs, with the additional expense incurred in recovering the same.”

Founding on this Act, James Stuart, superintendent of police, presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying that John and George Spottiswoode, proprietors of certain ground and subjects adjoining and fronting Brandon Street, should be ordained “to cause proper foot-pavement to be constructed along and upon the side of the said road or street, in front of, and adjoining said ground or subjects, with flat, hewn, or other stones, or in such other manner and form as your Lordship shall direct and appoint; and in the event of their refusing or neglecting to cause such pavement to be made, to remit to proper tradesmen to execute the same, and to report the expense thereof.”

The respondents, besides certain preliminary objections to the petition as inaccurate and informal, pleaded—1. That there is already a well-formed gravelled footpath on the side of the road adjoining the said piece of vacant ground; and as neither the public generally, nor the individuals of the district in particular, have ever complained of its insufficiency, it cannot be held to be in a situation requiring to be paved. 2. By the Road Acts, the Cramond Road Trustees are bound to make and maintain proper foot-paths on the said roads for the public convenience: and by parity of reason, they are also bound to pave these foot-paths when the convenience of the public requires it, or, at all events, the one most used by the public. 3. The Police Act did not supersede the provisions in these Road Acts, nor in any way relieve the Road Trustees of their responsibility under the same. 4. The Road Trustees collect annually large sums from the public for the support of roads and foot-paths such as those in question; and it would not be consistent with any principle of justice were proprietors whose property happens to be adjacent thereto compelled, at their own expense, to pave these foot-paths for the public benefit and convenience, while those who are put in possession of the public money, to provide for the public convenience, are exempted from any such burden.

The petitioner pleaded—1. As the part of the road or street referred to is admitted to be unpaved, and as the defenders' property adjoins to and fronts it, and is within the bounds of police, they, as the owners or proprietors, are the parties bound by the Act to construct pavement. 2. The road trustees, by the Statutes under which they act, though bound to make foot-paths, are not obliged to make foot-pavement. If the defenders assert the contrary, they may be allowed to call the trustees, or they may be reserved relief against them. 3. The Act founded on in the petition being posterior to the Road Acts founded on by the defenders, cannot be affected or controlled by them. 4. As the Act founded on imposes the obligation to make foot-pavement absolutely and unqualifiedly on the owners or proprietors of the adjoining properties, no other course than the present was competent to the petitioner.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:

"The Sheriff having visited and inspected the premises, and advised the closed record, repels the preliminary pleas stated by the defenders, and finds upon the merits, that it is not necessary, for the convenience and benefit of the public, that the foot-path in question should be paved at present, but reserving right to the pursuer to make a new application when the circumstances are changed; finds the defenders entitled to expenses."

The petitioner advocated, and put in the following additional pleas:—1. Under the enacting clause of the Statute libelled, the 7th Will. IV. c. 32, § 18, the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to inquire or determine as to the necessity of paving the foot-path in question, but only as to the manner and form in which it was incumbent on the defenders to cause the pavement to be made. 2. It was imperative on the Sheriff, under the Statute, and upon the application of the pursuer, to decern and ordain the defenders to cause the foot-path in question to be paved at their expense in such manner and form as the Sheriff should direct; and in the event of their refusing or neglecting to cause the pavement to be made in the manner and form so directed, to cause the same to be made at their expense, and to decern against them for the amount thereof. 3. Supposing the question as to the necessity or propriety of paving the foot-path in question to have been open for adjudication by the Sheriff under the Statute, he has determined this question erroneously, and without due or proper investigation; and assuming the statement of facts by the pursuer, which he is prepared to instruct, to be correct, it is most necessary, for the convenience and benefit of the public, that the foot-path should be forthwith well and sufficiently paved. 4. In every view, and looking to the expense of discussing the preliminary pleas in which the pursuer was successful, he ought not to have been found liable in full expenses.

Additional pleas by the respondents—1. Under the terms of the Statute 7 William IV. c. 32, § 18, the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, and the Dean of Guild of the city, respectively, are vested with discretionary powers, and with privative jurisdiction, not only as to the manner and form of making foot-pavements or paths within certain limits, but also as to whether or not, and the time when, such footpaths shall be made. 2. In any view, and in so far as the judgment of the Sheriff, in the present cause, proceeds upon and finds matter of fact as to the sufficiency of the existing foot-path adjoining the respondents' property, it is final and conclusive, and cannot be brought under review of the Supreme Court by advocacy or otherwise. 3. Further, as the judgment complained of is well founded, both in law and in fact, the advocacy ought to be dismissed, and the process remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, finds that, by the 18th section of the existing Police Statute for the city of Edinburgh, an obligation is laid upon proprietors to pave the ground on the sides of the roads opposite their properties, in such manner and form as the Dean of Guild or the Sheriff may direct; and that neither the Dean nor the Sheriff have power to dispense with the fulfilment of this obligation: Finds that the petition to the Sheriff prayed that the respondents should be ordained to fulfil this obligation, by causing a 'proper foot-pavement to be constructed,' with flat, hewn, or other stones, or in such other manner and form as your Lordship shall direct: Finds that the interlocutor of the Sheriff merely decides 'that it is not necessary, for the convenience and benefit of the public, that the foot-path in question should be paved at present: Finds that the parties differ as to the meaning of this finding, and that in one view it does not exhaust the prayer of the petition: Therefore remits to the Sheriff, with instructions to apply these findings, and with power to recal the interlocutor advocated if he shall think proper; and to do farther in the premises as to him shall seem just; and finds no expenses due to either party, hinc inde, in this Court."

"Note.—If the interlocutor advocated proceeds on the ground that the Sheriff has power to dispense with any sort of foot-pavement, where he thinks that none 'is necessary for the convenience and benefit of the public,' the Lord Ordinary is quite clear that this is a misconstruction of the Statute. The Statute takes all discretion about the necessity of some kind of foot-pavement out of the hands of all the local authorities; because, upon a preamble that foot-pavements are greatly for the benefit and convenience of the inhabitants, the 18th section enacts that owners 'shall' construct them. All that is left to the Sheriff and the Dean of Guild is, not whether the sides of the roads shall be paved or not, but whether the pavement shall be with flat, hewn, or other stones, or in what other manner or form."

"Now, it is uncertain whether the Sheriff meant to decide that there need be no pavement at all, or only no pavement with flat or hewn stones. If the former was intended, then the Lord Ordinary thinks that the Sheriff has exceeded his jurisdiction. If the latter, then the Sheriff ought to have said in what other manner and form the pavement was to be constructed, or he might have found that the existing pavement was already sufficient."

"The Lord Ordinary has inspected the place; and if he had been the Sheriff he would have felt himself compelled to order this path to be paved with flag-stones, so as to have joined the paved end of Brandon Street to the paved end of Huntly Street, instead of leaving a gap of about 130 yards without any regular foot-path at all (its present state) between these two points; and thus obliging foot-passengers going from the one end of these streets to the other only to find a foot-pavement on the opposite side, which implies their crossing the road twice. But the Statute gives the jurisdiction of prescribing the manner and form of paving to the Sheriff or Dean of Guild; and therefore, if the interlocutor had performed this duty, the Lord Ordinary would not have interfered with it. But it has not done so. It has either decided that there need be no pavement, or only that this pavement need not be with regular flags; the first of which is against the Act, and the second does not exhaust the petition."

The respondents reclaimed, and referred to the 19th section of the Act, as connected with, and explanatory of, the 18th.

Lord President.—I must own that I do not think the respondents have been successful in their plea, founded on the 19th section. It appears to me to have a different object altogether from the 18th. This, however, does not remove my difficulty as to the soundness of the interlocutor reclaimed against. I cannot read the introduction of the 18th section (call it preamble or not), bearing that it would be greatly for the convenience of the inhabitants that proper foot-pavements were made "in situations requiring the same," and hold that these pavements must be made in every situation. On the contrary, I am clear that the Sheriff or Dean of Guild are bound to exercise a judicial discretion, and determine whether any particular situation is of the kind requiring a foot-pavement. So far I am under the necessity of differing from the Lord Ordinary, but in substance I agree. The Sheriff, after inspecting the ground, gives his decision that a foot-pavement is not at present necessary. I am always disposed, in such cases, to put great faith in the determination of the Judge Ordinary, and not to alter it except on strong grounds. I see none such here.

Lord Gillies.—I concur very much in what your Lordship has said. The Sheriff finds that it is not for the convenience and benefit of the public that a foot-pavement should be made at present, and I agree with him. As to his right to exercise a judicial discretion in the matter, I do not know what meaning can be given to the commencement of the 18th section if his right is denied.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have some difficulty. I agree that the 19th section cannot be transferred to the 18th; but the 18th seems to enact, that all principal streets or thoroughfares within the bounds of police, with certain specified exceptions (including of course all not specially excepted), must be "sufficiently paved with flat, hewn, or other stones, or in such other manner or form" as the Dean of Guild or Sheriff may direct. Under these terms, it might indeed be made a question what the kind of pavement is to be? Do they mean more than merely that there must be a foot-path? Say it were Macadamized, i. e., made of stones laid one above another, would not that do? I am afraid hardly, as the word used is paved.

Lord Fullerton.—The case is not free from difficulty; but I rather agree with the majority. The Statute, though not very clear, seems to give the Judge a discretionary power for determining whether or not the thing ought to be done. As to the 19th section, I am inclined to think that the latter part of it does apply to the present case. It is not necessary, however, to go on that, as I am clear that the Sheriff was entitled to judge if the pavement was necessary, and if not, to refuse.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; repel the reasons of advocacy, and remit simpliciter to the Sheriff, and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses, and remit the account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Maitland; Roderick Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Anderson, Baillie; Warren H. Sands, W.S., Agent.—[H.B.]

1st July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 238.—EARL OF KINNOULL and REV. ROBERT YOUNG, Pursuers and Suspenders, v. REV. JOHN FERGUSON and OTHERS, Defenders and Respondents.

Process.—Conjunction of Actions.—A patron and presentee raised, 1st, a declarator directed against the Presbytery of the bounds, concluding to have it found that, on the refusal of the majority, a minority of the Presbytery were entitled to induct the presentee; and, 2d, A suspension and interdict directed both against the Presbytery and a Special Commission of the General Assembly, to prevent the induction of any other party than the presentee—Circumstances in which held that the processes ought not to be conjoined.

The pursuers in the Auchterarder case, after raising a declarator concluding to have it found that the minority of the Presbytery (three members or more) are entitled to ordain and admit the presentee, presented a note of suspension and interdict, directed both against the Presbytery of Auchterarder, the defenders in that case, and also against the Special Commission of the General Assembly, praying for suspension of a resolution and remit, by which the General Assembly,

"on the petition of three hundred and ninety-three heritors, elders and others, inhabitants of the parish of Auchterarder, praying for the settlement of a minister in the parish," had agreed "to remit to the Presbytery of Auchterarder to proceed to the settlement of a minister in the pastoral charge of the parish of Auchterarder, on such reasonable provision for stipend as may be secured, instructing them in their proceedings to advise with and conform to the directions of the Special Commission to be hereafter appointed."

No appearance was made for the Special Commission; and the counsel for the Presbytery having moved that the processes should be conjoined, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the motion for joining this declarator with the process of suspension and interdict at the instance of the same parties who are pursuers of the present action, against the same parties as respondents who are defenders in this process; in respect that both questions relate to the same benefice, and depend on the question, whether the pursuer, Mr Young, is the only presentee legally entitled to be admitted and received as incumbent thereof: Conjoins the cases, and renews the order on the parties to lodge cases in the conjoined processes within eight days, in terms of former interlocutors.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary thinks himself bound to conjoin these cases, according to the ordinary course of proceeding adopted in all questions depending contemporaneously in the Court between same parties, and relative to the same estate or office. He is also of opinion, that this mode of preparing both cases, and submitting them for judgment at the same time, will not only be the most convenient form for the parties, but the most satisfactory course both for this Court and the Court of Appeal, if they are ultimately called on to decide the case on the merits.

"In the suspension, the patron and presentee bring under suspension a sentence or order of the General Assembly in May 1841, whereby they, without a vote, 'remitted to the Presbytery of Auchterarder to proceed to the settlement of a minister in the pastoral charge of the parish of Auchterarder, on such reasonable provision for stipend as may be secured,' &c. The suspenders maintain, that that order was at direct variance with the previous judgment of this Court, and of the House of Lords, finding that the Presbytery were bound to take Mr Young on trials; and as they have not done so, but expressly refuse to obey that judgment, the suspenders crave an interdict against the Presbytery giving effect to the said sentence of the General Assembly.

"In the action of declarator at the instance of the suspenders, they conclude to have it found and declared, that the Reverend John Clark, and six other ministers (the minority) of the said Presbytery, who had intimated their readiness to give effect to the right of the pursuers, and to the previous decree obtained by them, or any three or more of them constituting a presbytery, 'shall be competent to constitute and hold meetings of said Presbytery, for the purpose of performing and discharging the duty of the said Presbytery in the matters foresaid, and to take trial of the qualifications of the pursuer; and if, in the judgment of such ministers constituting a meeting of Presbytery as aforesaid, he shall be found qualified, to admit and receive him accordingly as minister of the aforesaid church and parish,' &c. &c. See summons, p. 33.

"The summons contains other conclusions against the majority of the Presbytery unnecessary to be detailed.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that there is a manifest propriety in having the questions raised in these cases discussed at the same time, before whatever Court they may come afterwards to depend. On the one hand, if the reasons of suspension were repelled, that issue would of course be fatal to the progress and success of the declaratory action; while, on the other hand, it is apprehended that the affirmation of the pursuers' pleas in the suspension, might, in some views of the case, afford important support to the conclusions of the pursuers in the declarator.

"In answer to this view of the cases, the contingency of the two cases was not denied; but it was stated, that there was no plea on the part of the chargers in the suspension which could now be feasily set up, and in fact that the plea for the chargers, on which this branch of the case depends, was solemnly decided against the Presbytery by the First Division of the Court in the case of Lethendy. Now, the Lord Ordinary begs it to be understood, that it is far from his intention to question the decision of the Court in the branch of the case of Lethendy which applies to the present. But, when he recollects that that case may yet be appealed, and would in that event be subject to reversal, he does think, that no course should be taken here to increase unnecessarily the proceedings and expense in the two cases now before the Court, which have an inseparable connection with each other.

"In this Court, the point ruled in the case of Lethendy which is applicable to the present question, need not be re-argued here; a simple reference to that decision will suffice;—but as no appeal may be taken in Lethendy, and as that case, if appealed, may be decided on a different ground from that taken in this Court, while it is not impossible that an appeal may be taken in the present cases, the Lord Ordinary does think that it would be hard and unreasonable to refuse conjunction here, and thus drive the parties who may be appellants into the expense of two appeals, when one would suffice."

The pursuers reclaimed:

Lord President.—We are always anxious to save unnecessary expense; and when different processes relative to the same matter are in dependence between the same parties, it is usual to conjoin them. Here, however, the parties are not the same. The Special Commission is a new party altogether; and though appearance is not made for them, we cannot help that, but must look to the processes themselves. Not only are the parties not the same. The points raised are also very different. It may be, that ultimately the points of law to be determined will come to be the same, and that it may in consequence become proper to conjoin them; but I am clear that they ought not to be conjoined at this stage.

Lord Gillies.—I take the same view. At first I was inclined to adhere to the interlocutor, but I now think it ought to be altered. The proper object of conjoining processes is to save expense; and in nineteen cases out of twenty both parties concur; but when one objects, it is incumbent on the other to show that the conjunction is expedient for both. That has not been shown here.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. When a party objects, the processes ought not to be conjoined without strong reasons. Here I see no such reasons. On the contrary, I would say that if they had been conjoined, it would be desirable to separate them. The object of the one process is to declare the right of the minority of the Presbytery to admit the presentee. The object of the other is to declare the right of the patron and presentee to hinder the admission of another by any party. These two objects are by no means necessarily dependent on each other. The one may be competent and just. The other may be incompetent and unjust. Why, then, should two causes so different be conjoined. They can go on separately and with great advantage. There is also the other ground, that the parties are not the same. I am clear that we ought not to force the conjunction.

Lord Fullerton.—I am inclined to the view taken by the Lord Ordinary. I agree with Lord Gillies as to the object of conjoining processes; but I am afraid the concurrence of parties is not so general as his Lordship imagines. My experience has rather been, that when the one party moves for a conjunction, the other opposes it. This, however, is of little consequence. All we have to consider is, whether the processes can be conveniently conjoined. The objectors say that the parties are not the same. This is true if all had appeared; but no appearance is made for the new party; and I know not why the usual form has not been adopted of putting that party out of Court. Were this done, the parties would be the same. Then as to the conclusions of the processes, they are very much akin to each other. Indeed, those of the suspension appear in a great measure involved in those of the other. The question is not of great importance, as it can only affect the expenses.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and refuse, hoc statu, to conjoin the actions, reserving all questions of expenses for subsequent decision: Remit the case back to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the several processes as shall be just."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Anderson, Inglis; Storie and Baillie, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, R. Bell, Moncreiff; William Young, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

1st July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 239.—JOHN MATHESON, Pursuer, v. GEORGE MACKENZIE, Defender.

Arbitration — Reference — Reduction — Oversman — Circumstances in which, where there was a written reference to two valuers, an award by an oversman appointed by the referees was opened up: the material grounds being, 1st, that the referees, and then the oversman, acted without hearing parties, and, 2d, that there was not legal evidence of the appointment of the oversman, or consent of parties to his nomination.

The pursuer, by letter dated 17th September 1838, agreed to sell to the defender a certain lot of sheep, to be delivered "the day after the next Muir of Ord market," viz., 19th October following, and "the stock to be taken over by valuation by two men mutually chosen, viz., Alexander Mackenzie, Esq., Mossford, and John Cameron, Esq., Corrichoillie." The letter contained no power to the referees to name an oversman in case of differing in opinion. After the date of the letter, but before any valuation, the sheep were keiled (the reason for which was differently stated by the parties), and left on the farm of the defender. The two referees and the defender met on the subject of the valuation at the market in question, but it was admitted on the record that the pursuer was not then present. It appeared from the depositions of the referees, as enacted in the course of the Inferior Court procedure, that neither of them had an opportunity of inspecting the sheep on this occasion; but one of them (Mackenzie) stated that he was well acquainted with them for years previously, and had very recently before seen them, when he acted as judge of the roup at which the pursuer bought them. The other referee, Cameron, was well acquainted with the district in which the sheep were reared, and the stamp and quality of sheep stock there, and he stated, that on the occasion when they met for the valuation, he trusted to the report of Mackenzie, "who gave him distinct and accurate information as to the description of the stock, and he went upon the report of Mr Mackenzie's knowledge of it;" and that "from his knowledge, with the information afforded by Mr Mackenzie, and his confidence in that gentleman, he accepted of the appointment, and proceeded to form his opinion as a valuator."

The referees differed very materially as to the value, and, without consulting with the pursuer, or intimating the fact to him, they named an oversman, Patrick Rose, writer in Dingwall, to decide, who happened to be in the market where the referees had met. The parties were not agreed on the record as to whether both referees consented to name Rose as oversman, or only one of them, but it appeared from the depositions of the referees that Cameron only had consented, at least Mackenzie did not say that he had consented to the appointment. There was no writing under the hands of the referees which instructed the devolution of the reference on Rose. Rose, however, was not aware that they had not both consented; and, in the belief that they had, he proceeded to act as oversman, by immediately hearing on the spot what the referees had to say on the subject. Rose, in his deposition, stated, that he had "repeatedly bought and sold sheep on his own account, and on account of others;" "that he rents a sheep farm," and "has for some time back been factor on the estate of Strathconon;" "that from the information thus acquired, he conceives that he was qualified to act the part of thirdsman" on the occasion alluded to. He stated that he knew the stock in question previously, but he admitted that he had no opportunity of inspecting them when he undertook to become oversman. Soon after his meeting with the referees he issued his award, by letters sent to the principals, in which, after stating that Messrs Mackenzie and Cameron had referred to him to settle the value, he fixed the same accordingly at a certain sum per score.

The pursuer being dissatisfied, thereafter removed the sheep from the farm of the defender, where they were, in consequence of which the defender presented a summary application to the Sheriff of Ross-shire, complaining that they had been removed from his possession, though sold and delivered to him, and praying for interdict against Matheson, and to prohibit him from interfering or selling the sheep, and to ordain him to restore them, and besides, to find him liable "in exemplary damages for his unwarrantable and illegal conduct," and the loss and damage sustained by the complainer by their removal.

In the proceedings which followed on this application, it was maintained that the procedure by the referees was unwarranted, both as to proceeding to the valuation in the absence of the pursuer, and without hearing both parties; and, besides, that the referees had no power to name an oversman without the consent of both pursuer and defender; and further, that it was illegal, in respect of fixing the valuation without inspecting the stock: consequently, that the pursuer was at liberty to do with the sheep as he chose. The Sheriff-substitute, and afterwards the Sheriff, held that the whole procedure was perfectly regular; that the valuation was binding; and that the pursuer was liable in damages, which were thereafter modified.

The pursuer then raised this action to reduce the award, principally on the grounds above stated.

In defence, it was maintained that the reduction was groundless, in respect the proceedings in the reference, if it were to be dealt with as a reference, were perfectly regular and binding on the pursuer, as being consonant with the every-day practice of the district. In particular, it was maintained, that according to that custom, it was not necessary to inspect such stock before fixing the value, where the referees, as was admitted, were men intimately acquainted with the locality, and the kind and quality of the stock which was there bred. But, besides, it was pleaded, that the matter could not be looked on as an arbitration, but a sale, where the price, though not fixed, was contingent on the award of the two gentlemen,—that that was competent, and in consequence, in such a state of circumstances, the custom of the country, as to ascertaining the value, must be looked at, to determine whether the referees had gone beyond what was the undoubted practice or not. It was insisted that the custom had been complied with, and that Mr Rose was to be looked on as assisting the referees in opinion. Now, as to the transaction being a sale, and so understood by the parties, there was the evidence of a completed transaction by the "keiling," which was proof of the transfer of possession; and when that was joined to the fact of the sheep having been left in the possession of the defender, the inference was irresistible of sale. It was explained, however, that the "keil mark" was merely intended to distinguish the sheep from other sheep of the pursuer's in the vicinity.

The pursuer, in raising the process of reduction, presented a note of advocacy, ob contingentiam of the reduction, when both processes were conjoined.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"17th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the conjoined processes, recalls the interlocutors complained of in the advocacy: Repels the defences in the reduction; and declares, reduces, and decrees in terms of the libel: Finds the pursuer and advocator entitled to expenses, both in the Inferior Court and in the Court of Session: Appoints accounts thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The grounds of the Lord Ordinary's decision are,—1st, That the conclusion for damages in a summary petition was incompetent.

"2d, That the arbiters had no right to name an oversman.

"3d, That neither the arbiters nor the oversman ought to have formed any opinion without giving the parties an opportunity of being heard.

"4th, That even though it should be held that the sheep were delivered, not for interim preservation, but in furtherance of the bargain, this must be presumed to have been done conditionally, and on a reliance that the price was to be fixed in the way agreed to; and that the fixing of the price in this way having become impossible, the whole bargain was broken up.

"The attempt to prove, that arbiters deciding matters referred to them, without hearing parties, and naming an oversman, without any power to this effect being conferred on them by the parties, is conformable to the custom of Ross-shire, is ridiculous."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I am not prepared to apply to this case the strict rules of a formal arbitration, as in the case of Telford; for I take this as a common bargain of every-day's occurrence in the district, where the understanding was, that if the valuers differed in opinion, they should resort to an oversman, without immediately consulting with the parties themselves. Accordingly, in a case of this sort, you must look at the custom of the part of the country where the case occurred; and I am quite sure, that not only in Ross-shire, but all the highlands over, referees resort to an oversman when they differ in opinion, without communicating with the principals. I am quite satisfied of the prevalence of the custom; and they do this before they inspect the subjects. In this way, I cannot hold that Rose was improperly appointed, or that the referees or Rose were wrong in determining without, at the moment, seeing the sheep. The kind and value of stock are well known, according to the district, and without inspection; and every one knows, that without seeing the animals, a shilling or more will at once be stated as the value of such and such sheep, according to the district, in consequence of the quality being so well known and understood by dealers. The only point as to which I concur with the Lord Ordinary, is, that there is no proof of the devolution on Rose. That ought to have been properly instructed; and if both referees had concurred in saying that Rose was appointed, I would have been for altering the interlocutor, as I should, in those circumstances, have been for admitting the custom of the country in regard to such matter. But that is not so instructed as the proof stands, according to my mind; and I am for adhering. I have no doubt Rose believed he was appointed, but his appointment is not proved, which is very material; and it is on this point alone I concur.

Lord Moncreiff.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and I certainly differ from the opinion now expressed. If this had been a verbal contract, I might have seen room for the distinctions laid down by Lord Medwyn; but here there was a written contract, and I think, therefore, it is going very far to say that the valuers had power to name an oversman, where no such power is conferred in the letter, which was their warrant. I think that is extremely doubtful, to say the least of it. It was said that this was the custom in Ross-shire. But what of that? I daresay it may have been done a hundred times without complaint, but the question here is,—if, in point of law, the referees had power to name an oversman, and to devolve the matter in dispute on him? I doubt that very greatly indeed; and I do not see what power there was to do this, without the consent of both parties. Now it is very material to observe, that only one of the parties, viz., the defender, was present, and not the other, viz., the pursuer. The pursuer was not bound, in my opinion, to be present, as it was said he was, on the occasion; because, following the reasoning of the reclaimer, he would have been bound to be there to fix on an oversman. Now, the letter gives no such power; and when the referees differed in opinion, and came to the resolution of throwing up the matter, they ought at least to have put their resolution in writing, in order to make it conclusive, both against themselves and in the case, that they had done so, and that Rose was appointed.

Lord Medwyn.—Mackenzie says, in his deposition, he went to ask in an oversman.

Lord Moncreiff.—I don't think that material, as I consider that as there was writing constituting them referees, writing was necessary to show the devolution. Only look at the proof and see how material this is. Cameron says there was a devolution on Rose: Mackenzie says no such thing. Rose thought himself appointed, and I daresay he did; but what of that? and what can be made of it, when Mackenzie tells us he did not consent. The referees differ as to this, but it is plain the thing would have been clear had there been writing. I am not prepared to say that, in other circumstances, the devolution might not be good; but here we have no evidence of the fact.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur in the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I forgot to mention about inspecting the sheep. I don't say, absolutely, that it was necessary for the referees to inspect them, when they met to value them, if they knew the particular sheep of their own knowledge previously. I give no opinion on that; but what I would say is, that a mere general knowledge of the quality and kind of sheep in a district would not appear to me to be enough.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary. If both parties had been present, and there had in these circumstances been irregularity, I would not have been for giving great weight to the doubts which might occur to lawyers in such a transaction. But where one of the parties was absent, I hold that we cannot look at the alleged custom of the country. If it had appeared that the principals had consented to the referees not inspecting the sheep, I could have seen ground for making light of irregularity, and would have consented to let in the alleged custom; but I cannot do so in this case, where one of the parties was absent. It was said he was bound to have been present, but I cannot concur in that, from the terms of the letter. But he was not present, and I think it is high time that the gentlemen who acted as referees here, and who are said to have great experience in such matters, ought to know that the principals, in cases of arbitration, should be present. In these circumstances, therefore, custom is out of the question, and irrelevant. Then, what have we in the case? We have several points admitted—each and all of which are sufficient for me for adhering to the interlocutor. If this had been a sale, the bargain would have been at an end by the referees differing in opinion as to the price; but it is a case of arbitration, else why talk of an oversman. It is only by arbitration you bring in the oversman. Now, the first thing admitted is, that there was no consent of both parties to the devolution, and no intimation of the devolution to the pursuer. That is of itself enough to upset the case. (2.) It is admitted that the reclaimer was present, and not the pursuer. That is also fatal, as both ought to have been present. (3.) Then there is no written appointment of the oversman, as there ought to have been—the appointment of the referees having been in writing. That is also fatal. And (4.) Moreover, the parties, that is, both of them, were not heard. The pursuer was not present, and he ought to have had an opportunity of being heard as to what he could say; and he ought to have had an opportunity of saying whether he concurred or not in what was done,—whether or not wishing an inspection of the sheep or otherwise. That is also an insuperable objection, and fatal to the case. I concur with Lord Moncreiff, and therefore move that the interlocutor should be adhered to.—As to whether referees ought to inspect sheep, when they have a competent knowledge of the district, without seeing them at the moment, I must be understood as offering no opinion.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly adhered.

Authorities for Pursuer.—Telford and Co., 2 S. and D., p. 167. Brown on Sale, p. 33, § 40, p. 148, § 201. Sugden on Vendors, I. p. 465, and cases cited. Langmuir v. Sloan, 21st May 1840; 2 S. and D., p. 877. Lord Dunmore v. M'Inturner, 28th January 1835; 13 S. and D. 356. Bell's Prin. § 92. Ersk. III. 3, 4; IV. 3, 32; and Parker on Arb. p. 120. Authorities for Defender.—Stair, I. 14, l. 1. Ersk. III. 3, 4. E. of Montrose, 1639; M. 15, 145. Brown on Sale, p. 120.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn, for Jeffrey.—Act. Rutherford, A. M'Neill; L. Mackintosh, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Pyper; J. Richardson, W.S., Agent.—[G.D.F.]

1st July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 240.—THOMAS MANSFIELD (Burnett's Trustee), Raiser, v. MRS VIOLET YOUNG and OTHERS, Claimants.

Proof.—Evidence.—Heritable and Personal Creditors.—Question of evidence, whether particular portions of land were comprehended under the securities of heritable creditors, and a conveyance to a trustee for payment of debt, or whether they belonged to personal creditors as a fund of payment?

The late James Burnett was proprietor of the lands of Barns, Haswellaykes, two third parts of Over Glack, and sundry other subjects, with pertinents, lying within the barony of Traquair, and county of Peebles. Sir James Nasmyth of Posso was the contiguous proprietor, and part of his estate, which was entailed, and that of Barns, &c., appeared to have been considerably interspersed, or lay runrig and rundale, and were possessed pro indiviso in certain portions by the respective tenants of the two estates. In 1781, after an application to the Sheriff of the county, a contract of excambion was executed by Mr Burnett and Sir James Nasmyth, by which the latter conveyed to the former "all and whole the foresaid lands of Haswellaykes, Caverbill, with these parts of the Over and Nether Glacks, amounting to 626 acres 1 rood and 13 falls, with a small fraction lying north of the line of march therein described, and particularly bounded and described in the foresaid report and plan relative thereto, here held as repeated brevitatis causa."

Mr Burnett, on the other hand, conveyed to Sir James Nasmyth,

"all and whole the said lands of Woodhouse and Templehaugh, with these parts of the lands of Over and Nether Glacks, amounting in all, as aforesaid, to 572 acres 2 roods 9 falls, and a small fraction lying on the south of said line of division, and bounded and described in the manner mentioned in the foreshaid report, and plan relative thereto."

In regard to this excambion it was explained by the raiser, that although it bore that 626 acres were given by Sir James Nasmyth to Mr Burnett, and 572 acres by Mr Burnett to Sir James in return, it far exceeded the amount of lands actually excambed. These amounts included large portions of ground, which previously had respectively belonged to each of them, and the measurements were only introduced for the purpose of pointing out the extent of the whole lands which had been made the subject of division, whether belonging to Sir James Nasmyth or Mr Burnett, that had been allocated to each. Thus the contract bore that Sir James conveyed to Mr Burnett the lands of Haswell-sykes, although they never belonged to Sir James, but were exclusively the property of Mr Burnett; and, on the other hand, the disposition by Mr Burnett disposed to Sir James parts of the lands of Nether Glack, which are not contained in his titles, but were the property of Sir James; and so also he disposed to him the whole lands of Woodhouse, although, as appeared from his titles, he had only right to one-fourth part of them, the remainder belonging to Sir James.

These parties were infest under the excambion, and possessed under it. Thereafter, Mr Burnett, in 1816, conveyed his whole heritable property to his son James, the description of the lands in that conveyance being the same, with a slight exception, as that contained in his own original infestment; "together with all right, title and interest, claim of right, property and possession, which I and my predecessors and authors had, have, or can any way claim or pretend thereto in all time coming."

In this deed, however, there was no per expressum conveyance to his son of the lands of Caverhill, which Burnett, senior, had received under the contract of excambion; and the son, while he possessed these subjects, never made up any titles in special to them, nor till after insolvency.

Burnett, junior, contracted considerable debt; and in conveying his lands in heritable security, there was no per expressum conveyance to the creditors in their securities of the lands of Caverhill,—the lands assigned in security being described in the same way as in the conveyance by Burnett senior to Burnett junior. The latter executed a trust-deed in favour of the pursuer of his heritable property, for payment of his creditors, but the description of the lands conveyed to the trustee was precisely in the same situation as in the previous conveyances.

The trustee accepted the office and sold the estate, including the lands of Caverhill, which were advertised to consist of 110 acres, and it was only then, in consequence of it having been discovered that there was no title to Caverhill in the person of Burnett, junior, that he, on insolvency, made up a supplementary title to the lands, and conveyed them to the purchaser.

In this state of matters, certain of the personal creditors required the trustee to set apart for them, as a fund of payment, the price or value of the lands of Caverhill, from which, it was contended, the heritable creditors were excluded, as their securities did not, per expressum, extend over these subjects. This was resisted by the trustee for the heritable creditors, who, at a meeting of the creditors, received instructions to pay off the heritable creditors in full; but as certain creditors were absent (inter alios the claimants, who were personal creditors,) who did not appear to have acceded to the trust, a notification was sent to them, to the effect that the trustee was to act on the resolution of the meeting, unless instructed to the contrary within eight days, and that if further opposition was intended, it would be necessary to put the trustee in funds to litigate the question with the heritable creditors. The claimants still however objected to the resolution of the creditors, and intimated to the trustee, while the fund was still in his hands, that they would hold him liable if he parted with the fund in the way which had been resolved on.

The present multiplepounding was then raised, in which the trustee maintained, that though it had been found necessary, as a matter of form, to complete a title to Caverhill separately, yet, as the lands could not now, from lapse of time, and the impossibility of distinguishing the boundaries, or the parcels of land of which it consisted, from the circumstance of the properties of Sir James Nasmyth and of Mr Burnett lying so interspersed together, it must be held that they fell under the conveyances to the heritable creditors, as part and pertinent of the rest of the estate, and so were covered by their securities, preferably to mere personal creditors. It was also maintained, that the claimants were barred from objecting to the payment of the heritable creditors in full, as they had failed to put the trustee in funds to litigate, or to come under any obligation for the results that might arise from the opposition. The trustee, besides, pleaded—that the opposition of the claimants was nimious and oppressive, as the course followed by the trustee was the best, in the circumstances, for the interests of all concerned; for, as the heritable creditors had it in their power to pursue measures under their real rights, which would have entailed a ruinous expense on the personal creditors, no other course was so beneficial as the one adopted.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th December 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, productions, and whole process, and made avizandum—Finds, 1mo, That Mrs Young and the trustees of her late husband (the real raisers and objectors to the condescendence of the fund in medio) are to be considered as non-acceding creditors to the trust constituted by Mr Burnett of Barns in the person of Mr Mansfield, the nominal raiser, and could not, as such creditors, be barred from pursuing separate measures, and attaching the estate of their debtor, or any part thereof, by any act of resolution of the trustee or acceding creditors: Finds, 2do, That as it is admitted that the said objectors did intimate and give notice to the trustee (both privately and by protest) that they meant to challenge the legality of his making payments to the heritable creditors, which they now seek to have disallowed, while the funds were still in his hands, and before these payments were actually made, it is not necessary for them to bring a reduction either of these payments, or of the trust generally; and that by raising the present process of multiplepounding in name of the trustee immediately after the said intimation and protest, and insisting that the amount of the said payments shall be included in, or added to the condescendence of the said fund, they are not to be considered as having acceded to the trust, but only to have exercised their right to pursue separate measures, and attach the estate of their debtor, as now actually or constructively in the hands of the nominal raiser: Finds, Stio, That the transaction between the late Sir James Nasmyth and the deceased Burnett of Barna in 1781, was far more of the nature of a division of properties formerly possessed by them pro indiviso, or in runrig or rundale, than a proper excambion or mutual conveyance of separate tenements which had previously belonged exclusively to one or other of the disposing parties; and that the burden of proving that any of the properties then disposed to Burnett were truly of the latter description, and also of proving the extent, boundaries, and present value of such properties, is wholly on the objectors: Finds, 4to, That the said objectors cannot now succeed in getting any addition made to the fund in medio, unless they can prove that the arrangement made by the trustee (with the consent of all the other personal creditors), under which the payments now objected to were made to the heritable creditors, was in itself an injudicious arrangement, and has actually occasioned greater loss to the personal creditors than they would have sustained through loss of interest, pointing of the ground, expenses of litigation, and otherwise, if that arrangement had not been gone into; and before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the objectors may explain in what way they mean to proceed with the proof now proposed to be allowed them.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has no favourable impression as to the objectors' ultimate success; but he sees no reason to doubt that they are entitled to try the question, and in this shape. In substance and fact they are now doing for themselves, and against him and his whole constituents, what he invited or challenged them to do (rather more awkwardly) in his name, and against a part only of these constituents, or the heritable creditors alone—that is, they are litigating, at their own expense, for access to the disputed fund. There seems no room either to doubt that a non-acceding creditor, who is trying to take a fund out of the hands of a trustee, backed by all who have acceded, by raising a multiplepointing in the name of such trustee, is very emphatically pursuing separate measures.

"The ground of the third finding cannot be well explained, without going into more detail than would be convenient in this place. But it is evident that 626 and 572 acres of arable ground could not have been properly excambed under the 10th Geo. III., which only allows thirty acres of that description to be so disposed of, and indeed little more than one-fourth even of Caverhill (extending to 109 acres) could have been acquired de novo by a conveyance of that description. There is room probably for a distinction between the lands which were disposed in 1781, under a denomination which does not at all occur in the previous titles of the donee (as seems to be the case as to Caverhill alone), and these where the name does not stand in his original titles. But even as to the former, the objectors will have great difficulties, both from the effect of probable possession as part and pertinent of other lands, and from the probable change in the boundaries and extent of lands passing under the same denomination, in the course of the sixty years which have elapsed since 1781.

"The fourth finding imports no more than that the objectors cannot succeed, unless they show that more would not have been taken away from the fund for general distribution than would have been added to it, by the trustee acting as they now say he ought to have done."

On a reclaiming note, the Court, 10th March 1841, recalled the last two findings in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and before answer, allowed a proof to both parties of their disputed averments, i. e., in reference to the situation of the lands of Caverhill; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly. His Lordship, on the remit, allowed the proof, and thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:

"9th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties under the remit of 10th March 1841, from the Court, and considered the process, Finds that the security held by Mr Mansfield, the trustee, for behoof of the real creditors, does not comprehend the lands of Caverhill: Finds that these lands must be held to consist of the 108 acres sold by the trustee as Caverhill: Finds (subject however to the condition immediately hereafter mentioned,) that the price of this Caverhill must be added to the fund in medio in this process, to the effect the claimants may draw their due share thereof; but that it is competent for the trustee to extinguish the interest of the claimants as such, by showing that the arrangement by which the price of Caverhill was paid to the real creditors, was beneficial for the claimants, or not injurious to them; and before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that it may be settled how the matter is to be proceeded with in reference to this last view, and reserves all questions of expenses.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary thinks that the transaction between Sir James Nasmyth and Mr Burnett was not a mere division of land formerly held pro indiviso, or lying runrig or rundale, but was an excambion of separate properties, and that hence, as the securities apply only to the previous titles, they do not include Caverhill, part of the excambed ground acquired by Barna for the first time by this contract of excambion.

"If the claimants had insisted upon it, it is not improbable that they might have succeeded in showing that Caverhill was larger, but they stated that they were willing to hold it to be as the trustee himself had represented and sold it.

"Having paid the price of this estate to the heritable creditors, in the face of objections by the claimants, they have a clear title to vindicate their interest; but the possibility of the trustee extinguishing this interest is kept open."

Mrs Young reclaimed, praying the Court

"so far to recal, vary, or alter the said interlocutor, as to find it proven, from the writings produced in process, that the march of the lands acquired by Mr Burnett of Barna from Sir James Nasmyth of Posso, under the contract of excambion, 1781, and not comprehended in the securities granted to the heritable creditors, as sworn to by Thomas Gibson, a witness for Mr Mansfield, began at Barnhouse, or near it, and ran straight up to the top of the Hunt Hill, and then went along the top of the ridge for about a mile in length to the Dawick march, and then came down the Hope by the burn, and from that along the new line of division, all as laid down on the plan by William Oman, 6th September 1781, and to remit to a competent person or persons to measure and value the said lands, and to report; and to find that the said Thomas Mansfield is bound to add the amount of the price or value of the said lands to the fund in medio, in the present process, to the effect the claimants, as personal creditors, may draw their just share thereof; and to find the said Thomas Mansfield personally liable to the claimants in the whole expenses hitherto incurred by the claimants."

Mansfield also reclaimed, praying the Court to find that the price of Caverhill did not fall to be added to the fund in medio, and to find Mrs Young liable in expenses.

The Court

"Alter the interlocutor, in so far as to find that the lands of Caverhill consist of 110 acres, as advertised by Mr Mansfield, as Caverhill; and in regard to the last finding, of consent alter the said interlocutor, in so far as to reserve the point of competency, referred to in the said interlocutor, to be discussed before the Lord Ordinary under the last direction in the said interlocutor: quoad ultra, adhere to the said interlocutor, and remit to his Lordship to proceed further in the cause: Find the reclaimers, the said Mrs Violet Young and the trustees of the said Thomas Young, entitled to their expenses since the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. A. Anderson; W. and J. Cook, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Penney; A. Hutchison, Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

2d July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 241.—REV. JAMES DOUNE SMITH, Suspender, v. PRESBYTERY OF ABERTARFF AND OTHERS, Respondents.

Process—Suspension—Interdict—Where a presbytery was proceeding with a libel against a minister, interdict granted before answer, on the ground that the minister of a parliamentary church and his elder had seats in the presbytery, and were taking part in the proceedings.

The note of suspension in this case stated, that a libel had been served on the complainer by persons "alleging themselves to constitute" the Presbytery of Abertarff, "falsely accusing him of certain acts of fornication and adultery,"—that of the pretended members, one was the minister of one of the Parliamentary Churches, and another his elder,—that an appeal had been taken to the General Assembly, who had sustained the relevancy of the libel, and appointed four ministers taken from other Presbyteries to proceed with the Presbytery of Abertarff in preparing the case for final judgment,—and that accordingly witnesses had been summoned, and the proof was appointed to be taken on the 5th current. The suspender therefore prayed "to suspend the proceedings complained of, and to interdict, prohibit and discharge the said Presbytery of Abertarff, and the" (individual members), "from jointly or severally proceeding to take proof upon the libel against the complainer, dated 2d March 1842, depending, or alleged to be depending at present before the said Presbytery, and from further taking cognisance of, or following out any proceedings under the said libel, or to any effect proceeding with the same, and from pronouncing any judgment under the said libel, or carrying into effect any judgments pronounced, or to be pronounced under the same; also to interdict, prohibit and discharge the said Charles Stewart from taking any proceedings either under name of agent, assessor or otherwise, under the said libel; also to interdict, prohibit and discharge the said Mary Macphie, and other persons before named, cited, or proposed to be cited as witnesses under the said libel, from appearing before the Presbytery, in order to give evidence under the same, and from giving evidence in the matters of the said libel, or taking any part in the proceedings under the same."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"1st July 1842.—To see and answer within fourteen days, and to be intimated, reserving consideration of the question of interdict, and likewise as to caution."

The suspender reclaimed:

Lord President.—I pay no regard to any of the statements but this, that persons alleged not legal members of the Presbytery are taking part in the proceedings; and on this ground, the sufficiency of which we have repeatedly recognised, I am clear that the interdict should be granted. Were we to do otherwise, we should absolutely stultify ourselves.

Lord Fullerton.—I took a different view in the other cases, and do here also of course, though the granting of the interdict seems to follow from these cases.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have some doubts. Formerly we had only to consider whether we ought to recal an interdict where the respondents had made no appearance. Here I don't know whether they are to appear or not.

Lord Gillies.—If we only order them to answer, without granting the interdict, they will gain their cause. They will proceed with the proof of their allegations, and so do an irreparable injury to the suspender.

Lord Mackenzie.—I don't wish to hold, that in all cases where an allegation of this kind is made, interdict is to be at once granted. I am not prepared to adopt this as a general principle; but in the special circumstances—considering that the proceedings, if allowed to take place, will be irreparable,—I think we must grant the interdict.

The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary, with instructions to grant the interdict.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Robertson, Penney; Hugh Fraser, W.S., Agent.—[H.B.]

2d July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 242.—MRS ISABELLA COLINA ROY or MACKENZIE, Claimant, v. CURATOR for ROSS'S CHILDREN, Respondent.

Husband and Wife—Marriage-Contract—Annuity—Competition—Trust-Deed—A wife, who was secured in an annuity of £500 by antenuptial contract, followed by infestment in her husband's lands, which were sold by his trustee, held entitled to have her annuity fully secured to her out of the balance of the price of the estate upon which her annuity was secured, after payment of the preferable securities, and such balance directed to be laid out in purchasing or securing the same accordingly.

By antenuptial contract, dated 25th August 1817, Kenneth Mackenzie of Dundonnell provided the claimant, Mrs Isabella Colina Roy or Mackenzie, in a jointure of £500 per annum, restrictable to £400 in the event of there being issue of the marriage. The contract bound Mr Mackenzie, and his heirs and successors, personally for this jointure, and also contained a conveyance of his estate of Dundonnell in security of the provision, with precept of sasine, upon which Mrs Mackenzie was duly infest in October 1817. Mr Mackenzie died in April 1826, without issue of the marriage, having previously executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, in favour of certain trustees in succession, containing a conveyance of the estate of Dundonnell, with a power of sale, and a deed of settlement, dated 11th July 1817, regulating the succession to the estate. Under this latter deed, Thomas Mackenzie, the testator's only surviving brother, became entitled to succeed to the estate, under the express condition of his making payment of a sum of £5000 to be settled on his sister, Mrs Dr Ross, in liferent, and her children in fee.

After Kenneth Mackenzie's death the estate was sold by the trustee, the late Mr Girvan, accountant, under the powers in the trust-disposition of 1824, who thereupon brought an action of multiplepinding, calling all parties interested into Court. With the view of throwing open a capital sum for division upon the postponed claimants on the fund, and saving the loss of interest from the fund in medio being deposited in bank, a proposal was made to Mrs Mackenzie to allow her annuity to be redeemed by payment of a slump sum as its converted value. To this proposal Mrs Mackenzie agreed; and it having been ascertained that the medium value of the annuity, according to the tables other than those of Government, was £7500, Mrs Mackenzie declared her willingness to accept of this sum, and the arrangement received the sanction of Dundonnell's creditors at a general meeting held on 20th May 1834.

A difficulty, however, arose, in consequence of Dr Ross's family being minors, and therefore, it was thought incompetent for them, or by their father, to give a binding consent to the proposed arrangement. To obviate this difficulty the summons of multiplepounding, by which the fund in medio was thrown into Court, contained amongst others a conclusion,

"that it ought and should be found and declared, by decree of our said Lords, that the purchase of the said annuity of £500 per annum to the said Mrs Isabella Colina Mackenzie for the said price of £7500, was a proper and beneficial act of administration on the part of the pursuer, as trustee foresaid. And our said Lords ought and should interpose their authority thereto."

The heritable creditors prior in right to the claimant, Mrs Mackenzie, were paid out of the price, and she also consented to payment of a variety of other claims not preferably secured, by which the balance of the fund in medio became greatly reduced. The only claimants in the multiplepounding were,—1st, Mrs Mackenzie for her annuity; 2d, Mrs Ross and her children for the provision of £5000; and, 3d, The trustee upon the sequestrated estate of Thomas Mackenzie for the residue, if any should arise. The last of these claims was ultimately withdrawn, in consequence of its being discovered that there would not be enough even to satisfy the claim of Mrs Ross and her children. The only parties that remained were therefore Mrs Mackenzie, the preferable creditor, and Mrs Ross and her children, the postponed claimants; and the question between these two regarded the mode in which Mrs Mackenzie's claim for annuity was to be settled and given effect to.

In her claim, as lodged in process, Mrs Mackenzie stated the following pleas:—"1. The claimant is entitled to be preferred on the fund in medio for the sum of £7500, as the converted value of the annuity secured to her by her marriage-contract over the lands of Dundonnell, and interest thereon since Whitsunday 1834." This plea refers to the contract which had been made with the creditors, before explained. "2. If this claim is not given effect to, the claimant is entitled to have secured and set apart such a capital sum as will provide her in the annuity of £500 per annum, secured by her marriage-contract. 3. In the event of the estate not yielding a capital sum, which, invested at the ordinary rate of interest, will yield a yearly return equivalent to the claimant's annuity, she is entitled to demand that the balance of the funds, or so much as is necessary, should be employed to purchase an annuity for her from Government or otherwise, so as to make good her primary right as creditor on the estate."

In the course of the discussion which ensued, Mrs Mackenzie contended, that if the contract as to the conversion was not fulfilled, she was entitled to insist, either that her annuity should be made good to her by a sum being invested sufficient to produce it at simple interest; or, if the fund in medio was not sufficient for that purpose, that such annuity should be purchased, either from Government or some other quarter, by the employment of so much of the fund as should be necessary for that purpose.

Upon advising the pleas of parties, the Lord Ordinary (Lord Moncreiff) pronounced the following interlocutor:

"12th May 1838.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed record, and heard parties' procurators on the claim of Mrs Mackenzie, in regard to the annuity provided to her, as explained alternatively in the three first pleas in law for the said claimant, and on the claim for expenses incurred by the claimants in making up the record against Mr Girvan, the trustee and raiser of the multiplepounding, and having made avizandum, Finds that the claimant, Mrs Mackenzie, is an onerous creditor on the whole fund in medio for her annuity of £500, originally secured by infestment over the estate of Dundonnell, the price of which, after being sold by Mr Girvan, the trustee, forms the fund in medio in this multiplepounding: Finds that the only other claimants, Mrs Ross and her children, are merely gratuitous legatees for their respective interests of life and fee, in the sum of £5000, payable out of any reversion of the funds which may remain after satisfying the proper debts of the deceased Kenneth Mackenzie: Finds that the precise right of the claimant, Mrs Mackenzie, is, in terms of her second plea in law, to have such a sum of capital from the price of the estate laid out and secured, as may be sufficient, at the rate of interest which may be obtained by contract, to secure the payment of her said annuity during her life; and that, till her death, the other claimants, Mrs Ross and her children, could have no claim over that capital money: Finds, that if such a sufficient fund were found to exist, Mrs Mackenzie could not insist for more than that it should be so secured, and in particular, would not be entitled to demand that an estimate of the present value of her annuity should be made by calculation, and the amount thereof in a capital sum should be paid over to her: But finds, that in the event that, upon a full adjustment of the state of the funds, it shall appear that there is not a sufficient sum of capital to secure the said annuity by simple investment, the said Mrs Mackenzie must be entitled to insist, either that her annuity shall be valued, and the value thereof paid to her as the amount of her claim in the multiplepounding; or otherwise, that the full payment of her annuity, during all the days of her life, shall be effectually secured to her by some other form of investment, of the whole or a part of the sum which may remain in medio; and finds that the other claimants, as the gratuitous donees of the deceased Kenneth Mackenzie, have no legal title or interest to resist such her claim to one or other of the said alternatives, as set forth in her first and third pleas in law, but in the option of the said other claimants, under the control of the Court. But in respect that it does not appear that the precise amount of the fund in medio has yet been ascertained, supersedes farther judgment in hoc statu, in regard to the application of the principles thus laid down; but allows the cause to be enrolled by either party: Finds that Mrs Mackenzie has a just claim against the fund in medio for the arrears of the annuity already due, and also for the value of one-half of the household furniture of the deceased, according to the terms of her marriage-contract; and that, in the event of its being found that there is not a sufficient fund both to pay the sums so due, and to secure the annuity de futuro, it will be in her option either to take payment thereof, or to allow the whole sum to be laid out for providing the annuity: Finds that it is not expedient to give any judgment on the claim for expenses in making up the record and otherwise, now made against Mr Girvan, until Mr Girvan's own accounts, and all objections which may be made against them, shall be before the Lord Ordinary: Therefore, in the meantime, reserves also all such questions, and reserves also all other questions of expenses."

To this interlocutor his Lordship added the following note:

"The first question disposed of by the interlocutor is somewhat curious, and not quite simple. But it must be kept in view that Mrs Mackenzie had not merely the personal obligation of the deceased for her annuity, but also the security of the whole estate of Dundonnell by infestment. As long, therefore, as any part of that estate, or what is the same thing, the price of it, remains, she is entitled, not merely to have her annuities paid as they fall due, but to have her right to them in some manner made secure by the substitution of some other security in place of that which is taken away. If there was a capital sufficient to secure it, she could ask no more; but if there is not such a capital, she is bound, after the whole funds is in the hands of the Court for division, to accept of successive annuities out of that limited capital, under the hazard that it may entirely fail long before the expiry of her lifetime? Or are the gratuitous donees of her husband entitled to say that she shall be put to that hazard in order to give them a chance of reversion if she should die before the fund is exhausted; or to state such an interest as an objection to any mode of application of the existing fund, by which full implement of the onerous debt may be given or secured? After full consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, though metaphysical subtleties may be suggested on such a question, the plain sense of it is, that the onerous creditor must, if possible, be made entirely secure by means of that which is the surrogatum of her previous security, and that no gratuitous legatees can oppose her in that demand.

"It would indeed be most unreasonable to listen to such a plea, unless the other parties were to produce some other sufficient security that the annuity should not fail, and this would really come to the same thing. But if it were even supposeable that the annuitant should be content with such a diminished annuity as the existing capital simply invested would secure, certainly when she died, her representatives would have a good claim for payment of all the sums of annuity unpaid from the capital so preserved, before the legatees could draw anything. The Lord Ordinary is, however, of opinion that the legal right of the annuitant is according to the findings in the interlocutor."

This interlocutor having been brought under review of their Lordships of the Second Division by a reclaiming note for Dr and Mrs Ross and their children, and the curator ad litem for their children, the note was refused, and the interlocutor affirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Court.

On the case returning to the Lord Ordinary, the first point to be ascertained was the actual amount of the fund in medio, and the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"23d February 1839.—The Lord Ordinary appoints Mrs Mackenzie to put in a minute as to the amount of the fund in medio, with reference to the payment or securing of her annuity, and that in eight days; and appoints the other parties to answer the same, and also to state in their answers which of the alternatives of the interlocutor, of date 12th May 1838, they propose to adopt."

The claimant accordingly lodged a minute, giving the estimate of the fund in medio, the amount of which depended on contingencies, and which, in one view taken by her, would not exceed £6600; and she added, that in any view, "the fund in medio was not a sufficient fund to secure to Mrs Mackenzie, by simple investment, payment of her annuity during her life."

In answering this minute, the curator ad litem, though not admitting the arithmetical details of Mrs Mackenzie's estimate, admitted that the fund in medio was not sufficient to secure the annuity by simple investment; and with regard to the call made upon him to state which of the alternatives of Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor, with reference to the adjustment of the annuity, he was inclined to adopt, the curator said:

"On the whole, he rather inclines to think that, in a practical point of view, the interests of the minors would be best secured by adopting, as far as is necessary, the latter alternative, viz., that the full payment of her annuity, during all the days of her life, shall be effectually secured to her by some other form of investment of the whole or a part of the sum which may remain in medio."

"As to the particular mode of arrangement, it occurs to him that a mixed plan would be preferable, viz., that part of the fund should be employed in purchasing for Mrs Mackenzie, or in redeeming from her, such an amount of annuity as would, together with the interest to be obtained for the remainder of the fund laid out at simple interest, make up the full annuity of £500.

"The mode is suggested by the curator for the sanction of the Court. He does not consider himself at liberty to make choice of either alternative, absolutely, without their sanction."

Subsequently, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"28th May 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, before answer remits to Mr John Mackenzie, manager of the Scottish Widows' Fund, to report in what manner the full payment, during all the days of Mrs Mackenzie's life, could be effectually secured to her by the payment or investment of the whole or any part of the fund in medio; and what sum will be required for this purpose. And also to report whether any other plan occurs to him calculated to purchase or secure the said annuity, with the probability of a reversion to the other claimants, and to offer any other suggestions calculated to carry into effect the views of the parties."

An interim report was returned by Mr Mackenzie, in which he pointed out the impracticability of what had been called the mixed mode of adjustment. He farther reported, that upon an investment at simple interest, with such drafts made upon the capital as might be necessary to make up the deficiency of the annuity, the whole fund would, according to the best estimate that could be formed of its amount, be exhausted in seventeen or nineteen years, leaving the annuitant without any thing, in the one case, at the age of sixty-four, and in the other, at that of sixty-six. He farther reported, "that the value of her annuity, according to the Northampton tables of mortality, interest at four per cent., was £5945; whilst the lowest sum which he could ascertain would be taken by a respectable and safe office to secure her in an annuity of £500, would not be less than £7500."

In the course of the proceedings before the accountant, he suggested that some arrangement might best be made by a concession, to some extent, on the part of Mrs Mackenzie, of her legal rights. Mrs Mackenzie, whilst not waiving any of these rights, expressed herself willing to make such concession, and proposed "to give up one-half of the arrears of annuity claimed by her." (which amounted to a very large sum) "and to accept of £6730 as the valuation of her annuity, being the mean sum between the calculated value, according to the Northampton tables, and that which was shown to be the lowest amount that would be charged by a safe and respectable office."

This offer was not accepted; and upon the case returning to the Lord Ordinary, with Mr Mackenzie's report, his Lordship allowed Mrs Mackenzie to give in a minute, stating "what she proposes to accept in this case, having in view the interim report by Mr John Mackenzie." By a minute, Mrs Mackenzie accordingly stated, that what she, on her side, chose was, not that any value of her annuity should be made, but that the sum of £7500, reported on by Mr Mackenzie, or such other sum as the fund in medio could afford, should be employed in purchasing or procuring her annuity, or so much of it as could be purchased or procured.

Parties were then appointed to debate, when the following interlocutor was pronounced by Lord Ivory, before whom the case had come to depend (18th July 1840):

"Finds that there is nothing in the interlocutor of 17th January and 19th February last, or in any of the previous interlocutors in causa, to tie down Mrs Mackenzie to the statement of any particular sum as the amount which she is willing to accept in satisfaction of her legal claims, but that the course there pointed at was merely tentative, and had in view only to give the parties an opportunity of coming to a settlement in this way, had they both been at one in the matter: Therefore, and in respect that all attempts to adjust the matters in dispute by mutual arrangement have fallen to the ground, and that Mrs Mackenzie, with reference to the findings in Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor of 12th May 1838 (adhered to by the Court on 11th November thereafter), has now intimated her election in favour of the purchase of an annuity—Appoints cases on the whole remaining points of the cause, and more especially as to the construction and effect of the said interlocutor of 12th May 1838, and the application of the principles therein laid down."

In compliance with this order, cases were lodged for the parties, in which—it being admitted that the balance of the fund in medio was insufficient, if laid out upon simple investment, to secure Mrs Mackenzie in payment of her annuity—it was contended, on the part of Mrs Mackenzie, that, in terms of the final interlocutor of 12th May 1838, she was entitled either to have the value of her annuity paid over to her,—that value being the sum for which the annuity could be purchased from a respectable insurance office,—or to have the full payment of her annuity secured to her by some other form of investment, out of part or the whole of the fund in medio; while, on the other hand, it was contended—(1.) that Mrs Mackenzie was not entitled to have the fund in medio applied in such a way, in security of her annuity, as to deprive the family of the Rosses of all chance of succeeding to any part of it, as would be the case, were the value of her annuity to be paid over to her, or a corresponding annuity purchased from an insurance office, but that she was entitled to no more than the security which the fund, tantum et tale, as it was, afforded; and, (2.) That if she were to be found entitled to receive payment of the present value of her annuity, that value was to be estimated, not by what an insurance office would sell the annuity for, but according to the value of the annuity by the Northampton tables.

The Lord Ordinary, in making avizandum to the Court with the revised cases for the parties, pronounced the following interlocutor and note:

"16th June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the cases given in by Mrs Mackenzie, and the children of Dr Ross, in regard to the mode of dealing with Mrs Mackenzie's claim as a creditor for her annuity of £500, with reference to the species facti now admitted on all bands, viz., that 'the fund in medio is not a sufficient fund to secure to Mrs Mackenzie, by simple investment,' the payment of her annuity during her life: Inasmuch as this question may in a great measure depend upon the reading and construction of Lord Moncreiff's interlocutor of 12th May 1838, adhered to by the Court on 11th June of the same year—finds that the more expedient course for all concerned will be to obtain the judgment of the Court thereon: Therefore, makes avizandum with this branch of the cause (its other branches having of this date been disposed of by separate interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary,) to their Lordships of the Second Division; ordains the cases (already printed) to be boxed, and grants warrant to enrol.

"Note.—Of the various matters with which the Lord Ordinary has had occasion to deal in his several interlocutors of this date, the leading and most important is certainly that which is involved in the question wherewith avizandum has here been made to the Court. For if Mrs Mackenzie's claim under this head shall eventually be sustained, in the shape and to the full extent which she insists for, the entire fund in medio will be exhausted by this single claim, and there will remain nothing whatever to fight about between her and her only competitors, Dr Ross's children. Indeed, many of the findings in the separate interlocutors, which derive their importance only from the chance of an opposite result, will fall to the ground and become practically inoperative.

"This branch of the cause comes, therefore, to be of the very last moment for all concerned. And though the judgment of the Court formerly pronounced in regard to it must now necessarily be taken as the rule of the case, the Lord Ordinary is not sure but that, in construing and extricating that judgment, the Court may still find some measure of difficulty which they did not anticipate when it was pronounced.

"The principle of the judgment seems to be, that in one shape or another, Mrs Mackenzie—as in a question with Mrs Ross and her children, viewed as gratuitous legatees—is either to be secured if possible, during her whole lifetime, in payment of her annuity,—or if that cannot be, then that her claim must be satisfied by a present payment as an equivalent. That is to say—(1.) If there had been a sufficient capital (which there is not) to yield an amount of interest equal to the annuity payable, the judgment finds her entitled to insist that the necessary investment of such capital should be made for that end. Failing this, the judgment finds her entitled to insist, 'either (2.) that her annuity shall be valued, and the value thereof paid to her as the amount of her claim in the multiplepointing;—or otherwise, (3.) that the full payment of her annuity, during all the days of her life, shall be effectually secured to her by some other form of investment, of the whole or a part of the sum which may remain in medio.'

"The interlocutor goes on to say, that 'the other claimants (the Rosses) have no legal title or interest to resist such her claim to one or other of the said alternatives, as set forth in her first and third pleas in law, but in the option of the said other claimants, under the control of the Court.'

"Now, here arises one important question between the parties,—Is it Mrs Mackenzie, or is it the Rosses who are to have the right of electing between the two alternatives, 1st, of discharging the annuity at once by payment of its present value; or 2d, of purchasing—from an insurance office or otherwise—an annuity to be paid de anno in annum so long as Mrs Mackenzie lives?

"But another, and not less important question lies behind,—supposing Mrs Mackenzie bound to accept of the first alternative,—what is to be understood, and what shall she be bound to accept, as the present value of her annuity?

"On the first of these questions, it does humbly appear to the Lord Ordinary that the plain reading of the interlocutor is to give the election to the Rosses; and that the control therein referred to as to be exercised by the Court, is a control for the benefit of the pupils, in whose behalf the election is to be made, and whose interests had been placed by the Court under the charge of a curator,—who could not, by the very nature of his office, make the election otherwise than under the control and by the authority of the Court.

"Mrs Mackenzie, however, contends, that it was she, and not the Rosses and their curator, to whom the right of election was given; and that any option that was conferred upon the latter was, as she terms it, a mere option of resistance,—or, in other words, an option of calling on the Court to decide between the parties, if they could not agree among themselves. The Lord Ordinary cannot help thinking this a most strained construction, and one contrary not less to the spirit than to the letter of the interlocutor. The Court, however, by whom the interlocutor was affirmed,—more especially as they have now the aid of the learned Judge by whom that interlocutor was originally pronounced,—can have no difficulty in dealing with this matter.

"As regards the second question,—what, supposing Mrs Mackenzie bound to consent to the conversion of her annuity, is, under the construction of the interlocutor, to be understood as answering the description of its present value?—the Lord Ordinary may perhaps, before entering on that point, be permitted, with very great deference, to intimate a doubt, how far, as a strict question of law, and apart from supposed equitable considerations,—an annuity-creditor is at all entitled to the benefit of such a conversion. He has always understood, that, under any circumstances, an annuity-creditor, secured in no more than an annuity out of a particular estate, is not entitled, so far as regards future, and therefore merely contingent annuities, either to appropriate the estate over which the annuity is secured, as in present payment once for all of that annuity (and no matter whether, in point of fact, its future terms shall ever come to be exigible or not), or to compel the proprietor to sell the estate, in order that, by sinking the price in the purchase of an annuity, a different form and extent of security altogether should be substituted in room and place of that which had been originally contracted for. Yet, what is a conversion of the annuity in substance but this in another shape? The annuitant may adjudge in payment and satisfaction of past arrears; and in security also, it may be, of future annuities—the term of such future annuities, however, being in the latter case first come and bygone, before any security of this kind can be made substantively available. But even in the lifetime of the debtor in the annuity, it is not thought that the annuitant could, by any form of diligence, have a larger remedy. And surely there is no difference, in point of principle, where the question arises with the original debtor's representative; and just as little where the estate, which was the original subject of security, has been sold, and the question arises in reference to the disposal of its price—the price in such case being just a surrogatum for the estate.

"The Lord Ordinary is the more struck with this as the strictly legal view of the matter, that he observes the principle of conversion,—that is to say, of substituting payment at a present value, as in satisfaction and discharge of a continuing annuity, or even of at all touching the original security for that annuity, without the creditors' express consent,—is in the strongest terms repudiated, not only by Mrs Mackenzie herself, but by the accountant to whom it was remitted to consider and report upon this question. For, surely, if the one party be thus entitled to stand upon the original contract, the other, with great submission, must be not less so. If Mrs Mackenzie cannot be compelled to take payment once for all of her annuity by acceptance of its present value,—so neither can the other party be compelled to make such payment, and for that purpose, it may be, to part with the entire estate, or, what comes to the same thing, with the price, which is a surrogatum for the estate, in order either to buy off the debt from Mrs Mackenzie herself, or to purchase therewith the additional security of an insurance company, with a view to render Mrs Mackenzie's eventual safety more assured. If Mrs Mackenzie be entitled to say, as she repeatedly does throughout her pleading, that she will have her annuity, and nothing either more or less, so, on the other hand, the Rosses or other representatives of Dundonnell, as the debtors in that annuity, seem entitled to answer, that in such case she can enforce payment only in terms of the original contract, or in other words, that she must take her annuity precisely as it is there stipulated to be given,—that is to say, she can only enforce it, and therefore must be content to take it, de anno in annum, as each successive term falls due,—and out of the Dundonnell estate over which it stands secured,—or out of the price of that estate which has come in its place as surrogatum,—and this without either the addition or substitution of any new or different form of security whatever.

"Holding this then to be the strict legal result of the case, it humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, that however much the Court have held themselves entitled to control or qualify such a result, in the exercise of an equity jurisdiction—the above considerations strongly illustrate and affect the case, even in construing and following out the equitable principle which has been introduced into the question by the former judgment. There is nothing in that judgment, however, which expressly entitles Mrs Mackenzie to appropriate to herself the price of Dundonnell. Neither is there any thing therein which entitles her to demand that that price shall be laid out, in order to purchase for her a different security from that which the said residue, as a surrogatum for the estate itself, at present affords. No doubt her security, such as it is at this moment, is not to be lessened; but, on the other hand, neither is it to be enlarged, nor without the mutual consent of parties, in any respect altered. Now, suppose the estate had been still extant in forma specifica, what would have been the position or legal rights of Mrs Mackenzie? Must she not have rested content with the security of that estate, such as it was originally given to her? Could she have demanded any other or different security—whether it was more or less—simply because the annual returns of the estate were insufficient to meet her annuity? She might have used the diligence of the law to enforce her legal rights. But personal diligence could at best have recovered her nothing, beyond payment of each term's annuity as it fell due, while real diligence could never have enabled her to convert herself from a mere creditor over the estate into its absolute proprietor. Anything, in short, other than simple security over the estate, could in such a case have been reached only through the medium of some voluntary and mutual arrangement. It is precisely the same, in regard to the price of the estate, or any other surrogatum. In short, if Dundonnell's representatives, as debtors in the annuity, choose to purchase an annuity from any third party, such as an insurance office, and if Mrs Mackenzie choose to accept of the annuity so purchased as in lieu of her original security, that is one way of settling the matter; but it is a speculation of hazard, and neither party can be compulsorily driven into it. On the other hand, the very uncertainty of life attaches to the annuity itself, as it stands at present constituted, the character of an obligation of hazard and contingency; and though there are elements of calculation by which this hazard and contingency may on both sides be converted into certainty, by reducing the whole to a present value, yet this, as before, can be effected only as matter of mutual arrangement; and there must be giving and taking on both sides, otherwise the contract or arrangement would be purely leonine.

"When the Court, therefore, formerly pointed, in one of the alternatives of their judgment, at the conversion of the annuity into its present value, there was perhaps nothing objectionable, as regards the mere equity of the proposal; because, on the one hand, it assumed that Mrs Mackenzie was to accept a present sum LESS than the accumulated amount of her annuity, supposing her to live to the MAXIMUM TERM of human life, just as, on the other, it assumed that the annuity-debtor, was to pay a sum GREATER than the accumulated amount of annuity would eventually come to, supposing her to be PREMATURELY cut off at a term as far BELOW THE AVERAGE ENDURANCE of life. In short, a fair medium was intended to be struck between the parties, whereby both should share in the benefit and disadvantage of the transaction, and the whole loss or the whole gain not be exclusively attached to one of them only.

"But this is the very reverse of what Mrs Mackenzie is here claiming. For she insists that she must be made secure at all hazards, while she throws the whole burden of contingent and possible loss attaching to the proposed transaction upon the other party. Thus, she will not accept what the other party offers her—a fair conversion of her annuity at its present value—estimating that value according to the approved methods of calculation in such matters. She insists that her annuity be made effectual and secure to the very latest hour of her life,—and that, whether the purchase-money of such an annuity exceed the present value of her life interest or not, it must all be paid for by the other party out of the very first head of the estate. With submission, there is neither equity nor equality in such a transaction. For, inasmuch as the annuity-debtor is made to pay beyond the present value of the tables, just in so much is he made to pay more than the real worth of the annuity, looking to the contingencies which affect it.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot conceive that such a result as this was within the most remote contemplation of the Court, when they proposed, by their judgment now under consideration, that Mrs Mackenzie's 'annuity shall be valued, and the value thereof paid to her as the amount of her claim.' The value of an annuity, in this sense, is not the price at which an unquestionably assured annuity of corresponding amount can be purchased in the market. Least of all, is the value of an annuity defectively secured—as Mrs Mackenzie's here is said to be, looking merely to the estate of Dundonnell, or its price, as the means of payment,—to be so dealt with. The value of an annuity, in the sense of the judgment, is its estimated worth,—all contingencies considered,—when converted, according to the ordinary elements of calculation, into a present payment. But this is an operation of arithmetic, and not the arbitrary result of a mercantile transaction. It is neither more nor less in principle than what every day takes place in ranking a bill, the term of which has not yet arrived,—and where, therefore, there must be a certain discount allowed, in order to fix the present value. In other words, the annuity-creditor, who prefers present to future payment, may, equitably enough, perhaps be allowed to make the election. But if he seek equity, he must give it. He cannot secure for himself all the benefit of certainty implied in the present payment of a large sum, no part, or only a very small part of which is yet due,—and the greater part of which may, in the contingencies of life, never come to be due or exigible at all,—and on the other hand, repudiate the relative hazard, that what he thus presently receives may, on a different turn up of the same contingencies of life, fall ultimately short of what he might eventually have got, had the annuity been allowed to run on, in the natural and ordinary course, to its extreme term.

“In the present case, the difference between the arithmetical present value of the annuity, and the purchase money for which such an annuity could be purchased from an insurance office, is just the difference between £5945 and £7500—a most important consideration in a mere pecuniary point of view. Mrs Mackenzie, it is true, was at one time willing to have compromised the matter by accepting a medium sum of £6730 as the valuation of her annuity, thus becoming herself the purchaser. But even on this footing, the difference would have been more than it is thought she was in justice entitled to insist for. As the parties, however, did not come to any settlement upon these terms, and both now stand upon their legal rights, the difference really at issue between them in this discussion ranges, as at first, between £5945 and £7500. In other words, it comes to not less than £1550; an amount which, it is thought, will induce the Court to pause before they give effect to the argument which has so strenuously been maintained on the part of Mrs Mackenzie.

“Upon the whole, it humbly occurs to the Lord Ordinary, that Mrs Mackenzie will receive all that, upon any reasonable construction of the former judgment, she is entitled to, if she receive the converted value of her annuity as the same shall be calculated according to the received tables. Even in this way, should she die early, the representatives of Dundonnell will sustain a loss, which the law, strictly considered, could never have imposed upon them. But, on the other hand, this possible loss may perhaps, in a certain point of view, be held to be counterbalanced by the possible gain which would accrue in case of her life being prolonged beyond the usual term. And between the two, equity (as the court, it is presumed, intended,) may so far be substantially restored upon the whole matter.”

At advising,

Rutherford thought the case was decided substantially by the Court on 12th May 1838, and therefore he was not aware that it was necessary again to trouble the Court with any observations, further than to say that it appeared that Mrs Mackenzie was, on every principle, entitled now to make her election.

Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn.—Most certainly she is.

Rutherford.—Then, if that be the opinion of the Court, the matter is at an end.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Mrs Mackenzie consented to the sale, which it was not incumbent on her to do. But is she to be the worse for that? In my opinion that cannot be.

Lord Moncreiff wished to ask, if, after the sale, there were funds sufficient to pay the heritable creditors?

Rutherford.—I understand that, after the sale, there was enough to pay the heritable creditors, and also the annuity to Mrs Mackenzie; and it was only in consequence of her allowing the unsecured creditors to be paid out of the price of the estate, that the funds to answer the annuity are now deficient.

Lord Medwyn.—There is here no question between her and the heritable creditors—only between Mrs Ross and the legatees, who are, quoad her, gratuitous donees; and so far as the latter are concerned, they cannot, in my opinion compete with her. All that we can do here, and we are bound to do it, is to secure to Mrs Mackenzie whatever remains of the price for her benefit. She asks to get £6000 meantime invested for her annuity, and that ought to be done; for she has no one validly to compete with her.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think she is entitled to have the whole remaining sum invested. However, she asks less than that to be meantime invested, and I think that ought to be granted. I can see no one here who is entitled to compete with her. She has acted throughout in a most liberal and handsome manner.

Lord Moncreiff concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The Court

“Find that Mrs Mackenzie is entitled to have her annuity fully and effectually secured to her, so far as may be accomplished, by investment of the free balance of the trust-funds; and that for this the said free balance must be employed in purchasing or securing to her the said annuity, and in the meanwhile, authorise £6000 of the said funds to be uplifted and employed towards the said purpose; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to carry this interlocutor into effect, and to proceed otherwise with the cause as shall be just, reserving all questions of expenses.”

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—For Mrs Mackenzie, Rutherford, Penney; Roy and Wood, W.S., Agents.—Alt. H. J. Robertson; Hope and Oliphant, W.S., Agents.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

2d July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 243.—ALICE KILGOUR, Pursuer, v. ANDREW NICOL and (his Trustee) RICHARD HENDERSON, Defenders.

Process—Reduction—Review—Lis Pendens—An action of reduction dismissed as incompetent, in respect of being an attempt to review an Inferior Court process still depending, unexhausted, and unextracted.

About 1785, Robert Kilgour and Peter Nicol commenced business as wrights in Kirkaldy, under the firm of Kilgour and Nicol. They were brothers-in-law—Kilgour having married the sister of Nicol. In November 1798, Kilgour died, leaving a deed of settlement executed in that year. Soon after his decease, his eldest son and heir, David Kilgour, was assumed as a partner by Peter Nicol, and by them the business was carried on under the same firm of Kilgour and Nicol until June 1836, when Peter Nicol died. David Kilgour then conducted the business alone for nearly two years, and died in March 1838.

The affairs of neither of the two companies had been wound up. The family left by Peter Nicol consisted of two sons and five daughters. One of the former survived the father but a short time, which event left surviving—Andrew Nicol, the eldest son and heir, and the five daughters, who did not make up any title or incur any representation, and the interest in his estate devolved solely on Andrew Nicol. On the other hand, David Kilgour, who represented his father Robert, was himself represented by Peter Kilgour, wright in Kirkaldy, his only brother and heir-at-law. He also left five sisters,—one of them, the present pursuer, being unmarried, three married, and one a widow, besides the widower and daughter of a deceased sister.

After his father's death in 1836, Andrew Nicol made several attempts to get the affairs of the two companies wound up; and in October 1838, he presented a petition to the Sheriff of Fife, praying for a warrant of service on the whole representatives both of Robert Kilgour and David Kilgour, including the present pursuer and her sisters, and the widower and child of the deceased sister,—and upon Andrew Nicol's sisters, as next of kin of their deceased father, Peter Nicol; and for the appointment of a competent person or persons, with power to apply for, and obtain possession of, the books, accounts, and other papers belonging to, and connected with, the affairs of the said companies,—to collect the debts, and to pay the debts due by them, and thereafter to make up a state of the affairs; also praying the Sheriff to approve of the report to be obtained, divide the residue, if any, between the representatives of the respective parties, and to decern against either set of representatives for any balance found due to the other, &c.

VOL. XIV.—No. XXXVI.

The defenders alleged that this petition was duly served upon the present pursuer; and answers were given in for the whole representatives of Robert and David Kilgour by name, expressly including the present pursuer, in which they stated, that they most cordially agreed to the appointment suggested, for the purpose, and with the powers craved in the petition.

The persons mutually agreed on were thereupon appointed by the Sheriff, with the powers craved; and one of them having thereafter resigned, his place was supplied by the appointment of another. A variety of procedure took place; and the persons appointed by the Sheriff having made an interim report as to the accounting betwixt the partners of the companies inter se,—the import of which was, that the partners should be held to have drawn equal amounts from the concerns,—objections were, in September 1840, lodged for the representatives of the Kilgours, expressly including the present pursuer. Answers were lodged thereto for the present defender, and the objections were repelled in 1841; and an appointment was made on the reporters to proceed with the remit by collecting the outstanding debts. This order was renewed on 5th March 1842, and the process is of course still depending, unexhausted and unextracted.

The pursuer, who was one of the daughters of Robert Kilgour, and alleging that she possessed the character of executrix-dative of her brother David, brought this action, calling for reduction of the petition in the Inferior Court,—the letters of supplement for citing certain of the defenders,—the answers lodged for the defenders, herself included,—the interlocutor containing the first appointment of two persons as prayed for,—a minute for the present defender, craving a new appointment in room of the one who resigned, and the interlocutor pronounced thereon,—the interim report, dated 6th July 1840,—the interlocutors of 15th and 19th September 1840, 28th January and 9th March 1841, and “all other references, minutes of consent, reports, interlocutors of Court, or other writings arising out of the said pretended application or petition.”

The following were the reasons of reduction:—The first was the usual reason of style.

“Secundo, The foresaid petition to the Sheriff of Fife was altogether null and void. It was at the instance of a party who had no title to ask the investigation, or demand the inquiry which he craved. The said Andrew Nicol, the petitioner, succeeded to the heritage belonging to his father, whereas the right to the executry devolved upon his sisters, who only could call for investigation of the state of the copartnery affairs, or demand a count and reckoning; yet these sisters, as executors, so far from concurring in the application, were called by the said Andrew Nicol as defenders to the pretended petition. Tertio, The said petition was incompetent, and its incompetency appeared in the very face of it; for an allegation that a party's father had overdrawn his share in a company firm did confer no title to pursue a count and reckoning at the instance of one who was heir in the heritage, and not executor in the moveable succession. Quarto, The form of the proceedings was altogether out of shape, a summary application of this nature being inept and contrary to law,—a petition to force parties to a reference being quite unprecedented in the practice of Scottish Courts. Quinto, The reference was altogether irregular and improper—was never consented to by the pursuer, nor was she aware that it ever had been agreed to. She never gave any authority or mandate to any one to appear for her; and her name, if it appeared at all, has been irregularly introduced in the pleadings. Sexto, The pretended consent, said to be by William Mitchell, was no warrant, per se, for the interlocutor appointing the reference—no authority or mandate being produced by the pursuer, or by any of the other parties, so far as she understands; moreover, such a consent, if worth any thing, could not confer upon the parties named the ordinary powers of arbiters, but merely empower them to act as reporters, whose opinions could be controverted, and whose reports could be opened up in the usual manner. To have given the parties named the absolute powers of arbiters, there ought to have been a minute, regularly subscribed by all the parties concurring in the appointment, and binding themselves, respectively, to abide by whatever award might be pronounced.”

The defender, who was trustee on the sequestrated estate of Andrew Nicol, maintained, as a first preliminary objection—“That the present reduction is incompetent, as being an attempt to set aside or review the proceedings in an Inferior Court process still depending, unexhausted and unextracted, which cannot be done in the form of a reduction.”

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“1st June 1842.—Having heard parties' procurators, sustains the first preliminary defence, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report.”

The pursuer reclaimed; and, not denying the general rule, which prevented the review of an Inferior Court process while unexhausted, he pleaded, that the statements in the reasons of reduction effectually excepted the present case, to which the rule was inapplicable. The Court, however, did not call on the counsel for the defenders for any reply.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Your course is plain. If your statement in the summons is correct, you have only to appear in the Inferior Court process, and show that it is so.

Maidment.—We cannot appear.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—You certainly may; for if your statement be correct, that there was never any proper appearance for you, you surely are entitled to appear, and show that if there was any nominal appearance for you, it was without any mandate or proper authority. All the grounds that you have explained just now are just so many reasons for your appearing in the Inferior Court.

Lord Medwyn.—There is nothing plainer. And it will be easily seen whether appearance was properly made for you. There will either be or not a mandate, or, what is the same thing, the copy of the application which was served on your client.

Lord Moncreiff.—We must sustain the preliminary defence. You are not without a remedy, for your client can appear in the Inferior Court; and by allowing decree to go out against her, the remedy which she has is then plain. She may then advocate, reduce, &c.

Lord Medwyn.—It is just an attempt to obtain a review without finding caution in an advocacy.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court unanimously adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, inserting the reservation, but without prejudice to any steps the reclamer may think it advisable to take in the Inferior Court.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Maidment; Alex. Miller, Agent.—Alt. Monro; T. and R. Landale, Agents.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

2d July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 244.—JOHN SCOTT, Pursuer, v. JANE STEVENSON or RONALD, Defender.

Property, Declarator of—Title and Interest—Servitude—Road—Process—Circumstances in which held, that one of two proprietors of houses adjoining a close which was used as a common passage by both, was not entitled—having no per expressum right of property in the close—to substitute another passage, alleged to be equally convenient, for the existing one; and observed, that the other proprietor had a clear title to object to the substitution, even though he did not pretend a right of property in the close, but merely an interest to keep the passage open.

Special case of title and possession. Prior to 1797, Robert M'Nair or Robert M'Nair and Company were proprietors of a lot of ground and houses comprehended on, and between the Gallowgate of Glasgow and the recent line of street called London Street, on the north and south parts, and two parallel closes, called the West and East Sugarhouse Closes, on the west and east parts. The west close alone communicated directly with the Gallowgate—not the east close; but there was a narrow passage near the south boundary of the west close, which communicated between the two closes, and by means of the passage, the inhabitants in the east close had access to the Gallowgate by going along the west close. The M'Nairs sold the whole of their property in different lots, without retaining right to any portion of the subjects, so far as known. But the articles of roup under which they sold could not be found. In the titles of the purchasers of the east close, the M'Nairs conferred on them the right of egress and ingress through the west close and passage above alluded to, and the lots, both in the east and west close, were all described as bounded by the closes respectively. The pursuer came into possession of the whole houses on both sides of the west close, with the exception of a tenement north of the narrow connecting passage which belonged to the defender, and he was also proprietor of the houses on both sides of the narrow passage. The defender, on the other hand, was proprietor, besides, of a tenement in the east close, near the Gallowgate, and north of the connecting passage, which, in the pursuer's titles, was called the "Common Close." In the titles of all the lots in the two closes there was the following clause:—"With the privilege always of a passage of twelve feet wide, and which shall be kept open in all time coming, at the head of said close, for a passage for carriages from the said west close to the east."

The pursuer proposed to make certain erections, or new dwelling-houses, on his property, so far as it was south of the defender's lots in both closes, and of the connecting passage—the intention being to erect houses with a frontage to London Street. But in these operations it was necessary to interfere with the narrow communicating passage, and partly absorb it in the new buildings. But in order to keep up the access to the east close, he proposed to give the inhabitants in it access by a passage a little farther north than the existing one, and to make it considerably wider and more convenient. This was resisted by the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had no right of property in the solum of the passage or closes, and accordingly, that he had no title to interfere with any of them, and thereby to prejudice the right of access to the east close. Further, that the defender's title to object was sufficient, from her interest in keeping the passage open.

The pursuer's property was described as bounded by the closes and passage, and he was unable to show by his progress that he had any per expressum conveyance to the solum of the closes or passage. He however contended, that in a question with the defender, who pretended no right whatever to the solum of the west close and passage, his (the pursuer's) right of property in them must be inferred, in respect he possessed the property on both sides of the west close and also of the passage. If the defender had no property in the solum, then it was maintained, she had a mere servitude of way over the west close in favour of the east close, but that right of servitude did not give her a title to prevent the improvements in question, but merely an interest to see that the servitude, if altered in situation, should be so regulated as to be not less useful than previously. In the present situation, the defender had to pass along the whole of the west close to obtain access to her tenement in the east close, near the Gallowgate, while, in terms of his (the pursuer's) offer, the servitude of way would be rendered more available and beneficial, by shortening the distance from the Gallowgate to the east close, besides the benefit arising from the increase in the size of the proposed new communicating passage. It was also contended, that the proprietors of a dominant tenement had no legal interest to prevent the substitution of the one passage for the other, where he did not aver, and certainly could not qualify, damage by the change.

The question between the parties was tried by the present action, which the pursuer brought to have it found and declared, (1.) That he had right to the solum of the west close, south of the defender's tenement therein, and also to the solum of the connecting passage, burdened with the servitude of access in favour of the east close: (2.) That he was entitled to substitute for the present narrow connecting passage, another one farther to the north, which would be more convenient and beneficial to the dominant tenements than the present access; and (3.) That he should be found entitled thereafter to erect the proposed new buildings on the existing passage.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"8th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties in this declarator, and considered the process, Repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders liable in expenses, appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary is clear that the defenders have no interest to maintain their defences, for the object of a dominant in tormenting a servient, by obstructing measures which are very important to the latter, and not at all injurious to the former, forms no legal interest. The defender, Ronald, has plainly a mere servitude of passage, and this servitude seems to be rather improved than hurt by the change sued for. Accordingly she has not been able even to pretend any fair interest. She cannot get by the west close into London Street, and although she could, she would have no right to enlarge her servitude, which was only given for access to her premises in the east close, so to connect the west close into a thoroughfare to London Street.

"But the pursuer's conclusions, in so far as they proceed on the idea that he is now the proprietor of the west close, and of the passage, are by no means so clear. Because he has not only no express disposition to the close or passage, but on the contrary, is declared to be bounded by them, with only the privilege of a passage through them. And therefore, if the original owner were to appear and to claim the property of these, as never having been conveyed away by him, the pursuer would have no easy defence to maintain, though the Lord Ordinary does not mean to indicate that he thinks that this defence would be hopeless. But at present the pursuer has only to overcome a party who pretends no right of property in the close or passage himself; and who, as the mere holder of a servitude, has no fair ground for objecting to what the servient tenement desires. As against such an opponent it rather seems to the Lord Ordinary that the acquisition of the ground on both sides of the close and passage makes these fall into the property which thus contains them, under the burden only of existing servitudes.

"And whatever difficulty there may be in applying this principle to the first conclusion, which is grounded on the pursuer having acquired the property, this difficulty is very greatly diminished, if not altogether removed in reference to the second, which the Lord Ordinary thinks would be well founded even though the first could not be maintained. The question raised under this second conclusion is, whether the dominant can object to have the servitude regulated. Considering the position of the parties, and the total absence of all interest in the defender to object, the Lord Ordinary does not think that the regulation proposed can be obstructed."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am not able to concur with the Lord Ordinary. By the titles of the whole of the feuars in the east and west closes, the tenements are described as bounded by the west and east closes respectively, and passage, and part of the defender's property is described as bounded on the north by the passage; and this passage is called in the titles the "Common Close," i. e., for behoof of those in the east close; and there is a clause by the M'Nairs, saying that this passage was to be kept open in all time coming. Now, this clause is in the whole of the titles. Look now at the summons for the conclusions (reads them). This would, if granted, be to exclude the right of the east close over the passage. Now, I think the pursuer has entirely failed in showing that he has any right of property in the passage; and besides, his property is described as bounded by the passage. It was said he acquired right to all that the M'Nairs had that was sold in lots; and now he says, having got the whole property of the M'Nairs, he has right to the close and passage. As to that, I think his claim is, in the circumstances, untenable in point of law. M'Nair conveyed the property severally to the different feuars, describing their feus as bounded by the closes and passage. Probably he did not think of the solum, but meant it to be conveyed; but then the pursuer cannot show that he has a conveyance to it. No doubt, in a question with M'Nair's representatives, there may be sufficient ground for excluding any claim of theirs, where the feuars generally are called; but in a question between the pursuer and the defender, the point is far otherwise, where his tenement is described as bounded by the passage or closes. It was a common passage to those in the east close. But, besides, the defender has property in the west close, and how can the pursuer maintain that he is entitled to shut up the west close, which he proposes in that case? I think there is no foundation whatever for the pursuer's claim, and that the facts are not sufficient to show or raise a question of servitude. Even if it were a question of dominant and servient tenements, I cannot concur in the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary; for I think that, in the circumstances, the defender has a clear title and interest to object to the passage being shut up; and no matter whether the passage the pursuer now proposes for the defender is better or worse than the existing one.

Lord Medwyn.—I do entirely concur in what has now been stated, that I need not read over the opinion I had written out. On looking to the titles, it is impossible to sustain the summons. The close is described as the west close, and the other as the common passage between the east and west closes; and then the properties are described as bounded by them. I therefore cannot entertain the pleas of the pursuer, for they would exclude the defender from the common passage, even so far as she has property in the west close. The interest here of the defender is to me complete and legitimate, and sufficient to entitle her to resist the pursuer, where the latter is unable to instruct any right of property in the solum.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. The titles here of all parties are the same, mutatis mutandis, and all are described as bounded by the closes or passage; and that passage is designated in the pursuer's own titles as a common passage or close. There are no grounds, as it appears to me, to raise a question of servitude. The facts of the case do not warrant it; and therefore, I conceive it clear the pursuer has no right to interfere with the existing state of matters. He says, "I'll give you a passage as good as the one you have got." But we do not know any thing about that, and are not bound to consider the interest of the pursuer to make this offer till he first make out his right of property. The defender appears to me to have a perfectly fair and legitimate interest to object to the pursuer's proposal, and to object to the closing up of the present passage. Her interest is to see it kept open for herself and others; and that is enough. If the proposed passage be better than the existing one, that is out of the question till the pursuer show his right of property; and it is for the defender to judge what her own interest is. But here the question is one of title; and the pursuer has failed in establishing his right of property. I therefore concur with your Lordships that the interlocutor should be altered.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court

"Alter the interlocutor reclaimed against: Sustain the defences, and assolvie the defender from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to the expenses incurred by them; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Rutherford, T. Maitland, J. S. More; J. O. Mack, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Penney; J. and W. Jollie, W.S., Agents.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

5th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.R.)

No. 245.—DAVID CORMACK, Charger, v. MRS JEMIMA ERSKINE or HENDERSON, Suspender.

Diligence—Charge—Caution—Relief—Cash—Credit—A cash-credit bond was signed by three co-obligants, to be operated upon by two of them as a company. Under a previous arrangement, the first sums drawn under the bond were employed in paying a private debt due by one of the partners to his father, the third co-obligant.—In these circumstances, held that the third co-obligant, who had paid up the bond and obtained an assignment to it, was not entitled to give a charge upon it to the other partner.

Adolphus Meiklejohn Sceales, after carrying on the business of a wine-merchant, under the firm of "A. M. Sceales and Company," entered in 1836 into partnership with Edward Henderson, and continued the business under the firm of "Sceales, Henderson and Company." In the contract of copartnership it was arranged that the capital stock should be £2000, and that for that purpose, each of the said copartners should advance, or make available to the company, the sum of £1000. Henderson paid this sum in cash; but it was agreed, that "in lieu of the said A. M. Sceales's £1000, the whole stock of the said A. M. Sceales and Company, conform to inventory and valuation thereof, as at the said 1st day of March last, subscribed by the parties as relative hereto, and as much of the debts of the said A. M. Sceales and Company as are also therein contained, which, when collected, with interest from the said 1st day of March last" (the proposed day of commencement), "to the dates of such collection, will make up the said sum of £1000, as at the said 1st day of March last, the said valued stock and debts to the above extent, with interest as aforesaid, constitute the said A. M. Sceales's half of the stock of the said Sceales, Henderson and Company. But under the following conditions, viz.,—If, after collecting the foresaid debts, and applying them as aforesaid, there shall, when taken with said stock, be more than make up the said A. M. Sceales's share of the said stock, as at the said 1st day of March last, he shall be entitled to draw the excess or balance in his favour which shall be over and above the said sum of £1000. But if, on the other hand, there shall happen to be a deficiency for the above purposes, he shall be bound to make up the same to the said Sceales, Henderson and Company, with interest at the rate of four per cent., so as to make up the whole sum paid by him as at the said 1st day of March last (including the above valued stock), to amount to the said sum of £1000."

A. M. Sceales, while in business by himself, had a cash-account for £800 with the Royal Bank, and for which his father, Mr Andrew Sceales, was security. When the copartnership was formed, only £214 of the cash-account remained undrawn, and this sum was added to A. M. Sceales's stock, in order to make up his advance of £1000, and entered to his credit as "cash in Royal Bank." A new cash-account for £1000 having been obtained from the Royal Bank, to be kept in name of Sceales, Henderson and Company, and in which A. M. Sceales, Edward Henderson, and Andrew Sceales were the co-obligants, the former cash-account for £800 was paid up,—the first money drawn under the new account being a sum of £603. 9. 3., appropriated to this purpose. Shortly after, another sum of £190 was drawn to pay a private debt due by A. M. Sceales to his father. The copartnership having proved unsuccessful, was dissolved in 1839. At this time the whole amount of the cash-account was drawn, and with reference to it, Henderson addressed his partner, A. M. Sceales, stating—

"I have not the slightest wish to press an immediate settlement with the bank; but at the same time, I trust no unnecessary delay will take place;—however, I think, in the mean time, you ought to procure for me a letter from your father, stating, that although the cash-credit account at the Royal Bank bears to be for behoof of Sceales, Henderson and Company, yet, at the same time, it is a debt for which you and your father are alone responsible. As I wish this affair to be settled without further delay, I trust you will either write or mention my proposal to your father, so that the matter may be arranged this week."

A. M. Sceales accordingly wrote his father:

"I am grieved to say that, in consequence of a train of misfortunes, I am compelled to ask the favour of you to pay up my cash-account to the Royal Bank. It is impossible for me to express the pain and vexation this has given me, as no man can be more sensible than I am of the extreme liberality and kindness with which you have treated me all along."

Mr Henderson having afterwards applied to Mr Andrew Sceales on the subject, received the following answer:

"In reply to your favour of the 13th instant, I expect you will pay up your cash-account with the Royal Bank, as a standing house, and at your earliest convenience."

Mr Henderson again wrote as follows:

"I have yours of the 14th; but what I wish to know, and what my letter of 5th to Adolphus was written to ascertain is, whether you, as arranged at the time, are to relieve me of the sums due by the bank bond? The first sums paid out of it were to yourself, or to relieve your former obligation, to the extent of upwards of £790."

The following answer was sent by Mr A. Sceales to his son:

"SIR,—As I wrote your partner on the 14th current—'I expect you will pay up your cash-account with the Royal Bank, as a standing house, and at your earliest convenience;' and I have only to add, that no earthly consideration will induce me to pay one penny of it, unless under sequestration,—then I will know how to conduct myself."

Payment having been demanded by the bank, the sum due under the cash-credit was paid by Mr Andrew Sceales, on an assignation to the bond to Mr Cormack, who, holding it in trust for Mr Sceales, gave a charge upon it to Mr Henderson as one of the individual partners of the firm of "Sceales, Henderson and Company." Mr Henderson suspended, but having died during the dependence, appearance was made for his widow as his executrix-dative, who pleaded—1. The charge is disconform to the obligation, in virtue of which it is professedly given. 2. The present charge being given by the private agent of Mr Andrew Sceales, and the title of the charger being an assignation in trust for him, the charger must stand in the situation of the party for whom he so holds in trust, and is liable to all the exceptions and defences which would have been pleadable against Mr Sceales himself, especially seeing that he acquired the right after intimation of the suspender's objection. 3. Mr Sceales, senior, being a joint and several obligant without relief, ex facie of the bond, payment made by him to the creditors in it, operated an extinction of that obligation, which cannot now be used to compel implement of his right of relief, whatever that may be, against his co-obligants, and such relief can be competently constituted and enforced only by means of an ordinary action. 4. Were it competent at all for one of the co-obligants making payment to charge the others on the bond, the charge could only be given for the share for which each was, ex facie of the bond, liable to him in relief, and the present charge for the whole amount of the bond is, on this footing, incompetent. 5. The cash-credit bond having been truly subscribed by Mr Andrew Sceales, not as cautioner for, or for behoof of, the company, or the suspender, but for behoof of his son, and in virtue of an arrangement for supplying him with funds, neither Mr Sceales, nor any party in his name and for his behoof, can warrantably charge the suspender on account of drafts upon that bond. The allegation cannot be disregarded as contrary to the terms of the bond, which, so far from making Mr Sceales a mere cautioner for the company, makes him a co-obligant without any clause of relief. 6. In any view, neither Mr Sceales nor any party in his right, can recover from the suspender the amount of the sums drawn from the cash-credit and applied with his knowledge, but without the privity of the suspender, in extinction of his private obligations, with which neither the copartnership nor the suspender had any thing to do, and the onus of proving that the sums were so applied by the authority of the company and Mr Henderson, lies on the charger.

Mr Cormack—whose statements of fact (V. and VI.) are as follows: "At the time this bond was granted, it was expressly arranged that a bond for £800, previously granted in favour of Mr Adolphus Sceales, and in which Mr Andrew Sceales was cautioner for his son, should be discharged." "Accordingly, at the time Mr Sceales signed the new bond for £1000 at the Royal Bank, the previous bond for £800 was delivered up to him to be cancelled. This was done in presence of Mr Sym Wilson, secretary of the bank. No objection was stated by any of the parties to this arrangement; and unless this had been done, Mr Andrew Sceales would not have set his name to the new and extended bond of credit,"—pleaded, 1. The charge upon the bond and assignment, and relative account, which form a liquid ground of debt, cannot be suspended on any of the extrinsic and irrelevant averments set forth in this suspension. 2. The allegations as to Mr Sceales not having signed the bond for behoof of the company, and as to the draft having been passed upon any understanding to which the suspender was not a party, being contradicted by the terms of the bond of caution itself, and by the manner in which it was alone competent to operate on that bond, these allegations can form no ground for suspension. 3. The allegations in this suspension being entirely unfounded and irrelevant, there is no ground for staying the regular course of diligence. Lastly, Even if there had been a relevant ground of suspension, it is incompetent under the bond to offer any such suspension, without consignation.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"12th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, Repels the reasons of suspension: Finds the letters orderly proceeded, and decerns: Finds the suspender liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor of Court to tax the same and report.

"Note.—Quoad the other obligants on the bond to the bank, the charger's cedent, Mr Andrew Sceales, was plainly a mere cautioner, and his privileges as such were not destroyed, because the money drawn upon that bond by the real obligants happened to be employed by them in paying a debt due upon another account to him. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, conceives that the objections taken to the charge, both in its competency and its merits, are groundless."

The suspender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—My opinion on the merits is clear. On looking at the nature of the transaction, I am convinced that Mr Sceales, senior, who is the real charger (Mr Cormack being only his trustee), has no case on this bond. Ex facie he is not a mere cautioner. It is true that he was not the party to operate on the cash-account; but then the fact is not disputed, that the first operation on it was made for the purpose of paying off the balance of the old account, and it is expressly said that this payment was stipulated for by Sceales, senior, as a condition, without which he would not have given his name to the new account. Then he receives another payment of £190, but both that and the first payment were for debts with which the company of Sceales, Henderson and Company, had nothing to do. But the matter does not rest here. A correspondence takes place, which goes far to prove that there has been a full understanding from the very first, that the company were not to be liable for the new account. Henderson writes requesting Sceales, junior, to get a letter from his father, explaining that the cash-account was not to be paid by the company; and Sceales, junior, accordingly writes his father, begging him to pay up—what? Not the company's, but "my cash-account." This correspondence speaks volumes, and makes it perfectly clear to my mind, that the understanding was as Henderson has represented it. On the whole, I don't think that this charge is justly given. It is merely an attempt by the father to get quit of an obligation which he had undertaken for his son.

Lord Gillies.—I concur entirely, and need not make many additional observations. The bond is no doubt a good ground of summary diligence, but under qualification. If three parties sign a bond containing a declaration that it is for the behoof of two of them only, the third, on paying it, has a good ground of diligence against them. But in this case two things must concur: 1st, The sums drawn must be actually drawn by the two; and, 2d, they must be drawn for their behoof, and not for the behoof of the third party. That was not the case here. The money, though drawn in name of the company, was applied for the benefit of Sceales, senior. I do not, however, go so much on this as on the merits. Taking the statement of the charger, and the confirmation given by the letters, I cannot help thinking that an attempt is here made to take advantage of Henderson. When Sceales, senior, agreed to sign the new account, he stipulated that the debt under the former one should be discharged. This is his own statement. He says he need not have agreed. True, but then he must have remained bound for the old money. His object in signing was not to support the company, but to be relieved of an obligation which he had undertaken for his son. He says Henderson consented to take his signature on these terms. On what terms? Not surely on the terms of relieving Mr Sceales, senior, of his son's debt. He never could have agreed to such terms. It is plain he did not.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. As to the formal objection to the charge, founded on the nature of the obligation contained in the bond, I have considerable doubts. The money was to be drawn out by the company; and supposing that it had been so drawn and paid to the company, and that the third obligant, after paying it up and obtaining a total assignment, had given a charge upon it for the purpose of operating his relief, I don't see any thing on the face of the bond which would have made the charge incompetent. But the case does not rest there. If competent to the third obligant to give a charge, on the ground that he had paid the money and was only a cautioner—it was equally competent for the other parties to show that he was not a cautioner in the sense represented; that the bond was for the behoof not merely of the company, but also of the co-obligant, or that, if formally for the behoof of the company, still the sums drawn under it were paid to the co-obligant. The last of these things has been made out here. Either the money in dispute, though drawn in name of the company, was actually drawn for the behoof of the father and the son, or was unduly, without proper authority, paid to the father;—in short, was improperly appropriated by one of the partners for the cautioner's behoof. Either supposition is sufficient to repel the charge, which, in so far as these payments are concerned, cannot be sustained.

Lord Fullerton.—The only question is, whether the charge can be sustained in the circumstances. I think it cannot. It is not necessary to decide as to the competency or incompetency of one co-obligant, who has paid, doing summary diligence on the obligation against his co-obligants. In point of principle, it might be thought that when the debt is paid, the obligation is extinguished, and consequently, that the only mode in which the party who has paid could proceed, would be by an action of relief. In practice, however, the co-obligant is permitted to do diligence, and I am not sure that in bonds like the present, where, ex facie, the money was to be drawn for behoof of two of the co-obligants, the third, considered as a cautioner holding an assignment to the bond, might not be entitled to do diligence upon it. It is impossible, however, to call Mr Sceales, senior, merely a cautioner. His own statement proves that he was not. In consequence of signing the new bond, he was relieved to the extent of his obligation under the old one. He was thus not merely a cautioner but a co-obligant, who had a great personal interest; and it is impossible to sustain a charge given by him for sums, the greater part of which were actually paid to himself. What he may be able to make of an ordinary action, I don't know, but the present diligence cannot proceed.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor: "Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and suspend the letters simpliciter, and decern: Find the charger, liable in expenses to the suspender, and remit to the auditor," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For Charger, Dean of Faculty (Wood), Robertson; Gibson-Craigs, Dalziel and Brodie, W.S.

Agents.—For Suspender, Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Pyper, Logan; Henry Tod, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

5th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 246.—JANET GARDNER, &c., Pursuers, v. JAMES ALEXANDER HALDANE, Defender.

Personal Exception—Acquiescence—Reduction.

Special case. The pursuers—who were interested in the succession of a brother, the late Captain Gardner, in reference to which a process of multiplepointing, wherein the pursuers were parties, had been brought into Court, in which the executors had been previously exonerated to the extent of funds intromitted by them—brought this action of reduction, &c., to reduce and set aside certain orders, interlocutors, and procedure had therein, generally on the ground that they were irregular, and without authority, and that they had been obtained in absence of the pursuers. The Lord Ordinary found that the pursuers were barred by their appearance in the multiplepointing, in which they drew certain portions of the fund in medio, from now objecting; and at all events, that as they were entitled to obtain such redress as they now claimed in the multiplepointing, sustained the defences and assolizied. The pursuers reclaimed, but the Court, without hearing counsel for the defender, adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. J. S. More, Patterson; James Adam, W. S., Agent.—Alt. Whigham; Robert Haldane, W. S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

6th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 247.—MARY ANN M'FARQUHAR or BURROWES, Pursuer, v. MARY CORNWALL and OTHERS, Defenders.

Husband and Wife—Fee and Liferent—Provision—A husband having purchased certain heritable subjects exclusively with his own funds, took the conveyance to and in favour of himself and spouse "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor, and their heirs, assignees, or disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably"—Held, after the death of the husband, that the widow, as survivor, was the unlimited fief of the property thereby conveyed.

The late John M'Farquhar, the husband of the pursuer, purchased, in June 1838, certain heritable subjects near Greenock, under articles of roup, from the bankrupt estate of Maitland Young, merchant there. After narrating receipt of the price, the disposition executed by the bankrupt and trustee proceeded:

"Therefore I, the said Maitland Young, as principal, and I, the said James Turner, as trustees foresaid, have sold, alienated and disposed, as we do hereby for our several rights and interests, and with consent of Alexander Thomson, manager and partner of the Greenock Bank Company, Thomas Hart, draper, and John Fyffe, ironmonger, both in Greenock, commissioners on the said sequestrated estate, or at least a quorum of their number; and also with consent of the said Henry Tower Paten, sell, alienate, dispose, assign, convey and make over from us and our heirs or successors respectively, to and in favour of the said John M'Farquhar and Mrs Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar, his spouse, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor and their heirs, assignees or disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, all and whole," &c. [here follows the description of the subjects];—"together with the whole houses and others erected thereon, and all right, title and interest which I, the said Maitland Young, as principal, or I, the said James Turner, as trustee foresaid, our predecessors and authors, or heirs and successors had, have, may, or anyways might have claim, or pretend thereto in all time coming. In which subjects and others, with the teinds above disposed, we, the said Maitland Young and James Turner, with consent foresaid, bind and oblige us and our foresaids to infest and seise the said John M'Farquhar and Mrs Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar in conjunct fee and liferent, and the survivor and their foresaids, upon their own proper charges and expenses, and that by two several infestments and manners of holding."

Infestment followed on this deed, and bore that heritable state and sasine were given and granted "to the said John M'Farquhar and Mrs Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor, of all and whole" the subjects in dispute.

Previous to the date of this deed (in 1836), M'Farquhar, when resident in Demerara, had executed a settlement, by which he bequeathed to his widow "£300 Sterling a-year for her use and the use of her children," while she remained single; and in the event of her demise before her mother, the annuity of £300 was bequeathed to the mother, "for her use, and the use of my children;" and it was also declared, that in the event of his wife (the pursuer's) demise the mother should "come in as executrix and guardian over my children, in the place of her daughter, Mrs Mary Ann M'Farquhar," the pursuer.

After effecting the purchase of the Greenock subjects, M'Farquhar executed a trust-disposition and deed of settlement in the Scots form in favour of the defender, of the pursuer, and certain others, by which he conveyed to them his whole real and personal property, whatsoever and wheresoever, to be held by them for payment of his debts, &c.; and, inter alia, they were directed "to make payment to the said Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar, my spouse, for the use of herself and the children of our marriage, and failing her by death, either before or after me, to the said Mrs Mary Cornwall, my mother-in-law, for the like purpose of a free annuity of £500 Sterling during all the days and years of her life, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first payment thereof at the first of these terms which shall happen after my death, and so forth during the life of the said Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar."

This proviso was immediately followed up by the declaration,—

"And I do hereby declare that the provisions hereby given to the said Mary Ann Cornwall or M'Farquhar, with the right acquired by her in my foresaid dwelling-house, agreeably to the disposition thereof in our favour, shall be accepted of by her in full satisfaction to her of all terce of lands, third or half of moveables, and every other claim competent to her by and through my decease in any manner of way, excepting only her claims for mournings and aliment to the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my decease,—both of which are hereby reserved to her."

The deed also conferred on the pursuer, and her mother in succession, a liferent of the household furniture and plenishing of every description, and the residue stood destined, under burden of the foresaid annuity of £500, to the pursuer,

"in case she shall be alive at the time; whom failing, as aforesaid, to and in favour of John M'Farquhar, Colin M'Farquhar, William M'Farquhar, and Isabella M'Farquhar, my children, born of my said marriage, and any other lawful child or children that may hereafter be born to me who shall be alive, when the youngest of them or of the survivors of them shall attain the age of twenty-one years complete, and that equally between or among them or the survivors of them, share and share alike, if more than one, and if there shall be but one, the whole to be paid, assigned and disposed to one such child exclusively so attaining said age; and I do hereby declare, that in case any one or more of my said children shall die before the said residue shall become payable and transferable as aforesaid, leaving lawful issue, then such issue shall be entitled to the share or respective shares which his, her, or their parent or parents would have been entitled to if alive."

By a codicil, an additional annuity of £500 was conferred on the pursuer, besides a slump sum of £500.

The defenders, as M'Farquhar's trustees, having on his death claimed the right to the subjects contained in the disposition executed by Young and his trustee, proceeded to adjudge, when the pursuer brought this action to have it declared, "that in virtue of the foresaid disposition, executed by the said Maitland Young and others, and the infestment following thereon, and otherwise as libelled, and in consequence of the death of the said John M'Farquhar," she had "an unlimited fee in, and otherwise a good and undoubted right and valid title to the subjects embraced in the said writs, with the whole writs and evidents, vouchers and instructions thereof: And the said defenders and all others ought and should be interdicted, prohibited and discharged from troubling and molesting the pursuer in such right, and from following out the foresaid proceedings, or adopting others by which the said subjects may be adjudged or evicted from the pursuer, or her right thereto destroyed or injured in any manner of way whatever."

The defenders stated, that the property was purchased by Mr M'Farquhar himself, with his own funds exclusively. His wife was not a party to the transaction at all; and no equivalent, in any shape, or to any extent, was ever given by her, either in form or substance, for the right conferred on her by the disposition. She never had any funds of her own, and so could not, directly or indirectly, aid in the purchase. Neither did she ever, in consideration of the right conferred on her, renounce, wholly or partially, any of her interests as the spouse of Mr M'Farquhar. Again, it must be recollected that the pursuer had been previously provided for by her husband's West India settlement, and the provisions thereby constituted in her favour were increased by the subsequent trust-disposition and settlement; which, in its terms and whole tenor and clauses, clearly demonstrates that Mr M'Farquhar, at least, had never intended to confer on his spouse any thing more than a lifereit of Bellevue, and did not suppose that any thing else had been done. But, were the conclusions of the present action sustained, Mr M'Farquhar's sons and daughter, for whom he was so careful and anxious to provide, would be left almost, if not entirely, destitute and dependent on the bounty of their mother, who has now attached herself to a second husband;—and they pleaded, that, according to the sound construction of the disposition, and the true meaning and intention of the parties connected with it, the pursuer's right to the property in question is not a right of absolute or unlimited fee, but only a lifereit; and she has no right, title, or interest to maintain the conclusions of the present action.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the record, as closed upon summons and defences, and having thereafter considered the deeds libelled on and whole process, finds that, according to the legal construction of the dispositive clause in the disposition libelled on, the pursuer, as the survivor of the spouses, is now the unlimited fiar of the property thereby conveyed: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the libel: Finds no expenses due to either party.

"Note.—The present case is distinguished from the late case of Madden and Currie by that difference in the destination, which is held to import a transmission of the entire fee to the surviving wife, which was not maintainable in Madden's case. In that instance, the disposition was taken to the spouses 'in conjunct fee, and to the heirs of the marriage of the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Madden, whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs, heritably and irredeemably.'

"Here the disposition is in favour of the spouses 'in conjunct fee and lifereit, and to the survivor, and their heirs (not of the marriage), assignees or disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably.'

"When the destination is in the preceding terms, without any substitution of the heirs of a subsisting marriage, the Lord Ordinary holds himself bound, by a series of authorities which he cannot now question, to construe the right as vesting a fee in the survivor. See Erskine, B. III., t. 8, § 36, and Mr Bell's Commentaries, Vol. I. p. 56, and the authorities therein referred to.

"The defenders allege that the cases quoted, related to the construction of bonds, and not to conveyances of land; but the Lord Ordinary is not aware that any distinction can be taken between the cases. It is quite clear that our institutional writers view the legal interpretation given to this destination in the reported cases, as regulating it in all rights in which it is adopted by the parties.

"Further, the legal interpretation due to this destination was fully considered, and the fee found to belong to the surviving wife, in a case where the words were less favourable to support the claim of fee than those which are used in the present case. The case referred to is that of M'Gregor against Forrester (Shaw's Rep., 3d June 1841), which was raised on a disposition granted by a husband 'to himself and his promised spouse in conjunct lifereit, during all the days of their lifetime, and to the longest liver of them, and their heirs and assignees in fee.' In that case the fee was adjudged to the surviving wife, both in this Court and in the House of Lords. The question was considered in this Court as clear and settled; but Lord Brougham entered fully into its merits in the House of Lords, and adverted to all the authorities. (See 1 Shaw and M'Lean's Appeal Cases, p. 441.) But as the previous conveyance there was in conjunct lifereit only, while the disposition here is both in lifereit and fee, it follows, a fortiori, that the destination in the present instance ought to carry the fee to the wife.

"It was remarked that the question in Forrester's case occurred on a provision in an antenuptial contract of marriage, while the claim here is founded on a conveyance by the husband to the wife long after the marriage. But if a party conveys any property or right under a substitution of definite technical import in law and practice, it must receive effect, whatever may be the form or occasion of the deed in which it is inserted.

"The defenders made reference to a trust-deed executed by the pursuer's husband subsequent to the disposition of the house, to show that the granter must have understood that he only gave his wife a lifereit of the house, as he only gives her and her mother a lifereit of the furniture; from which it is inferred that he never would have restricted her to a lifereit as to the moveable property, if he had believed her to have a right of fee in the house which contained it. But this is an inference too remote and uncertain to shake the fixed technical construction of a formal feudal conveyance previously executed by the husband; more especially as, in that very trust-disposition, he confirmed the right to the house which he had before given to the pursuer. Besides, it cannot be inferred, even from his settlement, that he meant to place the house and furniture exactly on the same footing, as he gave a reversionary right to his mother-in-law, Mrs Cornwall, to use the furniture in case of his wife's predecease, while he did not give to the old lady any interest in any event in the house.

"As this is a question brought to establish the pursuer's title, and has been most reasonably conducted on the part of the defenders, the Lord Ordinary has given no expenses to either party."

Both parties reclaimed—the pursuer as to expenses, the defenders generally. At advising,

Marshall, for defenders, admitted, that if the destination in question had occurred in a marriage-contract, the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was correct, but argued, that as the disposition was a gratuitous one by the husband in favour of the wife, from whom the subjects did not flow, and, indeed, nothing came by her, it was different,—that the expression "liferent" must receive some meaning that it meant a mere liferent to her,—and that it was not competent to throw that expression out of view altogether, as the Lord Ordinary had done. No cases were to be found of a similar kind; and accordingly, it was necessary to look at the intention of the granter, which, it was argued, was to confer nothing but a liferent.

The Court advised the case without hearing the pursuer's counsel.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The use of the word liferent appears to me to strengthen the case for the pursuer. The destination meant that the liferent was not to be altered during the lives of any of the parties, but that when the death of any of them occurred, the survivor was to have the fee. I cannot think now of disturbing the distinct law and understanding of such cases by looking at intention.

Lord Medwyn.—There can be no doubt what the intention of M'Farquhar was, and that he meant a liferent; but he ought so to have expressed it correctly in legal phraseology; and the deed does not carry it into effect. I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion; but I really do not see what M'Farquhar's intention is, and do not know what it was; and I cannot help thinking that his intention is just what the law says is the legal meaning of the conveyance, and nothing else. He may have been indiscreet in giving too much to this party, and forgotten others; but still the question is, what did he mean by this deed? And after the expressions of Mr Erskine, and the case of Forrester and others, I cannot doubt but that meaning is correctly found by the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am clearly of opinion the interlocutor is right from the decisions. The destination is in favour of the spouses "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor and their heirs." The expression "conjunct fee and liferent" is a very anomalous one, and one which has never yet been cleared up. It seems to have been to prevent the liferent being defeated in the lifetime of parties; but here, on the death of one of them, it must, on the cases, be taken as operating a fee to the survivor; and there is nothing, besides, in the deed to show that, on survivance, the right of the wife was limited to a liferent. I agree with the note of the Lord Ordinary and interlocutor, and am very clear that we cannot now disturb the decisions.

Neaves moved that the pursuer should be found entitled to expenses. She had been compelled to bring the action to defend her right to the subjects, which the defenders were proceeding to adjudge.

Lord Moncreiff.—I do not think she is entitled to expenses. It was a fair case for the defenders to try.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Neaves; J. Stuart, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Marshall, Macfarlane; J. Patten, W.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

7th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 248.—DAVID FYFFE and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. JOHN HUTCHINSON FERGUSON, Defender.

Testament—Process—Title—Foreign—A Scotsman who died domiciled in India, bequeathed "to D. F. and his family," by a will executed there, a sum lodged in the hands of his bankers at Calcutta. The executors under the will having died or declined to act, the children of D. F., under a decree-dative from the Commissary of Edinburgh as executors qua legatees, brought an action in the Court of Session for payment of the legacy, against one of the partners of the bank who was residing in Scotland, and obtained decree, subject to the condition of "producing a sufficient title in their persons before extract"—Held that that title must be a confirmation of the decree-dative which they had previously obtained.

Dr Charles Fyffe, who was domiciled at Calcutta, died there in 1810, leaving a will, in which he appointed Messrs Fergusson, Fairlie and Company his executors, and bequeathed whatever might be realised from the sale of his effects, and from the debts due to him in India, "to David Fyffe, Esq. of Drumgeith, and his family." A considerable sum was due to Dr Fyffe at the time of his death by the house of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, and decree has been pronounced against the defender, John Hutchinson Fergusson, who had been a partner of that company, finding him liable to David Fyffe and Mrs Elizabeth Kerr or Fyffe, surviving children and representatives of David Fyffe of Drumgeith, and as such having right to the sum bequeathed by Dr Fyffe. An objection to the pursuers' title had not been disposed of; and accordingly, when the interlocutor containing the above decree was pronounced, the following reservation was inserted in it: "The pursuers always producing a sufficient title in their persons before extract."

The defender is possessed of an heritable estate in Scotland, and, several years before the action was raised, had finally left Calcutta and returned to this country.

The firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company had also been dissolved, and the executors appointed by Dr Fyffe's will had either died or declined to act. The pursuers accordingly set forth this last fact in their summons, and also, that as the only surviving members of David Fyffe's family, they were "entitled in their own right, and as representing their said deceased father, to payment" of the sum due by Fairlie, Fergusson and Company to Dr Fyffe. The pursuers afterwards, in the course of preparing the record, produced a decree-dative by the Commissary of Edinburgh, decerning them executors qua legatees to Dr Fyffe. The question to be determined now was, what was "the sufficient title in their persons" which the pursuers were bound to produce?—the defender contending that it could only be a confirmation by the Commissary of Edinburgh of the decree-dative, which in fact constituted their only title to pursue,—and the pursuers, again, contending that, instead of taking out a confirmation, which would of course make them liable for the legacy duty, it would be sufficient for them to prove the will in India, where, at the time of the testator's death, both he and his debtor resided.

The Lord Ordinary ordered minutes of debate, and made avizandum to the Lords of the First Division. At advising, Lord President.—It appears to me that this defender is entitled to demand that the pursuers shall confirm before extract. The shape of the proceedings leads to this conclusion. If the pursuers had raised the action in another character, the case might have been different. But they have pursued as executors qua legatees. That is a solution of the difficulty. The defender is entitled to insist that they shall complete their title by a confirmation. It is said that, because the deceased died in India, the defender is to be satisfied with some proceeding there which is not explained. But what has he to do with these proceedings? He must pay in safety; and that can only be by the pursuers obtaining their title completed by the well-known form of confirmation. Reference has been made by the pursuers to some English cases; but I do not think that they at all apply. They seem to have related to the question whether duty was payable or not? But with that we have no concern here. The present is entirely a question of title. I dare say the defender would be well enough pleased that the pursuers should not be obliged to pay duty; but he has a right to insist that they have a good title.

Lord Gillies concurred.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am much of the same opinion, though the matter is not very clear. One thing, however, is clear, that the defender must have a certain title made up in the party to whom he is to pay. Is such a title now offered? If confirmation in Scotland were offered, I should have no difficulty, because the defender himself consents to take that. But the question is, whether what is now offered is sufficient?—What is offered? It would be difficult to answer that. Some not very specific authority to be obtained in India; and it is said that the English decisions show this to be sufficient. But I am not sure of that. It is clear to me, under those decisions, that if a party die in India leaving debtors there liable to him, and if authority be obtained by his executors from the proper authority in India to uplift the funds, but these debtors subsequently leave India, then they may be sued in England without the necessity of obtaining administration or probate over again. That seems the result of the English decisions; and I own I see no reason why the same rule should not prevail in Scotland. But the present case is different. Although the testator died in India, and although he had debtors liable to him there, no authority was obtained in India to levy the debts. In the mean time the debtor has left India and come to Scotland. Now, I do not think that the cases quoted show it to be clear that, in such a situation of matters, either an authority can be obtained in India to recover the debts; or that, though obtained, the authority would be good in England. If, under that law, it were quite clear that the authority to be obtained in India would be good in England, I might be inclined to think that it afforded strong authority for adopting the same rule in Scotland, seeing no grounds for a different practice in the two countries. But I am not satisfied there is such practice in England, and a fortiori think we cannot hold it as a clear and safe point in the law of Scotland.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Find that the pursuers, before extract, must produce, as a title to the debt decerned for, a confirmation in their favour by the Commissary of Edinburgh, as executors qua legatees to the deceased Dr Fyfe: Find the defender entitled to the expense of this part of the discussion, and remit the account,” &c.

Lord Ordinary, Murray.—Act. H. Robertson; Pearson and Robertson, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Marshall; Hunter, Campbell and Co., Agents.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

7th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 249.—ROBERT AULD, Pursuer, v. ARCHIBALD AIKMAN and OTHERS, (Aikman's Trustees), Defendants.

Prescription, Triennial—Circumstances in which the triennial prescription held not to apply.

Robert Auld, writer in Edinburgh, brought an action against Archibald Aikman and others, trustees of his father-in-law, the late James Aikman, who died in January 1837, concluding for payment of the following accounts, or their taxed amount,—1st, £13. 15. 7., a business account from 31st December 1832–15th January 1834; 2d, £54. 15. 3., a business account from 6th August 1832–4th July 1836; 3d, £86. 16. 4½., a business account from 19th December 1833–24th November 1835.

The defenders admitted that the accounts had not been paid by them, but denied resting-owing, and pleaded inter alia, that the accounts were prescribed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“19th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process—Sustains the plea of prescription, but allows the pursuer to prove the debt by the writ or oath of the defenders.

“Note.—After the three years are out, the burden of proving the debt by the writ or oath of the debtor is laid by the express words of the Act on the pursuer. The proof of the debt necessarily implies the proof both of its constitution and of its subsistence. But where judicial admissions are made that are decisive, it has been held that the oath, being in such a case, where perjury is not permitted, a mere ceremony, may be dispensed with as superfluous.

“The three years were not out here when the original alleged debtor died, so there is no presumption of payment by him, and there is a mutual admission in the defences that payment has not been made by the defenders. So far the case is clear.

“But there is nothing that the Lord Ordinary can recognise as an admission by them of the constitution. All that they say of it is, that they have no personal knowledge of it. Now suppose that they had sworn this. An original party's professing ignorance may be often unavailing, because it may be incredible. But representatives stand in a quite different situation; and the point is, whether their swearing that they know nothing about the constitution is, in law, a sufficient admission of the constitution to entitle a pursuer to say that he has proved this part of the case by the oath of his adversary?

“The pursuer refers to a great many cases, in which he says that admissions or depositions the same in substance as what occur have been held sufficient by the Court. The Lord Ordinary, after a careful examination of the reports, cannot concede that this is the fact. They were all necessarily circumstantial cases. And the pursuer, before he can prevail here, must distinctly face and maintain the general proposition that a credible declaration of ignorance of the constitution is, under the Statute, proof of the constitution by the debtor's oath, even where the debtor is but a representative.

“If it be, the law is in an odd state. An heir is an infant when his father dies. Thirty years afterwards an action is brought against him for payment of a debt said to be due by his ancestor, and reference is made to his oath. He swears, truly, that if the debt ever existed, it still subsists, because he never paid it; but that its ever having existed he knows nothing about. According to the pursuer, this ignorance not being a denial of the debt, proves its original constitution; and in this way any pursuer may establish any debt which he is pleased to claim, provided he selects for his defender a necessarily ignorant representative. Or he has only to rear up a claim so entirely fictitious that an heir cannot possibly have paid it, or have even heard of it; and the combination of the two facts, viz., of non-payment and of ignorance, establish the pursuer's case under the statutory reference.

“The Lord Ordinary can discover no authority for such a principle.”

The pursuer reclaimed, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Recal the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find that, in the circumstances of the case, the plea of prescription pleaded does not apply; quoad ultra, remit the cause back to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as to him shall seem just; farther, find neither party is entitled to expenses up to this date."

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Crawford; John Cullen, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Inglis; A. and C. Douglas, W.S., Agents.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

8th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 250.—ALEXANDER and WILLIAM GOLDIE, (Mrs Hoggan or Smith's Trustees), Pursuers, v. Miss JEAN GOLDIE and OTHERS, (Representatives of Messrs Goldie and Threshie), Defendants.

Agent and Client—Responsibility—Reparation—Consequential Damage—Terce—A widow, who had repudiated a postnuptial contract which she had accepted in lieu of her legal claims, and been served to her terce, having brought an action of damages against agents whom her husband had employed, several years before his marriage, to infest him in certain lands, because an erasure in the instrument of sasine had proved fatal to the infestment, and so excluded the terce, the agents were assoltized.

Mr Smith of Land, employed Messrs Goldie and Threshie (not his ordinary agents), to pass infestment for him in the lands of Monygryle, Pointfoot and others, which he had previously purchased. The date of the sasine is 1803. In 1807, Mr Smith married Miss Elizabeth Hoggan. There was no antenuptial contract, but in 1813, a postnuptial contract was executed, by which Mrs Smith accepted of £200 of principal, and an annuity of £25 in lieu of terce. Mr Smith died in 1827, in embarrassed circumstances; and Mrs Smith having repudiated the contract, and recurred to her legal claims, was served to her terce. A ranking and sale had previously been brought of Mr Smith's estate; and the common agent objected to the claim of terce, as regards the lands of Monygryle, Pointfoot and others, on the ground that Mr Smith was not validly seised in them, in consequence of the word "three" in the date of the Christian era (1803) being written in the instrument of sasine on an erasure. The objection having been sustained, both by the Court of Session and House of Lords, Mrs Smith brought an action, insisted in after her death by her trustees, in which, on the narrative, that in "consequence of this decision, the pursuer's said husband had never been validly infest and seised in the said lands, as he ought to have been, by the said Thomas Goldie and Robert Threshie; and thereby the pursuer has lost her claim to a terce of the rents of the said lands of Monygryle and Pointfoot, and has incurred further loss and expenses in trying the validity of the said instrument of sasine, and in endeavouring to make effectual her said claim as aforesaid: That the said instrument of sasine, founded on by the pursuer in her claim above mentioned, having been prepared, in manner above mentioned, by the said Thomas Goldie and Robert Threshie, as the law-agents or conveyancers of the pursuer's said husband, under his employment, of which employment they accepted, and for which they were paid their full professional charges and expenses, as above mentioned, they were legally responsible for the exercise of due professional skill and care in taking the said infestment, and in expediting and recording the said instrument of sasine, and were bound to have duly and validly infest and seised the said deceased Alexander Smith in the said lands of Monygryle and Pointfoot: That the said Thomas Goldie and Robert Threshie, however, culpably failed or neglected so to do, inasmuch as the said instrument of sasine, as prepared by them, was vitiated and erased in substantialibus in that part thereof which expressed its date;"

she concluded against the representatives of Messrs

Goldie and Threshie for payment of the sum of £2000 Sterling, or such other sum, less or more, as shall be ascertained to be the amount of the loss, injury and damage sustained by the pursuer in the premises, including the expenses incurred by her in endeavouring to establish her said claim of terce, and in resisting the objections stated to the validity of the foresaid instrument of sasine.

Pleaded for the pursuers—1. As it was in consequence of culpable neglect, or want of professional skill or diligence and attention on the part of Messrs Goldie and Threshie, as Mr Smith's agents, that the instrument of sasine was adjudged to be null and void, and the widow deprived of her terce of the lands of Monygryle and Pointfoot, the defenders, as the representatives of Messrs Goldie and Threshie, are liable in reparation of the loss and damages sustained by the widow, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. 2. Mr Smith's widow had a sufficient title and interest to institute and follow out the present action; and her title and interest have been validly assigned to the pursuers by her trust-settlement. 3. The grounds of action set forth, are both relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. 4. The defenders are not entitled, either as matter of fact, or in point of law, to plead communis error in justification of the neglect, or want of professional skill or attention on the part of Messrs Goldie and Threshie, to the effect of eluding liability for the present claim. 5. As Mrs Smith did not validly renounce, and did not receive any consideration or equivalent for her right of terce, she is in no respect precluded from seeking reparation on the defenders of the loss sustained by her as libelled. 6. It is res judicata by the judgment of the Court, pronounced on 18th January 1834, in the process of ranking and sale, that Mrs Smith was not barred from claiming terce out of the estate of her late husband by the postnuptial contract between them, which is now founded on by the defenders, and as that process and the steps in it, were regularly intimated to the defenders' agent, this plea is competent and available to the pursuers in this process.

Pleaded for the defenders—1. A claim for reparation against a professional man for negligence or want of skill, is competent only to his employer, who alleges that he is directly injured thereby;—the liability on which such claims are founded arising solely from the implied terms of the contract between the employer and the person employed. The pursuers' constituent, therefore, not being the employer of Messrs Goldie and Threshie, they have no title to insist in the conclusions of this action. 2. The pursuers have not libelled any relevant or sufficient grounds of action, in respect that the parties represented by the defenders were responsible to no one but their employer for their professional diligence and skill, and are not liable to third parties for the consequences of the blunder or neglect alleged. 3. In the circumstances of the case, and in respect of the communis error prevalent among the conveyancers of Scotland, the omission or neglect alleged was excusable, and affords no sufficient ground to any party for a claim of reparation. 4. The late Mrs Smith having, for a valuable consideration, validly and effectually renounced and surrendered her legal rights as widow, and particularly her right of terce, could suffer no damage from any alleged professional negligence through which the subject of the terce was diminished, or the grounds of this claim of terce otherwise competent to her being destroyed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"8th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the record in this case, with the revised cases and writs produced, and whole process, Sustains the first, second, and fourth defences urged for the defenders, and assolzies them from the whole conclusions of the action: Finds them entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—This is an action brought by the assignees of Mrs Smith, widow of Mr Smith of Land, against the representatives of Messrs Goldie and Threshie, writers in Dumfries, who were employed by her husband to pass infestment for him in certain lands which he had previously purchased. The summons concludes for damage said to have been sustained by Mrs Smith, from a mistake committed in extending the instrument of sasine on that occasion, which, in consequence of an erasure of the date, was found, both by this Court and the House of Lords, to vitiate the instrument.—See Shaw, 13, p. 461, and 1 Robinson's Appeal Cases, p. 173.

"The pursuers' plea is, that their predecessor's husband was thereby found to be uninfest in the lands, whereby his widow was deprived of her terce over them, and to that extent they seek reparation from the law-agents who expedite the sasine. This question is argued in papers of great ability on both sides; but the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that it would be going immeasurably farther than the law has ever yet gone, to hold the agents liable, under the circumstances of the present case, to the party now suing them.

"It is assumed in the argument of the pursuers, that when a law-agent is employed to prepare a settlement, which is rendered inoperative from a professional blunder, he is liable to the disponees or legatees for every loss which they sustain by the nullity of the deed. Taking that for granted, the pursuers allege, that the widow's claim here was analogous; that she was entitled to rely on the validity of her husband's infestments as the measure of her terce; and has right to reparation for any error in his sasines by which her right was diminished.

"Now, with regard to the general doctrine relied on by the pursuers, if it had appeared at all sufficient to rule the present case, the Lord Ordinary would have felt it his duty to examine the authority on which it rests (if it be generally recognised), and the limitations under which it must be received in practice. But the specialities of the present case, it is thought, present insuperable difficulties against the claim of the widow, which distinguish her claim, both in its circumstances and in the principle by which the decision must be governed, from any other to which it has been assimilated.

"1st, This is a case of intestacy, and the error in the sasine created no damage whatever to the agent's employer. No loss accrued to Mr Smith, to whom the sasine was to be given. The nullity of the sasine did not deprive him of the lands, the value of which were made available for his debts at his death. Even if Mr Smith himself, therefore, had sued the agents in his life for reparation of the error, he could have obtained nothing but a new and more correct sasine, which he never asked.

"But when professional errors or omissions occur, from which the employer sustains no loss, and claims none during his life, there is no example of an heir or executor, as the case may be, in an intestate succession, being allowed to prosecute a claim for their indirect or consequential damage in respect of their disappointment or loss in the transmission of the succession. Take the case of an agent desired to purchase an estate, and omitting to do so, or to attach another estate by diligence, and convert the security into money, the agent's omissions very plainly affect the succession between heir and executor, but it is thought that an action of damages by either against the law agent would not be maintainable. In fact, if claims for consequential damage were sustained in these and similar cases against law-agents, their responsibility would be at once incalculable and interminable.

"2d, It is admitted that the agents, whose representatives are now sued, stood in no relation of responsibility to Mrs Smith, either at the date of the sasine or at any subsequent period. The sasine was passed in 1803; but Mrs Smith was not married to her husband till 1807. And on that occasion she neither employed nor got any advice from Goldie and Threshie. She was married without any provision by antenuptial contract; and though it is insinuated that she relied on enjoying her legal rights, she cannot be allowed to plead that she trusted to her husband's infestments without employing an agent to inspect them. If she had done so, and if he did not detect the error, her claim, upon the principle assumed in this action, would have lain against him and not against the agents who expedite the sasine for her husband, years before the marriage, and without any reference thereto. The claim would be far less plausible than that of a purchaser claiming damages from the seller's agent for a blunder in the title, which it has been repeatedly found does not lie against the latter, at the instance of a purchaser who never employed him. On the other hand, if Mrs Smith employed no agent to ascertain the state of her future husband's property and titles, then she cannot plead, that, on entering into the marriage, she trusted to an infestment of her husband's of which she was ignorant. But,

"3d, The claim of Mrs Smith is still more excluded in the present instance by the consideration, that the husband, long after the marriage, indicated a clear intention that neither this nor any other infestment was meant or desired by him to subsist in his person, in security of his widow's right of terce. The widow's prospect of terce is notoriously defeasible in many ways. The husband may sell the lands, or remain uninfest if he chooses, or convert his property into heritable bonds, or he and his wife may enter into a conventional agreement to discharge the terce in respect of another provision. It is admitted that Mr and Mrs Smith took the latter course here. In 1813 they entered into a postnuptial contract, whereby she accepted of £25 per annum, and £200 Sterling of principal in lieu of terce. It appears, however, that she repudiated that contract after his death, and claimed and got a terce from lands to which her husband's title was unchallengeable; and it is not alleged that she did not thereby get more than £25 per annum, even exclusive of the lands comprehended in the erroneous sasine. Be that as it may, the argument deducible from that postnuptial contract in the present question is obvious. Had any party pointed out the error of the sasine now libelled on to the husband during his life, and suggested its rectification in relation to his widow's legal claims, it is necessarily presumable that he would have declined, as the passing of a more correct sasine, in the case supposed, would have held out an encouragement and inducement to his wife to revoke the contract, and thus to seek an enlargement of her provisions, which they had mutually fixed, and which he never indicated any intention to increase. The present, then, is a claim by a widow, founded on an error in a sasine of her husband's, which he not only never objected to, but which it is clear, from a deed under his hand, that it would have been contrary to his interest and presumed wish to rectify, had it been founded on or brought into view during his life with reference to his widow's claims. On this ground alone, it is apprehended that the present action is quite untenable. And in every view it is thought that the claim now urged in right of the widow is not maintainable on any legal or equitable principles applicable to the case."

Mrs Smith's trustees reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—On consideration, I have come to the conclusion, that the claim now insisted on in name of the original pursuer, Mrs Smith, cannot be sustained; and I concur with the Lord Ordinary in the views he has expressed.

Keeping in view the various decisions that have been pronounced as to the nature and extent of the liability of agents and other professional men, and attending to the whole circumstances of the case, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking, that to sustain the claim would be to carry the responsibility of the defenders, now represented before us, to a far greater length than has been done in any other case of which I am aware.

1. It is impossible to deny that the claim is rested on the consequential damages that are said to have arisen to Mrs Smith, from the defect that was discovered in her late husband's sasine in the lands in question; and it cannot be disputed, that consequential or remote damages, as arising out of any act complained of, are no favourites of the law, and are not to be sustained.

2. Admitting the correctness of the judgment as to the defect of the sasine of 1803, it is manifest that the agents in question, who were employed by the late Mr Smith to complete his purchase to the lands in question, never were, directly or indirectly, employed by Mrs Smith, who was not in fact married for four years afterwards, and may never have been seen by her future husband before the purchase. At any rate, a wife, whatever her legal claims on his estate and effects may be, cannot be viewed as the heir or successor of her husband, though, in the event of his death, she has legally secured to her a right of terce in the third of the estate in which he stood infest at his death. Over that estate the husband retained full power, and continued entitled to sell and dispose of it down till the hour of his death, and no process of inhibition or otherwise could be adopted against him by his wife, with the view of securing the right of terce. An obligation by a father in his son's marriage-contract, gives a claim to his widow directly, ex contractu, and is not parallel to the present case. Mrs Smith's situation was totally different, therefore, from that of an heir, who may have right to vindicate a claim of damages that existed in the person of his predecessor, in consequence of the negligence or unskilfulness of his professional agents.

3. Mrs Smith, in regard to her claim, in consequence of the defect in the sasine in question, was in no respect the assignee of her husband, so as to be able in that capacity to follow up his claim against his agents. This is the circumstance on which the case of Goldie, so much relied on by the pursuer as one directly in their favour, had evidently turned, as the wife's claim of damage for the loss of her jus relicte was expressly made, under a direct assignation by her husband in her favour, of the very right which an agent employed to make it effectual had utterly neglected. How very different the present case is from that one, it is unnecessary to point out. And when we again look to the particular circumstances that took place under the postnuptial contract between Mr and Mrs Smith, clearly indicating that he never intended, or even contemplated, that she was to be benefited by, or was likely to have any interest in any sasine as creating a right of terce,—we have, in fact, nothing to create the belief that even, if aware of the defect in the sasine in question, Mr Smith could ever have intended that his wife should avail herself of it. Had there been any thing like a deed or writing bearing that Mr Smith had abstained from making any postnuptial provisions for his wife in the event of her surviving him, as he relied on her being sufficiently provided by her legal right of terce, it might have been maintained that this amounted to an assignation of all claims that he might himself possess against his agents for the due completion of his sasine. The very contrary of this is, however, manifested by the postnuptial contract which Mr Smith actually executed.

I cannot, therefore, find grounds for sustaining the present claim. Mr Smith himself could only have called on his agents to give him a new and valid sasine had he discovered the defect; but, in fact, he himself suffered no injury whatever, as he held his estate till his death, and it was then divided among his creditors.

In regard to a claim of jus relicte, a widow surely could not raise an action against her deceased husband's manager or factor, for his having neglected to collect or accumulate his moveable estate, in consequence of which her claim of jus relicte was so far manifestly diminished.

Lord Gillies concurred.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. Any right to sue for damage occasioned by the defect in the sasine, vested in the husband long before the marriage took place. Then the marriage took place, and after that the death of the husband. The legal right of terce arose to the wife, but it was by its nature not applicable either to the lands in which the husband was not seized, nor to the claim of damage which was in the husband. In this the wife suffered no wrong. She had no right, either as against her husband or his conveyancer, to have his sasine in the land made perfect, or to damages for the defect. She has no right by terce, as if she had been actually infest in one-third of the lands at the date of the marriage. Perhaps, in ancient times, it may have been so, but now the right of terce exists only by the operation of the law, as applicable to the rights standing in the husband at the time of his death. In these views, it is impossible that the present claim can be sustained. It is just a right arising from the law. But, even suppose the husband had, by the contract of marriage, expressly bound himself that the wife should get one-third of these lands, would the effect be, that if the husband had an ill made-up right, the conveyancer would be liable to fulfil the obligation to the widow? The heir, and not the conveyancer, would be liable for the lands, though the conveyancer might have to pay for mending the defective titles. But what is proposed here is, that the heir should take the whole estate unburdened by terce, and that the widow should get the value of one-third of the lands from the agent; in other words, that the joint estate of widow and heir should be increased to the extent of a third, at the expense of the agent. That could never be equitable. I therefore concur with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Fullerton concurred, but chiefly on the specialty of the husband having evidently intended to exclude the terce.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Whigham, Young; Alexander Goldie, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Inglis; Walter Dickson, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

8th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 251.—ALEXANDER M'DOUGALL RALSTON, Claimant, v. JAMES and JOHN RALSTON, Claimants.

Testament—Legacy—Vesting—Condition—A testator bequeathed to A, "and in the event of his death to" his two sisters, "equally between them, or in the case of the death of either of them, to the survivor, the sum of £500, with the interest thereof from six months after my death, payable the said interest to their legal guardians for their behoof, and the principal sum payable to the said" A, "on his arriving at majority; or, in the event of his decease, to" his two sisters, "on the youngest or survivor of them arriving at majority." A survived the testator, but died in pupillarity, predeceasing his sisters, who also died in pupillarity. In a competition for the legacy between the testator's residuary legatees, who claimed the legacy as lapsed by A not attaining majority, and the next of kin of A, who claimed it as having vested by A surviving the testator, the Court preferred the next of kin.

The late William Henry Ralston conveyed his estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purpose of paying debt, legacies, &c.; inter alia,

"Thirdly, I appoint my said trustees to make payment of the gifts and legacies following, namely,—1st, To John Ralston, captain in the 64th regiment of foot, and to his heirs, the sum of £500 Sterling, payable six months after my death: 2d, To William Ralston, son of James Ralston of Towerhill, and in the event of his death, to Elizabeth Ralston and Mary Ralston, daughters of the said James Ralston, equally between them, or in case of the death of either of them, to the survivor, the sum of £500 Sterling, with the interest thereof from six months after my death, payable the said interest to their legal guardians, for their behoof; and the principal sum payable to the said William Ralston on his arriving at majority, or in the event of his decease, to the said Elizabeth and Mary Ralstons, on the youngest or the survivor of them arriving at majority."

By this deed the claimant, M'Dougall Ralston, had conveyed to him the estate of Warwickhill under certain burdens, and he was besides constituted residuary legatee by the last purpose of the trust, which was thus conceived:

"And lastly, after payment of my debts, sickbed and funeral charges, and the expenses attending the execution of this trust, and the legacies foresaid, and any other legacies which I may think fit at any time hereafter to make, I appoint and direct my said trustees to convey and make over the whole residue and remainder of my estate and effects, to and in favour of the said Alexander M'Dougall, my nephew," (the competing claimant) "for his use and behoof, and to his heirs."

The children of James Ralston named in the bequest, survived the testator, but they all died in pupillarity—William in 1838, Elizabeth in 1840, and Mary in January 1841; but all survived their father, who died in 1836, and he of course survived the testator.

James Ralston was a relative of the testator, and his children, who are those mentioned in the bequest, were the only issue of his then subsisting marriage, but he had a daughter by a prior marriage, who still survives. Subsequent to the death of the testator, the claimants, James and John Ralston, were born, and are now the only surviving issue of their father's second marriage.

In a competition for the legacy, M'Dougall Ralston claimed it as residuary legatee, as not having vested, in consequence of William Ralston having died before reaching majority. The plea was:—The legacy did not vest in any of the legatees, in respect it was contingent and conditional, and none of the contingencies or conditions took effect, or were purified.

James and John Ralston, who were the next of kin of William Ralston, claimed the legacy on the following plea:—That, according to a sound construction of the testator's settlement, the legacy vested in William Ralston, or at all events in his sisters Elizabeth and Mary, or the survivor of them, and did not lapse by his and their predeceasing majority; and the claimants, as nearest of kin both of their deceased brother, and of their deceased sisters, have now right to the sum claimed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"1st March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the claim of Alexander M'Dougall Ralston; sustains the claim of James and of John Ralston, and decrees against the raisers for payment to them in terms of their claim accordingly: Finds neither party entitled to expenses.

"Note.—The general rule used to be, and still is, dies incertus pro conditione habetur; and if this rule had been firmly adhered to, it would have solved this (and many another) case by deciding, that as the legatee died before the arrival of the period at which the legacy was payable, it had never vested. But though this principle has never been absolutely put down, it has in modern practice been so feebly applied, as to be held to be superseded by the slenderest possible indications of an opposite intention on the part of the grantor; and the rule now is, that his intention, as deducible from the words of the deed, is the sole criterion of construction. 'I have found difficulty (says the Lord President in the case of Provan, 14th January 1840,) in thinking that there is any principle established by any decision or series of decisions on the subject. We are bound to give effect to the will of the testator, whatever it is.' And as every case is thus made a special case, it is nearly idle to quote precedents, or to attempt to reconcile innumerable seemingly contradictory decisions.

"The terms and circumstances of the present deed are by no means so clear as to warrant its being said that this question is free from doubt. But on the whole, the Lord Ordinary considers the first part of the clause as the constitution of an absolute and immediately vesting legacy: and the second part as only regulating the application of the interest, and fixing the period at which the legatee, in whom the right is vested, could demand payment of the principal. This appears to be the true meaning of the words. And this construction is confirmed by the two important circumstances: 1st, That the interest undoubtedly vests at once; 2dly, That there is no special destination after the failure of the legatees, but only the nomination of a residuary heir.

"Each party refers to other parts of the deed as corroborative of his view; but no other part creates any difference on the interpretation of this leading clause.

"Each party also refers confidently to cases; and the confidence of each is fully justified by what they respectively found upon. The case of Oney, 19th November 1788, is irreconcilable (at least it cannot be reconciled by the Lord Ordinary) to the judgment he has now pronounced. But on the other hand, the cases of Wood, 2d July 1813, (Baron Hume's Reports, p. 271), and of Kennedy, 20th July 1841, could be as little reconciled to an opposite judgment. In this situation, the Lord Ordinary prefers the more modern authorities, and yields to what he conceives to be the tendency of modern construction."

The residuary legatee reclaimed:

The claimer argued, that the legacy of £500 was payable only to William Ralston on his majority; and in the event of his decease, it went to the sisters, or the survivor of them also attaining majority. But as they all died in pupillarity, the bequest necessarily lapsed. The argument for the claimer consisted in separating the latter portion of the clause from the first part, and in maintaining that the latter was the regulating portion; and in regard to the payment of interest, it was alleged to be a settled point that it did not cause the legacy to vest, unless it could be held to do so by the rest of the deed.—See Hume's Cases, p. 530; Hume v. Hume; and Campbell, 12th June 1810, S. and D., and ante, Vol. XII. p. 515.

The respondents argued—That the regulating portion was contained in the first part of the clause, and that the second part merely imported management as to payment, in which alone William Ralston and those claiming through him were concerned; and that the expression, "in the event of his death," had reference merely to the legatee predeceasing the testator, and not otherwise; and consequently, that if he survived the testator, the legacy vested. The legatee survived the testator, but died in pupillarity, and the consequence of that was maintained to be, that the sisters, if they had been in life, failing them the claimants, took as next of kin. Then the provision, as to the daughters, merely suspended to them the period of payment. Wood, in Hume's Cases, p. 271, 2d July 1813.

Lord Justice-Clerk said, he agreed with the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but not in the representation his Lordship made, that the cases which had been decided afforded no fixed rule for deciding on questions of this kind. Many principles had been fixed in consistency with one another, which, when due observance was made, yielded a sure enough guide. No rule could overcome intention when it was sufficiently expressed, and in that case, certainly, intention must prevail; but in the class of cases to which this question belonged, many principles had been laid down of general application, and the Court would require a very plain indication of intention before making an exception to the cases. It was quite possible that many of the cases had been decided differently from the meaning testators had in view, but that was the fault of the intention not having been properly framed, and where the law had therefore been left to be guided according to the rules of construction established by decisions. In this case nothing turned on the death of William Ralston, for the trustees are directed to pay over the sum to him, under the only condition that it was to be held by them till he attained majority. The residuary legatee was decidedly excluded by the first part of the bequest; for it was declared—"I appoint my said trustees to make payment of the gifts and legacies following: to," &c. Now that direction expressly excluded the residuary legatee, in consequence of the legatee himself, William Ralston, having survived the testator. The rest of the clause was merely for the sake of management, and was a provision in which he and those claiming through him had an interest. Besides, the vesting was clear from the additional circumstance, that interest was declared to be payable instantly that the legacy was exigible,—for the use of interest and profits had always been held as a conclusive element and test of vesting. Of course there were exceptions to this; but when trustees were directed to pay over to A B, who survived the testator, a legacy on his attaining majority, with interest from that period, that would be conclusive of its having vested, supposing A B thereafter died. The interest here made payable was the accessory of the vesting of the principal which the trustees were required to pay to A B by his surviving the maker. Hence his Lordship considered this the clearest case of vesting that could occur, and by surviving the testator, but deceasing before majority, the legatee transmitted the right to his next of kin. Campbell's case was inapplicable, in the circumstances in which it arose; and besides, there was no clause as to interest.

Lord Medwyn concurred.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion. Different views might be taken of the case. It might be a question, whether the legacy vested by surviving the testator; and in the terms of the deed, I think it did so, as the terms of the deed are very strong. The only thing that can be said against this, is the observation that there is a farther provision as to the legacy being payable only on majority, and that William Ralston never attained that period. But here the clause does not admit of that construction; for before it can be said that there is no vesting, it must be maintained that the clause constitutes a conditional institution. I think, however, it is impossible to carry it that length, and that, to say the least of it, all that can be said is, that it is a substitution. The clause is as follows (reads). The payment of interest is an important element, and it shows that a vesting was meant; because, as it provides that interest shall be payable to the guardians, that could only be the result of vesting during minority, else why give it to the guardians. It is by no means accurate to say that the decisions afford no rule for cases of this nature. The case of Wallace affords very distinct and important principles. The case of Campbell is clearly inapplicable to the present; for there the question was as to an attempt to get the fund before the period of payment.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court unanimously adhered, and further, found the claimant, McDougall Ralston, liable in expenses.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For A. M. Ralston, Shaw; John Paterson, Agent.—For J. and J. Ralston, Cowan; Hunter, Campbell and Co., Agents.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

8th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 252.—GEORGE HOME, Pursuer, v. JAMES HARDY and OTHERS, Defenders.

Process—Record, Authentication of, by Lord Ordinary—Personal Exception—Where the counsel for the parties had authenticated the record by their signatures, and signed a minute agreeing to close the record on the interlocutor sheet, which was followed by a minute signed by the Lord Ordinary closing the record in terms of the minute of counsel, but the revised papers did not bear the signature of the Lord Ordinary, it was held, in the circumstances, (1.) that this was a sufficient compliance with the Judicature Act; but, opinion, (2.) that even supposing that the want of the Lord Ordinary's signature was an error, it was capable of being cured or waived; and accordingly, where a party had litigated after closing the record, as if it had been properly authenticated, and had allowed the record to be given in evidence at a jury trial without objection—held that he was barred from objecting thereafter, and opening up the proceedings, on the ground that the record was not duly authenticated by the Lord Ordinary.

In this case a record had been made up by the parties, consisting of summons, defences, condescendence and answers, &c. An issue was thereafter approved of, and a jury trial—at which the defenders allowed the record to be given in evidence by the pursuer—took place, which resulted in a verdict for the pursuer. The defenders then moved the Court for a new trial on various grounds; but the present question arose out of the following notice of motion which the defenders served on the pursuer:

"TAKE NOTICE—That on Tuesday, the 21st current, the defenders will move the Court,—in respect the record of the pleadings has not been subscribed, authenticated, signed and closed, in terms of the Statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 120—1st, to find that the whole proceedings in this cause are null and inept from and since the date of Lord Jeffrey's Interlocutor of 19th December 1840, inclusive of that interlocutor; and, 2d, to find that it is incompetent to move or to proceed further in the cause until said proceedings are recalled and the record duly closed, in terms of the above Statute."

To explain the notice, it appeared that after the usual interlocutors for adjusting, and for avizandum with a view to close, and the enrolment by the Lord Ordinary to that effect, the counsel for the pursuer and defenders signed, on the interlocutor sheet, a short minute to the following effect:

"We, the counsel for the parties, hereby agree to close the record upon the revised condescendence and revised answers, with the amendment of the libel and additional defences, Nov. 11, 38, 39 and 40 of process."

After the above minute, the Lord Ordinary signed the following:

"The Lord Ordinary, in respect of the above-signed minute, holds the record closed, and appoints parties to debate thereon."

The counsel, respectively, then subscribed the revised condescendence and revised answers as finally adjusted, and "authenticated" the same "as part of the record," and there was a similar subscription and authentication, as part of the record, of an amendment of the libel, and the additional defences; but on the revised papers there was no signature of the Lord Ordinary authenticating the same as the record. In this state of matters, the Lord Ordinary remitted the case, after hearing parties, to the issue clerks, and thereafter an issue was returned, and approved of by his Lordship, in the usual manner.

The defenders' objection depended upon the construction to be given to the 10th section of the Judicature Act, which, after directing that the adjusted condescendences, and answers, and pleas, should be signed by the counsel for the parties, provides, that "before any order shall be pronounced, or judgment delivered as to the disposal of the cause, the record of the pleadings as adjusted, shall be authenticated by the Lord Ordinary by his signature." Here the record was not signed by the Lord Ordinary; and it was accordingly maintained, that a statutory nullity had been committed, which rendered the whole proceedings nugatory from the time of the adjustment of the record, and including the trial before the jury.

Answered.—That the Statute pointed out no particular form according to which the record was to be authenticated; and that here, as the signature of the Lord Ordinary immediately followed the minute, by the counsel holding the condescendence and answers as adjusted, and as part of the record, the enactment was sufficiently complied with; and, besides, even supposing that there was any irregularity, the defenders must be held as having waived it, by the whole procedure in the cause. In particular, by their having acted all along as if the record had been properly authenticated; but more especially were they barred by allowing the record to be given in evidence at the trial. They ought then to have objected, and the objection might then have been sustained as sufficient against the record being received in evidence. All this procedure formed a complete personal bar to the objection being now insisted in: See Reid v. M'Corrack, 13th January 1830; S. and D., Vol. VIII. p. 300. Cooper, 7 S. and D., 8, 31; 7 C. and F., p. 325.—House of Lords Rep.; and Galway v. Becher, libro cit.

Replied.—That the provision was not merely directory but imperative, and that the omission constituted a statutory nullity, which consent or waiving of parties was not capable of curing. It was now an objection ex parte judicis, which the Court must enforce equally rigidly as one arising on the stamp laws; and the Court had no alternative, for the words were express, that "before any order shall be pronounced, or judgment delivered as to the disposal of the cause, the record of the pleadings as adjusted shall be authenticated by the Lord Ordinary by his signature." Referred to M'Ivor, 22d December 1837; 16 S. and D., 292. Cumming, 19th November 1833.

During the trial before the jury, portions of the revised condescendence and answers were founded on and put in evidence.

Lord Justice-Clerk wished to know from Mr Rutherford if this did not obviate the objection.

Rutherford.—The plea is, that there is no record by the omission of the Lord Ordinary's signature, and therefore the objection could not be removed.

At advising, the Court were of opinion that the Judicature Act, in the 10th section, was merely directory, and contained no sanction under nullity of the procedure, where such an omission took place as the one referred to in the motion, especially so, as the Act pointed out no form or schedule according to which authentication was to be regulated—(See Maxwell and Company v. Stevenson and Company; ante, III. p. 409.—House of Lords, 4th April 1831.) Their Lordships were accordingly of opinion, that if any irregularity had taken place, it might still be cured by obtaining the signature of the Lord Ordinary, and that it would have required a very explicit enactment to oblige the Court to hold as null and void the whole procedure, after the defenders had litigated so far, and taken their chance of obtaining a verdict in their favour. Their Lordships further held, that there was an express waiving of the objection, supposing it existed, by the conduct of the defenders in the progress of the cause—the different interlocutors—the obtaining the issues, &c., but especially by their allowing the record to be given in evidence at the trial without objection. The objection now raised might have afforded solid ground for excluding the record as evidence; and accordingly the Court were of opinion, that by not objecting at the proper time, the defenders must be held as having waived their right afterwards to object.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court unanimously refused the motion, and found the defenders liable in expenses.

Act. Rutherford, Handyside; L. Mackintosh, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Milne; J. A. Robertson, Agent.—R. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

9th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 253.—WILLIAM SMITH and OTHERS, Raisers, v. HENRY ANTHONY HARDMAN and OTHERS, Claimants.

Foreign—Testament—Construction—Held, in regard to a will executed in Grenada by a party who died, and was domiciled there, and where the bulk of the estate and effects were situated, but which also had reference in its provisions to certain funds of the testator situated in Scotland, that the true import and effect of the will must be determined by the law of England, within the territory of which law the deed was prepared and executed.

The late Moritz Hardman, who died in Grenada in 1817, domiciled there, left a last will and settlement which was executed in that island, and bearing date 7th May 1817. The testator's estate and effects were principally situated in Grenada, but there were certain funds belonging to him in Scotland.

The settlement contained the following clause:

"I will and direct that the full sum of £10,000 Sterling be taken from my funds or capital in the hands of my correspondents, Messrs Leitch and Smith, merchants in Glasgow aforesaid, and placed immediately after my decease in any bank, or be retained separately by my executors in Europe, on perpetual interest. The interest thereof I give, devise, and bequeath to my two mulatto girls, called Eliza (the claimant Mrs Rouget), and Catherine, to be paid them for their support and maintenance after they attain the age of twenty years, and be then considered their own legal property; and afterwards the then accruing interest on the said principal sum of £10,000 shall also be considered their property, and be paid to them occasionally for and during his, her, or their natural lives; but should it happen that one or either of the said girls should die previous to their becoming of age or having issue, then the whole of the accruing interest, as aforesaid, shall be given and paid to the survivor of them; but in case it should so happen that both of the said girls, as aforesaid, should die without issue, then it is my will and pleasure that the said sum of £10,000, as aforesaid, with the accruing interest thereon, be reverted to, and be considered as part and parcel of my said capital, in trust as aforesaid, with my said executor in Europe: I will and direct that the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, either real or personal, that may be in the hands and possession of my executor and trustee aforesaid, after all debts, legacies, and other bequests and demands whatsoever that may come against my estate are paid and discharged, then it is my will, that whatever balance so remaining in the possession of my executor, shall still remain in trust, as aforesaid, with my executor and trustee John Guthrie aforesaid, for and during the term of twenty years after my death; and at the expiration of the said term, I give, devise, and bequeath to my nephew, Henry Anthony Hardman, and his lawful begotten children, the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, either real or personal, in trust as aforesaid, save and except £500 Sterling, to be divided amongst them, share and share alike, and to their heirs and assigns for ever," &c.

It also provided:

"It is my express will and desire that my executors and trustees in the said island of Grenada, save and except my executor and trustee in Europe (namely John Guthrie of the city of Glasgow), shall not draw, intermeddle, or make use of any part of any moneys, capital, or funds in the hands of my correspondents, Messrs Leitch and Smith, merchants, carrying on trade in the city of Glasgow, in North Britain, or may happen to be in the hands or possession of any person or persons whatsoever in Europe, but shall be subject only to the trust of my property, either real or personal, in the island of Grenada and the West Indies, there being sufficient funds to satisfy all my debts without interfering with my capital in Europe; and all and every my messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments and premises, with their and each of their appurtenances, together with all my slaves, mortgages, bonds and judgments, bills, West India debts, moneys, and security for money, and all and every real and personal estate and effects whatsoever I may die possessed of in the island of Grenada, shall remain in trust with my executors and trustees in the said island of Grenada, hereinafter named and described, until all other debts, legacies, and other bequests be paid off and satisfied, subject nevertheless to the farther true intent and meaning of this my last will and testament; and all my money and moneys, capital or funds, in the hands of my correspondents, Messrs Leitch and Smith, merchants in Glasgow aforesaid (or elsewhere), or in the hands or possession of any person or persons whatever in Europe, shall remain in trust with my executor and trustee in Europe (namely, John Guthrie aforesaid), subject, nevertheless, to the further true intent and meaning of this my last will and testament."

The testator's daughter, Catherine, died under age, and without issue; and thereafter a question having arisen respecting the party entitled to the interest of the above provision, the Court, in a process of multiplepointing raised by Mr Guthrie, the trustee, to settle that point, found that the question involved, and must be regulated by, English law. In consequence, Mrs Rouget was preferred to the interest of the sum. On the death of Guthrie, the present raiser was appointed judicial factor, and he brought this multiplepointing on the elapse of the time specified by the testator for the payment of the funds, in which the claimants lodged a joint minute, consenting to take the opinion of English counsel as to whom the fee of the provision belonged. The opinion of Messrs Pemberton and Knight Bruce was accordingly taken, and they concurred in holding that the fee was in Mrs Rouget; and in these circumstances Mrs Rouget (or her trustees) claimed the £10,000, pleading—1. That the last will and testament of a party deceased must be regulated and interpreted according to the law of the country where he was domiciled and died, and where the will was executed, and not by the law of the country where the funds may be situated, particularly if these funds be moveable. 2. That the testator being domiciled, and having died in Grenada, and his will having been executed there, it falls to be regulated by the law of the island, which is the law of England, although his funds may have been partly in Europe and partly in the West Indies, and as such placed under the management of different executors. 3. Besides, it having been decided by this Court foro contentioso in a question between the same parties, that by the said will the trust thereby created, in so far as respects the interest of the fund in medio, was an English trust, and fell to be regulated by the law of England, the same law must regulate the payment of the principal sum. 4. By the law of England, as ascertained by the opinions of English counsel, taken under the authority of the Lord Ordinary, the fee of the £10,000, being the fund in medio, belonged to Mrs Rouget, daughter of the said

SCOTTISH JURIST.

Moritz Hardman, and now to the respondents as her trustees and assignees.

The claimant, H. A. Hardman, who was the residuary legatee, contended that the will created two trusts, viz., one for the management of the West India property, and the other in regard to the Scots estate and effects; and he pleaded—1. That by the will of Moritz Hardman, a separate trust was created in regard to the £10,000 in question: That this was a Scots trust, to be administered in Scotland, and by a Scots trustee; and consequently, that the trust, and the subjects of it, and the questions regarding it, must be ruled and decided according to the law of Scotland, at least so far as regards the right to the capital of the £10,000 in question. 2. According to sound construction, the £10,000 in question does not belong to Eliza Hardman or Rouget, and she is not entitled to the fee of that sum, or to demand payment thereof. And, 3. In the event of the said Eliza Hardman or Rouget dying, and of there being no issue of her body, the sum of £10,000 in question reverts to the residue of the estate of the testator, and goes to the respondent, H. A. Hardman and his children.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"28th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record and whole process, finds that the construction of the last will and testament of the deceased Moritz Hardman, and the true import and effect of the several provisions it contains, must be determined exclusively by the law of England, within the territory of which law the testator was exclusively domiciled, and the instrument itself prepared and executed in the style, and according to the formalities used and required by that law: And before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may explain whether it is proposed to bring any further evidence of the construction which that law would put upon the said last will and testament, in relation to the questions in dispute between the parties in this cause, than is afforded by the concurring opinions of Messrs Pemberton and Knight Bruce, which have been already lodged in process on a case adjusted by the parties, and approved of by the Lord Ordinary.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary can see no reasonable ground for doubting as to the point now decided. Even without the conclusive fact of the domicile, he should have held that the mere circumstance of the will being executed within the territory of the law of England, and in the style and with the formalities peculiar to that law (for it is evidently a technical instrument, and framed by a professional person), would be sufficient to bring all questions as to the meaning and effect of the expressions it contains (as well as of its general validity), within the exclusive cognizance of that law. That a part of the funds (all personal) thereby disposed of were locally within Scotland, and placed and directed to be continued under the management of a Scottish executor, can have no effect on the primary question of construction, by which it must be settled to whom these funds are truly devised; though such circumstances of local situation and administration may no doubt affect the manner in which they should be taken up or transmitted. Of this last nature, accordingly, was the case of Milligan, referred to in the argument (6th February 1826, 4 Shaw, p. 432), in which it was distinctly conceded by the party, who contended (successfully) that the lex rei sitæ should regulate the forms necessary for vesting the legatee with the property, that it was indisputable that the radical question as to 'who was truly entitled to succeed' must be wholly ruled by the law of the domicile, or of the place where the instrument was made. In a former litigation, accordingly, as to the meaning of another part of this very will, it appears clearly to have been considered as depending entirely on the construction which would be given to it by the law of England; and accordingly, the report bears that 'the Court ordered the opinions of the English counsel to be taken on a joint case, and judgment was ultimately given in conformity with the opinions so obtained. (Hardman and Cook, 6th June 1828; 6 Shaw, 920.) Nay, in an intermediate litigation between the very parties now comparing, as to who should be entitled, under the same will, to the interest of the very sums, the principal of which is now in dispute, the same course was followed, and the right of the surviving daughter established upon principles and conditions derived wholly from the law of England; and indeed, when the Lord Ordinary looks at the joint minute in the present action (No. 36 of process), by which, so long ago as March 1838, all the parties agreed that the opinion of English counsel should be taken, and that without any saving or reservation on any part of a right afterwards to object to the authority of any such opinion, the Lord Ordinary cannot but believe that they were all then satisfied and ready to admit that the law of England alone must regulate, and that the plea against the authority of that law, now maintained by one of the parties, has been suggested only by finding that this authority was against him.

VOL. XIV.—No. XXXVII.

"The Lord Ordinary has himself no doubt that the opinions already taken on a joint case, adjusted by judicial authority and from eminent counsel, suggested by the parties themselves, and approved of by the Judge, being clear and concurrent, must be conclusive of the question. But as the party excluded by that opinion has stated on the record that he has obtained or can obtain opposite opinions, it has been thought right, before issuing any final decree, to let him be heard upon the matter."

Hardman reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I don't think that this point is open.

Lord Medwyn.—There can be no doubt it is not.

Lord Moncreiff.—I can't hold that there is any doubt about such a question at all. The Lord Ordinary is perfectly right, even if there were no precedent for it. But the point has been decided, and in favour of the interlocutor; and there is no point clearer in international law, than that a will must be construed by the law of the place where it was made, and particularly so, if the maker was domiciled there. Indeed, all that can be said about the deed constituting two separate trusts, is just construction on the will; and the counsel for Mr Hardman cannot open his mouth without construing the will. But we cannot judge of that, and it must go for opinion elsewhere.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have no doubt at all, and agree with what has been said. I think, with the Lord Ordinary, that there is a want of good faith in now repudiating the opinion of English counsel, after the parties had settled on that course.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly adhered, with additional expenses.

Lord Ordinary, Jeffrey.—Act. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Tawse; Tawse and Bonar, W.S., Agents.—Alt. G. G. Bell; W., A. G., and R. Ellis, W.S., Agents.—R. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

9th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 254.—DUKE OF SUTHERLAND, Suspender, v.
HUGH ROSS, Respondent.

Process.—Jury Trial.—Issue.—Salmon-Fishing.—Statutes, 1318, c. 12; Robert I.; James I., 1424, c. 12; 1427, c. 6 or 116; 1429, c. 22 or 131; James II., 1457, c. 34 or 66; James III., 1469, c. 13 or 87; 1478, c. 6 or 73; James IV., 1488, c. 16; 1489, c. 16; 1503, c. 17 or 72; James V., 1535, c. 16; Mary, 1563, c. 3; James VI., 1579, c. 27; 1581, c. 3; 1585, c. 20; 1596, c. 35; 1598, c. 3; 1705, c. 12.—A party having presented an application for interdict against a certain salmon-fishing, an issue was prepared in the usual terms, whether the defender has wrongfully fished for salmon by means of stake-nets or other fixed machinery placed in a situation or situations prohibited by law. The Court refused a motion for the defender to hear parties, prior to any jury trial, on the question of law as to the situation prohibited by the Statutes in reference to salmon-fishing—the averments of fact as to the situation of the machinery complained of being not admitted, but denied by the defender.

See ante, Vol. XIII. p. 580. The respondent, who was infest in his lands of Cambuscurry and Tarlogie, "cum lie zair et salmonum piscationibus," having proceeded to fish, and to erect certain fixed machinery for killing salmon on his said lands, which are situated on the Water of Dornoch, to the eastward of the Meikle Ferry, the suspender, who is proprietor ex adverso of the lands of Mid-Fearn and others, on the south bank of the stream, and of the river Shinn which falls into it, and of the salmon-fishings, presented this application for interdict against the respondent's operations as illegal, on the ground that the machinery complained of was not placed in the sea, but in an estuary or river, and in a locality falling within the prohibitions of the Statutes in regard to salmon-fishing. The averment of the suspender was as follows:—"The spot where the respondent was erecting this stake-net is not situated in the sea, but in an estuary or river mouth, intra fauces terræ, formed by the confluence of fresh water streams. The water running through Bonar Bridge, which is situated at a short distance above Meikle Ferry, is formed of the united waters of the Oykell, Cassly, Shinn and Carron, and the Water of Mid-Fearn also joins above the Meikle Ferry; and it is the united water of these streams that constitutes the great body of water opposite to Cambuscurry. This estuary or river mouth, though periodically affected by the tide, receives little or no mixture of salt water. In consequence, at low water the channel of the river is distinctly visible below the lands of Cambuscurry, containing only the flumina insulsa, or descending fresh water stream; when the tide flows through the fauces terræ, or mouth of the estuary at the Gizen Briggs, it only renders the water slightly brackish." These allegations were denied; and in reference to the question the respondent pleaded—1. That according to the true construction and effect of the ancient Statutes founded on by the suspender, the prohibitions could not be held to operate lower down than the point or line where the fresh waters descending from the upper streams meet the salt water of the sea in the Firth of Dornoch, at the lowest point of ebb-tide, below which line stake-nets and all other engines, being in the sea, are lawful. 2. The stake-nets in question, being situated below the said line in the Firth of Dornoch, were in the sea, and therefore not struck at by any of the statutory prohibitions; and the suspender not having averred that the same are above the said line, has not stated any relevant ground of suspension and interdict. 3. Under the terms of the respondent's titles, and having regard to the circumstances and evidence before averred and set forth, he is entitled to erect and use yairs, stake-nets, or other fixed machinery, for the catching and killing of salmon in the Firth of Dornoch, opposite to his lands before specified, in respect the said firth is not a locality to which the prohibitions of the Statutes against fixed machinery are in any way applicable.

The following issue was prepared by the issue clerk:

"Whether the defender has wrongfully fished for salmon opposite his lands of Cambuscurry, Tarlogie and others, or any of them, in the years 1841 and 1842, or either of them, by means of stake-nets or other fixed machinery, placed in situations or a situation prohibited by Statute."

The Lord Ordinary approved of this as the issue to try the cause, but the respondent thereupon served the following notice on the suspender:

"TAKE NOTICE—That the Second Division of the Court will be moved on Saturday first, the 9th instant, to recal the subjoined interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, approving of the issue hereto annexed; and before approving of any issue (vide Lord Chancellor's speech, ante, Vol. XII. p. 151), to hear the defender on the questions of law arising in the cause, and on the expediency of a remit to an engineer or person of skill before farther procedure."

At advising, it was argued by the respondent from the Tay case, and the terms of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in the Cromarty case, and the Statutes referred to (see rubric), that there was a question of law as to the point or line designated by the Statutes, and set forth in the pleas of the suspender, within which it was illegal to fish, and that that question ought to be determined prior to any issue being sent to a jury.

Answered—That the motion was incompetent, as the facts on which the alleged illegal fishing turned were not admitted. The facts, as averred by the suspender, if proved, would exclude the point of law altogether.

Lord Moncreiff.—The respondent is just arguing the usual question, and wishes to get the law before the ascertainment of the facts, which are denied.

Buchanan, for the respondent, argued, that the case was not fit for a proof at large.

Lord Justice-Clerk could not agree to that.

Lord Moncreiff.—If jury trial had existed at the time of the Tay case, I am satisfied it would have at once been tried on an issue, and not disposed of as it was.

Lord Medwyn.—If this had been the first question of this nature, probably we might have seen reason for the motion; but that is not the case; and I cannot certainly now agree to it.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court unanimously refused the motion—expenses reserved.

Act. Rutherford, A. Anderson; W. Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.
—Alt. Buchanan; Sang and Adam, S.S.C., Agents.—Nimmo, Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

9th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 255.—ALEXANDER BLAIR, Treasurer of the Bank of Scotland, Petitioner, v. THOMAS RANKEN, Common Agent in the Ranking and Sale of Land, Respondent.

Ranking and Sale—Decree of Certification—Process.—A petition to open up a decree of certification in a ranking and sale, presented after the lands were sold and vested in a purchaser, but while the price was still in manibus curiæ, for the purpose of rearing up a burden on the lands through a title which did not exist at the time the petitioner and other creditors had joined issue on a closed record in the process in regard to their claims and interests, refused as incompetent.—Observed, that the object of the petition (if at all competent) could be discussed only in the ranking and sale, or in a reduction of the decree of certification.

In 1831, a ranking and sale of the estate of Land was brought, in which, after claims and interests were given in, the usual decree of certification was pronounced on 24th May 1832.

Amongst other properties comprehended in the ranking, were included the lands of Knocksting, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. After the usual preliminary steps, these lands were exposed to sale, and were purchased by Mr M'Turk on 6th March 1833. The purchaser duly consigned the price. A decree of sale was pronounced in the usual form, and extracted in the purchaser's favour, and by virtue of this title, the purchaser has since that time been in possession of the lands. The Bank of Scotland put in a claim as heritable creditors over the lands of Knocksting. Their claim arose out of a loan of £9000 made by the Bank in 1824 to Alexander Smith of Land (the father of the common debtor, William Smith), and his brothers, James Smith of Jerburgh, and John Smith of Kirkconnell. In security of this loan, Alexander Smith disposed his lands of Knocksting, while his brothers also conveyed certain other lands to the bank. These brothers having become bankrupt, the lands so disposed to the bank became, amongst with their other estates, the subjects of a separate process of ranking and sale, called the ranking of Jerburgh. The Bank of Scotland entered a claim as heritable creditors for the debt of £9000 in the ranking of Jerburgh, as well as, in so far as the lands of Knocksting were concerned, in the present ranking of Land.

In the ranking of Jerburgh, the Bank of Scotland drew full payment of their debt, with interest; but as this was at the expense of two postponed creditors, the National Bank of Scotland and Mr Graham of Calside, who were claimants in both rankings, the Bank of Scotland were taken bound to assign to them their right over the lands of Knocksting, which was accordingly effected.

It appears that in the ranking of Land, the claim of preference on the part of the Bank of Scotland, in virtue of their heritable bond, was objected to by the common agent, on the ground that although there was a good personal right in Smith, yet that, owing to certain blunders in making up the feudal title, his infestment was inept. A record was made up in reference to the objection, by revised condescendence and answers, and closed on 5th July 1833. It appeared that no direct judgment was pronounced on the question, but it came indirectly to be decided by the judgment in the case of the common agent against Mrs Hoggan or Smith, whose claim of terce, so far as sought to be extended over Knocksting, was objected to on the same ground, of a defective feudal title in the husband. The objection there was sustained by the Court, 13th February 1833, and the judgment was affirmed on appeal, 30th July 1840.—See Vol. XIII. p. 408.

In this position the present petition was presented by the Bank, in which, after alluding to the previous procedure in the ranking, the petitioner set forth, "That objections having thereafter, in the course of the proceedings, been stated to the sasine, in so far as it regarded the property thereby conveyed by the said Alexander Smith in security of the said debt, the petitioners expedite a new infestment on the said bond, which is dated the 7th, and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines at Dumfries, the 9th day of December 1840, which has since been produced in process, but as this last production was made after the decree of certification had been pronounced in the process of ranking and sale, the petitioners have been advised to make the present application to your Lordships, to recal the foresaid decree of certification and reduction, to the effect of allowing the last instrument of sasine, dated and recorded as aforesaid, still to be received, notwithstanding of the said closed record, in order that such effect may be given thereto in the ranking as may be just." And they craved the Court accordingly. But the common agent in the ranking of Land, objected to the application as incompetent, as an attempt to open up a decree of certification regularly obtained, and which had been followed by a sale of the lands, while these, again, had been vested for years in the person of a purchaser. The Bank, it was alleged, were not the true parties for whom the application was made; it was made for behoof of the postponed creditors. But the bank had drawn full payment of their debt; and though they had assigned their right, yet it was only such right as stood in their persons at the time of the assignation. Now at that time the error as to the seisin existed. They had no valid right, as was plain from the decision in the question with Mrs Smith; and it was not now competent to attempt to bolster up that defective title, by expediting a new seisin, on the supposition of the precept not being exhausted, after certification, and after the lands were sold and vested in a purchaser. It was also incompetent on another ground to do this, for after issue had been joined in the competition, as depending on the title then set forth and disclosed on the closed record, the petitioner was not entitled, pendente lite, and after the closing of the record, to substitute a totally different title, and on that to seek to prevail. It might be competent to open up a decree of certification to the effect of admitting grounds of debt previously possessed and omitted to be produced; but here that was not the case, for previously no title existed, and the proposal was to introduce a new one. But decree of certification strikes at the construction of a new title, or what is the same thing, one subsequently made up, and endeavoured to be substituted for that originally founded on.

By the 54th Geo. III. c. 137, § 10, it is provided,

"that when the estate of a debtor is brought into the Court of Session by process of judicial sale and ranking, the decree of sale to be pronounced by the Court shall be held as a general decree of adjudication in favour of every creditor who shall afterwards be included in the decree of division; and the effect of such general decree shall be the same in all competitions or questions of ranking and preference, as if it had been pronounced and extracted of the date of the first calling of the process of sale before the Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House; and no separate adjudication shall be allowed to proceed during the dependence of a judicial sale."

By this enactment, the hands of all creditors are expressly tied up from taking any proceedings towards making good a preference by diligence, during the subsistence of the process. It was, therefore, altogether inconsistent with this provision, and the plainest principles of justice, if, while every other creditor was prevented from acquiring a preference, it should be open to one to make good such a preference by proceedings during the subsistence of the process, such as were here attempted. It was also objected to as an attempt to affect the lands sold by rearing up an heritable security which did not exist at the time of the sale under the ranking.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk said, that this petition was clearly incompetent, after what had taken place in the ranking, and the petitioner, if he wished a remedy, could apply for it, by appearing in the process where the record had been closed, if he chose.

Lord Medwyn.—The petition might be competent in point of form; but he was of opinion that the substance of the request was quite incompetent.

Lord Moncreiff considered it was impossible to grant the application, and that if the petitioner wished redress, he ought either to go back to the process of competition, or to bring a reduction reductivè of the decree of certification. But it was impossible to grant the application on such a statement as it contained.

Lord Medwyn.—To grant the application, would be in effect to put an heritable burden now on the estate which never previously existed. It was also impossible, after what had been done in the process, to think of opening up the decree of certification.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court unanimously refused the application, with expenses.

Act. Young; A. and W. Goldie, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, Penney; T. Ranken, S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

12th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 256.—ROBERT KIRK, Pursuer, v. ANN FORBES, Defender.

Process—Relevancy—Summons—Malice—Diligence, Illegal use of.—Damages—Reparation—A raised an action of damages against B for an alleged illegal use of diligence, which he averred had been obtained on the dependence of a groundless action brought against him to recover damages. Before this latter action was tried, the first was remitted, on summons and defences as the record, to the jury clerks to prepare an issue, who refused one, on the ground that the summons did not aver that the diligence had been obtained maliciously. In the interval, damages were found due in the other action, in consequence of which the Lord Ordinary was moved to dismiss the suit at the instance of A, as it was now shown by the result that B's action was not groundless, &c.—Question raised, Whether, in the circumstances, it was necessary for A to allege malice? and the parties allowed to give in additional statements as to the result of B's action, as bearing on the said question.

The pursuer set forth in the summons in this case, that the defender

"lately raised a groundless action of damages against him, concluding, for alleged causes therein specified, for payment to the defender of the sum of £500 Sterling in name of damages, and of the farther sum of £100 Sterling, or of such other sum, more or less, as the expenses of the process to follow thereon: That the summons to that action of damages was dated and signeted the 12th day of April last, 1841, and was executed of that date against the pursuer: That no previous intimation was given to the pursuer by the defender of any alleged cause of action against him, whereby, if true, he might extrajudicially have adjusted and settled any misunderstanding betwixt them; but in the absence of giving any such intimation to him for that purpose, the defender, most wantonly, nimiously, and oppressively, of even date with the date of her summons of damages, raised letters of inhibition and arrestment, which were signeted on the following day, at her instance against the pursuer; whereby, without his knowledge, and without any just and proper cause for so doing, she caused one of our messengers-at-arms to fence and arrest the sum of £1000 Sterling in the hands of each of the following persons," "all to remain in their hands under surety and arrestment at the instance of the defender."

The summons then proceeded:

"That in aggravation of her wanton, nimious, oppressive, and injurious measures of using arrestments to that extent, which amounted to the sum of £11,000 in the hands of the foresaid several persons, who were the pursuer's own tenants, the defender wantonly, nimiously, oppressively, and injuriously, used another and an additional arrestment of same extent against the pursuer in the hands of Mrs M'Lean, residing in Cassels Place, Leith Walk, near Edinburgh, who was not one of his tenants, but tenant of a different proprietor, and who resided in a different tenement of land from what belonged to the pursuer, meaning thereby unnecessarily to spread discredit against him: That in still farther aggravation of her wanton, nimious, oppressive, and injurious measures, the defender, of even date with the date of signeting her said letters of inhibition and arrestment, caused one of our said messengers also to inhibit and discharge the pursuer from touching or affecting his heritable property, for his own or other proper purposes; all as more fully set forth in the executions of her said diligence of inhibition: That she also published that prohibitory diligence to our whole lieges, and, upon the 23d day of said month of April last, the defender wilfully, nimiously, oppressively, injuriously, and maliciously recorded the same, and the executions thereof, in our general register of inhibitions, to render it an effectual and a lasting encumbrance on the pursuer's heritable property: That the pursuer was at that time negotiating for a considerable loan over his heritable property, to enable him to retire, when due, certain current obligations which he had granted in payment of the expenses of extensive repairs given to the barque 'Ospray' of Leith, consisting of 381 tons old measurement, now on a voyage from the port of Liverpool to the port of Bombay in India, whereof the just and equal one-half belongs to himself: and in consequence of the encumbrance thereby produced on his said heritable property, by the registration and improper use of that prohibitory diligence, and execution thereof, or of reports injurious to his credit, raised and circulated by and through the adoption and use of that groundless action of damages, and oppressive diligence used thereon, the pursuer has since failed in procuring a loan of money to the extent of £2300 Sterling, on the security of his heritable property, after a previous arrangement had been made with the proposed lenders to give it; and who had agreed to take the said security for the same, whereby the pursuer has sustained great loss, injury, damage and expenses, and thus been put to very great uneasiness in peace of mind, and to pecuniary inconvenience: That the pursuer has also been put to considerable expense and inconvenience, in procuring a partial loosening of the foresaid arrestments, and he is still exposed to the risk of incurring other and still greater expense, to extricate himself from the remaining effect of the defender's diligence."

The pursuer then subsumed:

"That the raising and executing of the foresaid groundless action of damages, and the raising, passing, and executing of the foresaid oppressive diligence of inhibition and arrestment, have annoyed, embarrassed, and injured the pursuer in his credit, peace of mind, character and reputation,—all as already mentioned: And although," &c.

The defender admitted having raised and executed the diligence set forth in the summons, which, she alleged, was done in the bona fide belief that it was necessary for the action which she had instituted against the pursuer. The diligence was besides regular in all respects, she averred, and had been competently obtained; and the arrestments had not attached more than £100. In defence she pleaded—1. That the diligence not having been recalled, as being nimiously or oppressively used, it is incompetent, while it subsists, to found upon it as inferring a claim of damages: 2. That as it is not averred in the summons that the diligence complained of, which was undoubtedly competent, was used maliciously, the action is irrelevant to infer its conclusions: 3. That the diligence complained of was competent and regular, and lawfully used by the defender.

The case was remitted on summons and defences, as the record, to the jury clerks for an issue, and before a trial had taken place in the action at the instance of Forbes against the pursuer, but they refused to give one, on the ground stated in the second plea in defence. By the time, however, it had returned to the Outer House, Kirk's action had been tried, and it appeared that the jury had returned a verdict on one issue in her favour—damages £50. This verdict was afterwards applied by the Court.

In this state of matters the Lord Ordinary was moved by the pursuer to allow an issue on the summons and defences; but the defender, on the other hand, moved his Lordship to dismiss the case, in respect of the verdict which had now been returned by the jury in her favour, which proved that the substance of the action—which, as alleged, was the nimious use of diligence on a groundless action—was without foundation. The Lord Ordinary found "that it is not necessary for the pursuer to aver malice," and again remitted to the jury clerks to prepare an issue. His Lordship appended the following note to the interlocutor:

"This case being an action of damages, was sent of course to the Issue-Chamber, but it was brought back to the Lord Ordinary, on the statement that the clerks refused to give the pursuer an issue, because, in so far as concerned the execution of the diligence complained of, there was no averment of malice in the summons.

"The Lord Ordinary has decided this point, and has purposely avoided giving any other, because this is the only one that has been properly raised. It may still be a question whether, after the verdict in the original cause, this action became maintainable, or whether, independently of malice, there be other adequate terms in the summons, and which of them, or whether all of them are to be put into the issue? But this is for the issue clerks in the first instance. The only point now is, whether the absence of the imputation of malice excludes the pursuer from having an issue,—in other words, is his action relevant, without malice being inferred?

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that it is.

"But undoubtedly the practice of the Court has not been uniform, either in the issues that have been granted, or in the principles on which they have proceeded. It rather appears to him, however, that all the cases which have been held so far privileged as that the defender could only be reached by an allegation of malice, have been of three kinds, viz., where the act complained of was done, or relevantly averred to have been done, 1st, in the performance of a duty; or, 2dly, in the course of a judicial proceeding; or, 3dly, while seeking the protection, even though extrajudicially, of the officers of criminal justice. An exemption from responsibility for collateral injury, where no malice is offered to be proved, is extended to all these cases upon obvious grounds of public policy.

"But what public policy is there in protecting a party against the ordinary legal consequences of his improper conduct, merely because he has inflicted injury by means of a formal ex parte warrant? The defender's argument is, that such warrants are judicial; and in one sense this is true. In form they issue from a court. But they are obtained for the asking, without any judicial inquiry or control, at the discretion, and at the risk of the applicant, who, in seeking them, is prosecuting his own private interest only. The Lord Ordinary can see no principle for giving any privilege to such cases,—and this, whether the diligence be employed to injuring another in his person or his property. In truth, though not in form, it is all extrajudicial.

"Still there are cases in the books which it is difficult or impossible to reconcile with this, or perhaps with any general principle. But on the whole, the Lord Ordinary agrees with Lord Jeffrey in his reasoning and exposition of precedents in the case of Swayne, 27th June 1835. The case of Duffus, 4 Murray, 558, is the likest this in the nature of wrong said to have been done; but there the pursuer averred malice, and therefore this question could not arise."

The defender reclaimed, praying the Court

"to recal the foresaid interlocutor, and to find that it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth that the diligence complained of was maliciously used, and also that the summons is otherwise not relevant, in respect of the result of the action on which the said diligence was used, and therefore to dismiss the present action with expenses, or to do further or otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem just."

The Court, without expressing any opinion on the general question as to malice, or whether the pursuer was bound to insert malice in the present summons, considered it to be premature to decide that, as it might not, after all, be necessary for the disposal of the case, and rather thought that the course was to allow the defender to have an opportunity of making an addition to her defence, so as to bring out the fact, which could not be disputed, that a verdict had been returned in her favour, with power to the pursuer to give such explanation as he thought proper; and to allow the Lord Ordinary to recal or vary, or otherwise alter his interlocutor, after considering the bearing of the additional matter on the question. The Court

"Recal, hoc statu, the interlocutor complained of, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to receive such additional statements of fact as the parties may be advised to offer, arising on the result of the action at the defender's instance, upon the dependence of which the diligence here complained of was used, and to proceed farther thereon as to his Lordship may seem just."

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Thomson, Hector; J. Meiklejohn, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Pyper; D. Mitchell, jun., S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

12th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 257.—THOMAS COREY and MANDATORY, Advocators, v. WILLIAM ANDERSON, Respondent.

Process—Advocation—Bill-Chamber—Statutes 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, and 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 1-6—A. S., 11th July 1828, and 24th December 1838—Held that, in advocating against an interlocutory judgment of a Sheriff allowing a proof, the proper course is to present the note of advocation to the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber, and not to lodge the note in the hands of a clerk of the Court of Session, omitting the Bill-Chamber.

The advocates raised an action against the respondent before the Sheriff of Forfar, at Dundee, in reference to the freight of a vessel called the Millford, and after certain procedure, the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:

"Dundee, 8th March 1842.—Before answer, allows a proof to both parties habile modo of their respective averments in the closed record, in so far as not admitted, and to each of them a conjunct probation, the pursuers being to lead their proof within one month from this date, and to give the defender three days' previous notice of the time and place fixed for proving, and the defender to lead his proof within one month thereafter, and to give the pursuers similar notice of the time and place fixed for proving: Grants warrant for letters of diligence, at the instance of both or either of the parties, against witnesses and havers, and commission to Messrs David Cobb, William Reid, Archibald Duncan and Duncan M'Lachlan, writers, Dundee, or any of them, for taking the depositions of the witnesses and havers, and receiving and marking their exhibits, and assigns for reporting said proofs the respective periods above specified." (Signed) "JOHN I. HENDERSON."

The pursuers of the action then presented a note of advocation in the following form:

"That the above interlocutor was pronounced in an action in which the said Thomas Corey and William Allen Flowerdew, as mandatory foresaid, are pursuers, and the said William Anderson is defender, depending before the Sheriff of Forfarshire. That as the claim in said case exceeds in amount the sum of £40 Sterling, it is competent to the complainers to have the cause advocated in terms of the Act of Parliament 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120, § 40; and the complainers are desirous to avail themselves of the provision in said Statute.

"May it therefore please your Lordships to advocate the said action from the said Sheriff to your Lordships, and to discharge the said Sheriff, and all other inferior judges from farther proceeding therein; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

There was no statement of facts attached to the note, but the advocates, as usual, appended additional pleas in law in support of the note. The note of advocation, with the pleas, was lodged at once in the hands of one of the clerks of the Court of Session, without any intermediate procedure in the Bill-Chamber.

The regularity of the step was brought in question by the respondent on the following plea:—This advocation has been incompetently brought, and ought to be dismissed, in respect that being an advocation under the 40th section of the 6th Geo. IV. c. 120, a bill or note of advocation ought to have been presented to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, and the case could not, de plano, be advocated to the Court of Session without passing through the Bill-Chamber.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the objection; on which the respondent reclaimed, praying the Court "to alter the above interlocutor submitted to review; to find that the advocation has been incompetently brought into Court; to dismiss the same, and to find the advocates liable to the respondent in the expenses incurred by him in the advocation."

He argued—That by the 40th section of the 6th Geo. IV. c. 120, all advocations of such interlocutory judgments pronounced in the Inferior Court, allowing a proof, where the cause of action was above £40, must proceed by bill of advocation in the Bill-Chamber; and that as to the present case, and others of the same nature, which were not advocations of final judgments, it was not provided, in the 1st and 2d Vict. c. 86, § 6, that they, like advocations of final judgments, should, as under the 1st section, be lodged at once with a clerk of session; and, accordingly, that such cases must be held to be excepted, and not provided for by 1st and 2d Victoria; and consequently, that they fell under the provisions of the 40th section of the 6th Geo. IV. c. 120, which specially provided that the first step in advocating was by a bill of advocation lodged in the Bill-Chamber. Section 10 of the Act of Sederunt, 24th December 1838, merely provided that the form of advocations of interlocutory judgments should be altered, and instead of a bill it should be by a note, in the same way as in advocations of final judgments. But the Act of Sederunt did not provide that the mode by which the advocation was to be introduced into Court, should be by lodging the note in the hands of the clerk of the Court of Session, nor did it dispense with the Bill-Chamber. It was accordingly not objected here, that the form of the note was wrong, as the Act of Sederunt specially provided it should be by a note, —the objection being only to the way it had been introduced into Court. And it was argued, that even if the Act of Sederunt had dispensed with the mode of passing through the Bill-Chamber, it was ultra vires of the Act of Sederunt to defeat the imperative words of the Statute (6 Geo. IV.)

Answered—That the general and usual course had been followed in this case as in all others, and that the Act of Sederunt, 1838, was sufficient authority for the practice, by which it was provided, that the form of the advocacy of an interlocutory judgment should be the same as that of a final judgment.

The Court were unanimously and clearly of opinion, that the Act of Sederunt, 1838, did not provide that such cases should at once be introduced into Court by a note lodged with the clerk of the Court of Session, but merely altered the form by way of bill to that of note, and nothing more; and that as such was the case, and the 1st and 2d Vict. did not repeal the 6th Geo. IV., the argument of the reclaimers was insuperable, that the note here ought to have been presented in the first instance to the Lord Ordinary on the bills. But as a strong averment was made as to the practice being without exception of the nature under consideration, their Lordships granted the prayer of the reclaiming note, without finding the reclaimers entitled to expenses.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—For Reclaimers, Rutherford, Cowan & W. Miller, S.S.C., Agent.—For Advocators, P. Robertson, Milne; Greig and Morton, W.S., Agents.—R. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

14th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 258.—WILLIAM BROWN, Charger, v. THOMAS SAMUEL and COMPANY, Suspenders.

Partnership—Adventure—Contract—Clause—A manufacturer engaged to give the shipper one-fourth of the profit or loss on his goods, it being understood that he was to invoice them at the fair market price of the day; but in the event of loss on that price, to reduce it to prime cost. A trifling loss having been sustained—Held that the manufacturer was not bound to reduce the market price further than necessary to cover that loss.

William Brown, carpet manufacturer, Kilmarnock, entered into an arrangement with Mr Thomas Samuel (afterwards Thomas Samuel and Company), founded on the following letter written by the latter, and accepted by the former:

"Wishing to confine the exertions of my friends in South America to you, viz., at Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, St Iago de Chili, and Lima, I have made a purchase of Brussels carpeting from Kidderminster, purely to prevent any interference in that or any other article in your line, knowing from you that it is your intention to manufacture this kind also, the amount will be from £300 to £400. I have therefore to propose to you, if perfectly agreeable, to give you an interest in these and future sendings of Brussels carpeting, provided it shall be deemed advisable, to the extent of one-half amount of profit and loss after all charges, interest, &c., is deducted, provided that you allow me an interest of one-fourth amount of profit or loss on your own manufacture, it being understood that yours are to be invoiced at the fair market price of the day; but, in the event of loss arising on these prices, you are to reduce the invoice price to prime cost, covering manufacturing charges."

Four shipments of carpeting were accordingly made —the last only yielding a profit, and the others resulting in a trifling loss. In apportioning the loss, a misunderstanding arose between the parties. Brown maintained, that under the agreement he was not bound to reduce the invoice price further than was necessary to cover the amount of the loss; whereas Samuel and Company maintained, that by the mere fact of a loss, however small, he was bound to reduce the invoice price to prime cost, including manufacturing charges, though the effect of this reduction should be to yield them a profit while it left him none. Samuel and Company having rendered their accounts on this footing, Brown brought an action against them for the difference, before the Magistrates of Glasgow, and having succeeded in obtaining a decree, extracted it, and gave a charge to the defenders, who suspended.

The Lord Ordinary, "of consent of parties, who state that the cause is fitter for written than verbal discussion," ordered cases, and afterwards made avizandum to the Court, who pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find the letters orderly proceeded, and repel the reasons of suspension: Find no expenses due in this Court, and decern."

Lord Ordinary Cockburn, for Jeffrey.—Act. Penney; Gibson-Craig, Dalziel and Brodie, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Mackenzie; J. and J. Macandrew, S.S.C., Agents.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

14th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 259.—JOHN WALDIE, Advocator, v. THE COMMERCIAL BANK, Respondents.

Personal Exception—Landlord and Tenant—Circumstances in which a landlord, who might otherwise have claimed an article as a fixture in a dwelling-house let by him, was held to be precluded, personali exceptione, from so doing.

The advocator, who had for many years been agent for the Commercial Bank at Kelso, was proprietor of the house in which the business of the agency was transacted, and the Bank held the premises on a lease from him from year to year. On their entry they fitted up the premises as a bank office, and built into the wall a stone safe, having an iron door and lock fixed or built into the wall. When the advocator was relieved of his appointment, he gave up an "inventory of the furniture belonging to the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Kelso," and he included therein "1 stone safe, with iron door and inner chest;" and at a meeting of parties in reference to the winding up of the agency business there, a minute was written out, which was signed by Waldie, which contained the following passage:

"Mr Waldie having received a letter from the secretary of the bank, dated the 5th instant, intimating that the directors had resolved to relieve him of his charge as agent for the bank at Kelso, and requesting that he would hand over to Mr Mackenzie all the bank's property in his official custody, and this time having been appointed for that purpose, Mr Waldie accordingly delivered over to Mr Mackenzie the keys, cash, bills, books, &c., in his possession."

"Mr Waldie also delivered over the furniture and fixtures in the office belonging to the bank, conform to inventory annexed, signed as relative hereto."

The Bank having proceeded to remove the iron door, &c., of the safe, the advocator applied to the Sheriff to prevent their so doing, on the ground of being fixtures, and to restore them if carried away.

The Bank appeared, and argued—That after Waldie had, by the above inventory and minute, admitted that the safe was theirs, and had agreed to deliver it over, they were entitled to remove it; and in so doing, they stated they were willing to fill up the opening in the wall occasioned by the removal, and to be at the expense of putting it in a proper state, to the advocator's satisfaction.

The Sheriff,

"in respect the stone safe and others referred to are truly fixtures and therefore the property of the petitioner, and that the mere mention thereof in the inventory (No. 1. of production) was not per se sufficient to transfer the property to the respondents. Repels the defences, confirms the interdict, and ordains the respondents to restore to the petitioner's premises the door, lock, and others which were carried off by them or their agents, and decerns: Finds the respondents liable in expenses, and appoints an account thereof to be given in and taxed."

The Bank advocated. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the record and whole process—In respect it is established by documents under the hand of the original pursuer himself, that the stone safe, with iron door and lock, specified in the record, was not a fixture under the lease, or other title whereon the advocates possessed the premises under him—advocates the cause, sustains the defences, and recalls the interdict complained of: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, both in this and in the Inferior Court.

"Note.—The plea of the pursuer in the present case appears to be unfounded in law, and contrary to justice and good faith. He was long agent for the Commercial Bank at Kelso; and, in order to obtain accommodation for their business, the bank took a lease of a house belonging in property to the pursuer. Some time before the termination of the lease, that bank wrote to him for a statement of their property in these premises, and on two separate occasions he transmitted lists, which included the safe in dispute as part of the bank's property.

"In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary cannot help viewing it as a plea quite untenable and preposterous for the pursuer now to allege, that he made out these lists as bank agent, and not as landlord, as if the same man could, by any change in his character or designation, retract or contradict a fact which he himself had recently before attested.

"It is supposed, also, that the ratio assigned by the learned Sheriff for their judgments in the Court below is equally inadmissible. It is laid down that the pursuer's acknowledgment cannot operate as a transfer of heritable property. But when a landlord admits that such an article as a safe belongs to the tenant, the effect of the admission is, to show that the fixture or article never was a part of the freehold transferred to, or inheritable by, the landlord.

"The direct effect of all special agreements as to fixtures between landlord and tenant is, to bar the plea that particular erections made by the tenant shall ever form any part of the heritable property; and when the landlord here gave in lists to the bank as tenants, setting forth this safe as part of the tenant's property, that document is equivalent to a declaration that the article in question was erected and put up originally in the premises on the faith and understanding that it should be removable by the tenants.

"There cannot be a doubt that this was a fair and competent arrangement between landlord and tenant, when they contracted with each other. In a passage quoted from Professor's Bell's Commentaries, in a learned pleading before the Inferior Court, sundry cases are cited to show that soap-boilers' vats, and bakers' ovens, may be declared moveable by the agreement of parties. (1 Bell's Com., p. 753.) And why should the stone safe of a banker, or the stone cistern of any other tenant (if that had been erected by him under a similar covenant), be competently held of the same description? It rather appears to be singular that the pursuer should have thought it worth while to put so much expense to hazard in trying such a question."

On a reclaiming note, Waldie pleaded—That the safe was a fixture, and as such belonged to him as landlord, and that it could not be removed, though it might leave a question of melioration as between him and his tenant.

The Court were of opinion that he was not now entitled to plead that it was a question as between landlord and tenant, after he had admitted, as between the bank and him as agent, that the article belonged to the bank, and had agreed to deliver, or rather had in fact delivered it over to them; and their Lordships were unanimously of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was right; but as it was clear, from the explanations of parties, that the article was a fixture, their Lordships varied the interlocutor so as to meet that fact.

The Court

"Recal the interlocutor complained of; but in respect that, by the minute of 9th September 1840, it is proved scripto of the reclaimer that he then delivered over to the superintendent of the Commercial Bank the stone safe with the iron door, referred to in the petition to the Sheriff of Roxburghshire, as the property of the bank. Alter the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and recal the interlocutor complained of, and remit to the Sheriff with instructions to see that the room be restored to its former condition, or a door placed on the safe, in terms of the proposal contained in the addition to the answers for the Commercial Bank in the Sheriff Court, and that in the option of the reclaimer: Find the reclaimer liable in the expenses incurred by the respondents in this Court, and in the Inferior Court, up to the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against, and no further expenses; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. G. G. Bell; Robert Laidlaw, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. J. S. More; J. A. Campbell, C.S., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

15th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 260.—THOMAS ANDERSON (Smith's Trustee), Pursuer, v. THE TRUSTEES of the deceased ARCHIBALD WALKER, Defenders.

Proof.—Evidence—Jury Trial—Circumstances in which the Court refused a motion to set aside the verdict of a jury, as being against evidence.

Bankrupt.—Reduction—Statute 1696, c. 5.—Circumstances in which an heritable bond by a party within sixty days of bankruptcy, in favour of a creditor who had made prior advances on the faith of the security being granted, was found not to come under the sanction of the Act 1696, c. 5.

On 1st February 1840, Andrew Smith granted an heritable bond and disposition in security to Archibald Walker, as for an instant loan of £1300, in the usual terms. The deed contained no particular reference as to the way and manner, or the circumstances in which the loan was contracted. Walker was immediately infest, and on the 12th February thereafter, Smith was sequestrated, when his trustee brought an action to reduce the bond as a preference illegally granted to a creditor within the sixty days of bankruptcy.

The following issue was approved of, and tried by a jury:

"It being admitted that the pursuer is trustee on the sequestrated estate of Andrew Smith of Elenbank, and that the said Andrew Smith granted the bond and disposition, No. 5 of process, sought to be reduced:

"Whether, on the 1st day of February 1840, the date of the said bond and disposition, the said Andrew Smith was notour bankrupt, or at least was so within sixty days after the time when the said bond and disposition was granted; and whether, contrary to the Statute 1696, c. 5, the said Andrew Smith granted the said bond and disposition in satisfaction or security of a prior debt due by the said Andrew Smith to Archibald Walker, writer and banker in Auchtermuchty, in preference to the other creditors of the said Andrew Smith?"

It appeared from the evidence in process, that Smith had applied to Walker for a loan over his property in 1839, long prior to his bankruptcy, and that the latter was either to procure it for Smith, or to advance it himself. Walker was a bank agent in the neighbourhood of Smith, and it appeared that Smith had been allowed to overdraw his account before the loan was procured, on the assumption that a loan would be got, but as that did not take place, it appeared from the evidence as if the bond had been granted in security to Walker for the over drafts, for which, of course, Walker was liable to his own constituents.

The following verdict was returned:

"At Edinburgh, the 29th day of March 1842 years, before the Right Honourable the Lord Justice-Clerk, compeared the said pursuer and the said defenders by their respective counsel and agents, and a jury having been impanelled and sworn to try the said issue between the said parties,—say upon their oaths, that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find that, on the 1st day of February 1840, the date of the said bond and disposition, the said Andrew Smith was notour bankrupt, or at least was so within sixty days after the time when the said bond and disposition was so granted: Find, that at the time of advancing the sum of £1190, or previously to such advances, it was expressly stipulated and agreed upon, as a counterpart of the transaction, that the borrower, Andrew Smith, should give an heritable security for whatever sums Walker might obtain, or advance as a loan for Smith to the extent of £1500, over the specific subjects described in the security afterwards granted on the 1st of February: Find, that although such stipulation for a specific security was not reduced into any binding agreement or formal writing at the date thereof, yet it is evidenced by writings applicable to, and prior to the advances, as well as by the facts and circumstances of the transactions between the borrower and the defender: Find that the sum of £1190 was advanced by the defender at different times, after such express stipulation and agreement, in reliance upon the same, and that the sums would not have been advanced, except in respect of that stipulation for a specific security over specified heritable subjects, as the counterpart of the transactions: Find that Walker becoming liable for sums drawn out by Smith from the bank, beyond the amount for which there was caution, did truly make advances thereby to and on account of Smith; and in doing so, he relied upon an express stipulation as aforesaid, previously entered into for specific security to be granted for the sum of £1500, being more than the amount of the sums for which Walker so became liable: Find that the original stipulation for a security was not exclusive of the transaction taking the turn it actually did, of Walker himself making the advances on the faith of the intended security, if he did not get a loan from another."

The pursuer now moved the Court to set aside the verdict as against evidence, but the Court refused the motion.

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—There appears to me to be quite sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and I can't hold it to be against evidence.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion; and that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. There is evidence scripto that money was to be given or procured by Walker for Smith, long before the bankruptcy, and there is evidence aliunde that the money was given by Walker to Smith in security of which Smith was to convey his property. It may be true, that it is somewhat doubtful whether Walker was himself to give the loan, or to get the money for Smith from another; but it is plain the deed was as if for a loan, which was previously arranged to the date of the bond. It was said that Smith did not know that Walker was bound for the over drafts, but Smith says, "I knew that he was personally interested, as I got money from him, and that it was necessary that he personally should be covered." And then there are payments in consideration of the bond, and these are entered in Smith's books as to account of the bond. If there be a point of law left by the verdict, as to the competency of the bond covering the over drafts, it is still open to be raised by the pursuer, so I don't say any thing about it.

M'Neill said, it was not intended to be raised.

Lord Moncreiff.—My opinion is, that there was a prior agreement to make a loan, and that the evidence supports the verdict.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur. I asked the jury at the trial to insert certain findings in the verdict, that any point of law, if there was one, might be afterwards raised. But then, that point was totally distinct from the evidence, which, in my opinion, supports the verdict, and makes out the agreement that Walker was under an obligation previously to make the advance. The evidence adduced to the jury clearly makes out this; and the advances were made on account of the bond. The more it is looked at, the more the evidence appears to me to support the verdict.

Lord Macdowbank absent.

Presiding Judge, Lord Justice-Clerk.—Act. A. M'Neill; J. W. Arnott, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Deas; T. Leburn, S.S.C., Agent.—[G.D.F.]

16th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 261.—COLONEL HUGH DUNCAN BAILLIE, Suspender and Interdictor, v. DONALD MACKAY, Respondent.

Landlord and Tenant.—Lease.—A tenant in an agricultural subject, held not entitled, without the landlord's consent, to erect upon it a shed for public stabling, and that at a short distance from an inn belonging to the landlord.

Donald Mackay held under Colonel Baillie of Redcastle the two farms of Kessock and Easter Kessock. On the former farm there is an inn, which was held along with it; but the lease having expired at Whitsunday 1842, without being renewed either as to the lands or the inn, Mackay was proceeding to erect on the farm of Easter Kessock, which he still held, and at the distance of about three hundred yards from Kessock inn, a large wooden building, to be used as stabling for the accommodation of the public, and of horses intended to be kept for hire. Against this proceeding Colonel Baillie presented a note of suspension and interdict, in which he pleaded.—That the proceedings complained of and threatened, would have the effect of appropriating a portion of the subject of lease to a purpose inconsistent with the nature of the subject, and with the conditions of the respondent's title of possession, and are therefore illegal: Milne v. Mitchell, 23d February 1787, Mor. 15,254.

The respondent pleaded.—1. The use which the respondent proposes to make of the said building or shed is a perfectly lawful one, and cannot be held or considered as an inversion of the proper uses of the farm, under the missives and relative minute of lease. 2. As the lease contains no prohibition to the contrary, the respondent is entitled to convert the said building into a stable and coach-house, for the purpose of carrying on his business of a licensed hirer, for his own advantage, and for the accommodation of the public; and the complainer, on the other hand, is not entitled to prevent him from doing so, on account of any interest, direct or indirect, which he, as landlord, may have in the prosperity of the neighbouring inn at Kessock.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"1st July 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this cause, and heard counsel for the parties, passes the note, and continues the interdict.

"Note.—The respondent admits,—1. That the farm of Easter Kessock was let to him as an agricultural subject, (answers to condescendence, art. 5); 2. That the wooden building in dispute 'is not at all required for the purposes of the farm,' (respondent's statement, art. 5); and 3. That it is with a view to convert it to use in a totally different line of business, that the proceedings against which interdict is sought have been instituted. In such circumstances, the Lord Ordinary has not been satisfied that the respondent's right so to do is so very clear, as that the note should not even be passed to try the question. It may be that the cases referred to do not precisely run on all fours with the present in their details; but the principle is the same. For the turning point in all was the tenant's want of right to invert the uses (either in whole or in part) for which the subject of lease had substantially been let.

"There is another point. The inn which the respondent formerly held under the complainer was, during his possession of it, used as a posting station. It is to be presumed it was let to, and taken by the present tenant with a view to a similar occupation. The suspender, as landlord, could not, after letting the inn under such circumstances, have been warranted in setting up in its immediate vicinity, as the respondent proposes to do, a rival establishment. It is his duty, therefore, if he be entitled, with reference to the limited objects of the respondent's lease, to prevent the respondent from stepping beyond these objects, by converting a portion of his farm into a rival posting house."

The respondent reclaimed; but the Court, without calling on the suspender, adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—For Suspender. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), G. Dundas; Horne and Rose, W.S., Agents.—For Respondent, Whigham, Inglis; W. Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

16th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 262.—THE NEW CLYDE SHIPPING COMPANY, Pursuers and Advocators, v. THE RIVER CLYDE TRUSTEES, Defenders and Respondents.

Reparation—Damages—Trustees, Statutory—Liability for the Misconduct of their Officers and Servants.—Held that trustees under a public Act, declaring that the trust-funds are to be appropriated solely for the purposes of the Act, are not liable for the negligence or misconduct of their officers.

The New Clyde Shipping Company brought an action before the Sheriff of Lanark against the River Clyde Trustees, in which they claimed "relief and reimbursement from the defenders, as trustees aforesaid," to the extent of £196. 16. 4., as the amount of loss sustained, and disbursement made in consequence of the listing of their steamer, the Alert, in the harbour of Broomielaw, and which listing was libelled to have been caused by the partial scooping out of the channel of the harbour by a dredging machine belonging to the defenders, and by the omission of the harbour-master "to order the necessary operations for removing the threatened danger," though urgently requested by the manager of the pursuers.

In support of the action the pursuers pleaded, that public bodies are responsible for the loss which may be sustained through their fault or negligence, or the fault or negligence of those employed by them.

The defenders pleaded, that persons who, under the authority of an Act of Parliament or otherwise, elect and pay public officers, are not responsible for the acts of their officers.

During the dependence of the action, the case of Duncan and Findlater was decided in the House of Lords, and on the authority of this case the Sheriff, on appeal from the Sheriff-substitute, who had decerned in terms of the libel, assolizied the defenders.

The pursuers having advocated, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"20th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this advocacy, with the revised cases, proof in the Inferior Court, and whole process, Finds that the advocates, under their libel in the Inferior Court, claim damages from the respondents, the Parliamentary Trustees for improving the navigation of the river and frith of Clyde, for damages sustained from the fault and omission of the defenders' harbour-master at the Broomielaw to provide safe harbourage for a vessel of the pursuers in August 1836, which, it is alleged, was placed in an unsafe and improper berth by the said harbour-master, whereby she listed or was upset in the harbour, and received damage to the extent of £196 in her cargo and hull: Finds, in point of fact, that it is established by the proof that the steam-boat, called the Alert, belonging to the pursuers, was moored in a berth of the Broomielaw harbour, selected or sanctioned by the harbour-master or other servant of the defenders, and that she had then a full cargo on board: Finds it proved that the damage in question arose from the unskilful and improper operations followed by the servants or workmen employed by the defenders in deepening the solum of the harbour next the said berth, whereby the vessel was laid on unequal ground at low water, and was exposed to be wholly or partially laid over on the return of the tide: Finds it proved, that from that cause the pursuers sustained damage at the date libelled on to the amount concluded for in the libel; but finds it not proved that that damage was in any respect caused by any personal misfeasance or culpa on the part of the defenders: Finds, in point of law, that the said proof is not sufficient to establish a claim against the defenders, or the trust-funds in their hands, which they are bound to appropriate in terms of the Statutes under which they act, and in no other way. On these grounds, approves of the interlocutors of the Sheriff-depute on the merits; but finds that, from the state of the law as understood and acted upon in Scotland under decisions of this Court in analogous cases for years previous to the institution of the present action, and down till the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Findlater, which was not pronounced till this process was in an advanced stage, it is not reasonable or just to subject the pursuers in any expenses; and of new assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the action; but recalls the Sheriff's interlocutor as to expenses, and finds no expenses hitherto incurred due by the pursuers, and decerns.

"Note.—The learned Sheriffs in the Court below pronounced opposite decisions in the present case; the Sheriff-substitute acting upon the law as understood in Scotland for a series of years prior to 1839, while the Sheriff-depute assolizied the defenders, holding the question as governed by the decision of the House of Lords in the well-known case of Duncan and Findlater, 23d August 1839. Robinson's Appeal Cases, Vol. I, p. 911.

"When the advocacy came to be discussed before the Lord Ordinary, it was stated by the advocates, that there were peculiarities sufficient to distinguish the present case from that of Duncan; and as the question has been before this Court since the decision of Duncan's case, in which the principles of that judgment, and the extent to which it falls to be applied, fell to be considered, the Lord Ordinary allowed parties to state their argument in cases. On considering the argument in these papers, however, he has not been able to satisfy himself that there are any grounds for giving a different determination in the present case from that which was decreed by the Court of last resort in the case of Duncan and Findlater.

"In the present case, as in Duncan's case, the defenders act solely as parliamentary trustees over the estate committed to their charge. That estate is held by them, not for private interest or profit, but solely for the benefit and use of the public. It is not alleged that the defenders personally were guilty of any wrong, either in the excavation of the harbour, or in the selection of the berth for the pursuers' vessel. In both cases the trustees have power to name overseers, and the defenders appointed a harbour-master, whose general qualification for that duty is not impeached; and in this case as well as in Duncan's, the trustees are very strictly limited by the terms of the Statute under which they act, in the appropriation of the rates received by them.

"These are circumstances common to both cases. In what then does the present case and that of Findlater differ? The main specialty relied on by the pursuers seems to be, that their damage is said to have arisen from a failure on the part of the defenders to fulfil the counterpart of the very contract under which the pursuers paid harbour-dues. They stated that they paid £2000 of such dues annually to the defenders,—that these were given for safe shelter, and if their property was negligently so placed by the defenders' servants as to suffer great damage, there was an implied stipulation on the part of the defenders to repair the loss. This certainly appears a strong view of the case, both on legal and equitable principles. But it is doubted if the very same argument was not equally maintainable in Findlater's case. The travellers on a road pay tolls for well-constructed and safe roads; some stage-coaches pay as large a sum of tolls as the pursuers pay here of harbour-dues, and it is now laid down, by authority not to be questioned, that if a coach is overturned when filled with passengers, whose lives are of the greatest value to their families, yet, if the injury has arisen from the negligence of subordinate persons whom trustees are authorised to employ, the sufferers must seek redress only from the wrong-doers, and not from the trustees or trust-funds. In such cases, where the funds are appropriated by Statute to specific purposes, and every other application of them prohibited, there is no implied contract which entitles any party to attach them for any damage or failure of duty committed by subordinate servants. The remedy is against the individuals who committed the wrong, and not against the trustees.

"This seems to be the import of all the cases in English practice, which are now held to be equally applicable to our law. According to the view taken of the law in Findlater's case in the House of Lords, it was held that the powers and liabilities of statutory trustees should in general be the same in both ends of the island; and as it was thought there was no practice in Scotland prior to 1820 which recognised the right of private parties to sue road trustees for damage not authorised or contemplated by any Statute, the House of Lords held that the responsibility and liability of trustees in this country must be governed by the same rules under which such trustees act and are protected in other parts of the kingdom, subject to the Statutes of the same Parliament. But if so, there appears to be a series of cases in England excluding the claim of private parties against public trustees in analogous cases with the present.

"Thus, in the case of Harris (4 Maule and Sel. Rep., p. 27), the trustees of a public road, who were empowered and directed to place lamps along a road at night, if they should think necessary, and to levy tolls to light and watch the same, and to make contracts for cleaning the road, were held not liable in an action on the case for an injury suffered by an individual in falling over a heap of scrapings negligently left on the road side without lights. Of course the ground of that decision was, that it was the contractors and not the trustees who were liable. In like manner, in the case of Hall (9 Moore, 226), it was found that a clerk to commissioners under a lighting and paving Act (who was sued as representing the commissioners), was not liable in damages for any injury occasioned by the negligence of artificers and labourers employed under their authority. While, on the other hand, the case of Jones (5 Bar. and Ald., 837), affords an example of a case where action was sustained against the operative bricklayers employed by commissioners of sewers for performing their work in such a manner as to occasion damage to a neighbouring house. Generally the rule of law seems to be firmly established in England, that no action lies against public functionaries personally for acts done by them in a corporate capacity, from which detriment happens to the plaintiff, at least not without proof of negligence.—Harman, 1 East, 555. These are rules of common law laid down after long and deliberate discussion in the English Courts, though apparently at variance with some of their earlier cases; and it is apprehended, from what passed in the House of Lords in Duncan's case, that their Lordships were of opinion, that there was no authority or practice in Scotland to preclude the Court from giving effect to the same principles in our law in favour of public trustees, as effectually founded on justice and public policy.

"There was only one ground on which it occurred to the Lord Ordinary that a plea of feasible relevancy might be set up for the pursuers. If it had been made out that the damage was sustained by operations on the bed of the harbour, apparently in the course of a permanent alteration and improvement of its construction,—as such operations cannot all be completed in one day or week, while in their unfinished state vessels frequenting the port must be exposed to certain hazards, which are unavoidable,—a question might arise whether the damage could not be claimed as part of the necessary expense of improving the harbour. But if that were a legitimate claim under this Act, it should have been brought in terms of the Act 6 Geo. IV., § 84, within twelve calendar months after 'the damage or injury were sustained.' The action here was not brought for nearly two years; and that of itself is fatal to any claim as against the trustees.—See Lord Oakley v. Kensington Canal Company, 5 Barn. and Ald., 138. Besides, the action is not laid on the ground now indicated, but on the ignorance or misfeasance of the harbour-master, for which the statutory trustees are now held not to be responsible."

The pursuers reclaimed, and prayed for a recal of the interlocutor, except in so far as it found no expenses due to the defenders, and advocated the cause. The defenders reclaimed against the findings in fact, and the refusal of their expenses.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Moir; Witherspoon and Mack, W.S., Agents.—Att. Anderson, Aytoun; J. C. Reddie, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

16th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 263.—JOHN CULLEN, Appellant, v. JAMES MACFARLANE, Respondent.

Bankrupt.—Sequestration.—Trustee, Claims to Vote for—

1. Where separate sequestrations were awarded of two firms carrying on business at different places, but in both of which the same individual was sole partner—Held, that but one and the same estate was to be disposed of in their sequestration.
2. Held unnecessary, under the new Bankrupt Act, that the accounts of creditors claiming to vote should be signed. & Acknowledgment of debt by the bankrupt on the eve of bankruptcy, and sworn to by creditors, not sustained as a good title to vote in the election of trustee.

Daniel Ritchie carried on business at Glasgow and Port-Glasgow under two distinct firms,—that at the former place being "Daniel Ritchie and Company," and that at the latter "The Crown Foundry Company." Having become bankrupt, he applied to the Court, and obtained separate sequestrations of the estates of the two firms, and in each of them of himself as sole partner. As the sequestrations thus awarded fell under the jurisdiction of different Sheriffs, separate meetings of the creditors were held at Glasgow and Greenock, at both of which John Cullen was appointed interim factor. Subsequently, a competition arose between him and James Macfarlane for the office of trustee, when the following leading objections, hinc inde, were taken to the votes of creditors:—1. That their affidavits did not bear that the debts were due by Daniel Ritchie and Company, or by the Crown Foundry Company, though these were the estates of which sequestration was awarded, but only by Daniel Ritchie, carrying on business under these firms. 2. That the accounts were not sufficiently referred to in the affidavits, and not properly authenticated as being the documents therein mentioned, by the subscriptions of the respective creditors,—the accounts being written on separate pieces of paper in noways attached to the affidavits. 3. That a number of the claims rested on acknowledgments forming a species of voucher not in the ordinary course of business, but evidently ex facie prepared in concert with the bankrupt for election purposes.

The first objection was sustained by the Sheriff-substitute of Lanark, and repelled by the Sheriff-substitute of Renfrew, but the second and third objections were repelled by the former, and sustained by the latter. The result was, that interlocutors were pronounced by both Sheriffs, declaring Mr Macfarlane duly elected trustee.

John Cullen presented two notes of appeal; and when the cause was advised, the Court, finding "that there is but one and the same estate to be disposed of in these sequestrations," repelled the first objection, and ordered minutes of debate on the others. The cause being again advised,

Lord President.—The leading objection here is, that the affidavits are not properly connected with the accounts. As to this, I am satisfied that the regulation laid down by the new Bankrupt Act is totally different from that of the former Act. The former provides for the production of the "grounds of debt, or a copy of the account signed by the party to whom it is due;" whereas the new Act merely provides for the production of, with the oath of "such accounts and vouchers as shall be necessary to prove" the debt. It therefore appears to me that this objection to the votes of Fleming and others is not good. It is not necessary that the accounts should have been signed, as under the former Act; and they seem sufficiently connected with the affidavits to satisfy the requirements of the new Act. The other class of objections is of a different nature. A person appears with a number of mandates from individuals claiming a right to vote as creditors, on acknowledgments of debt obtained from the bankrupt on the eve of bankruptcy, and several of them in favour of his near relations. Votes proceeding on such documents give rise to very strong suspicions; and my impression is, that they ought not to be admitted. On both of these objections, therefore, I think the merits rest with Mr Macfarlane. As to the first of them I have no doubt; but as to the second, I must confess I feel considerable difficulty.

Lord Gillies concurred.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur as to the first class of objections, and with great doubt also as to the second. The only documents sworn to and produced in connection with the oath are acknowledgments by the bankrupt. This is very awkward in itself, and the circumstances make it still more so. These acknowledgments were granted on the eve of bankruptcy, when, of course they ought to be considered as not made against the bankrupt himself, but against his creditors. They have completely the air of having been given for the purpose of affecting the election of trustee. The oath should have been taken—not to mere acknowledgments, but to accounts.

Lord Fullerton.—I have no doubt as to the first objection, which founds merely on the fact, that the accounts are not connected with the affidavits by signature. Under the new Act it is not necessary that they should be so connected. As to the other objection I have great difficulty, but concur. In one sense, an acknowledgment by the debtor seems a better proof of debt than an account not vouched; but it can hardly be said that such acknowledgment is the proper voucher in the sense of the Statute. The parties swear merely to the debtor's acknowledgment, and of course swear very safely; but to make the oath sufficient, they should have sworn to the account.

The Court found Mr Macfarlane entitled to the office of trustee, with expenses, and remitted to the Sheriff to confirm his election.

For Macfarlane, Mackenzie; Ritchie and Hill, W.S., Agents.
—For J. Cullen, Dean of Faculty (Wood), More; William Young, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

16th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 264.—JOHN MONCUR, and his Trustee ANDREW IMRIE, Petitioners, v. THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Respondents.

Bankrupt Statute, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 51.—Affidavit—Construction—Clause—Citation—Prescription—Where a creditor applied for sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor, and in the affidavit set forth his debt as due by various accounts, and that "the estates of the said" X "is still justly indebted and owing to this deponent the foresaid sum," "together also with interest, being the aggregate amount of principal sums due to the deponent, as contained in the said account-current," "and that no part of the said debt has been paid, or compensated, or extinguished in any manner of way, and that the deponent holds no security for the same, or any part thereof, except the several vouchers of debt enumerated and set forth in the foresaid inventory"—Held that that was not a proper compliance with the 9th section of the Bankrupt Statute, which provides, that the petitioning creditor shall, in his affidavit, state "what other persons (if any) are, besides the bankrupt, liable for the debt, or any part thereof, and specify any security which he holds over the estate of the bankrupt, or of other obligants, and depone that he holds no other obligants or securities than those specified; and where he holds no other person than the bankrupt so bound, and no security, he shall depone to that effect." Questions raised, whether a sequestration sleeps?—as to citing the next of kin besides the heir, and how obviated?—and as to the effect of prescription alleged to arise on the debt set forth in the affidavit?

The late David Scott, W.S., died in January 1839, indebted both to the Commercial Bank and also to the petitioner Moncur,—the latter of whom some time after presented an application to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, under the recent Bankrupt Act, to sequester his estates. On this application, which was presented more than seven months after the debtor's death, the Lord Ordinary granted the usual order to cite the debtor's successor, and this was done by citing Scott's heir-at-law, omitting the heirs in mobilibus.

The affidavit which Moncur lodged along with the application was in these terms:

"Compeared John Moncur, plumber and glazier in Edinburgh, who being solemnly sworn and examined, deposes, That the late David Scott, Esquire, writer to the Signet, and builder in Edinburgh, was, at the time of his death, justly indebted and owing to this deponent the sum of £671. 9. 2½. Sterling, being the aggregate amount of principal sums, and £182. 0. 5½. Sterling of perpetual interest at the rate of 5 per cent., on the various items of the said aggregate amount of principal sums, amounting together to the sum of £853. 9. 8. Sterling, conform to particulars thereof, as contained in an account-current between the said David Scott and the deponent, from the 31st day of December 1830, to the 22d day of January 1839; and conform also to the respective accounts and vouchers of debt referred to in said account-current, and as enumerated and set forth in an inventory thereof; both of which said account-current and inventory are signed by this deponent and the said Justice of the Peace, as relative hereto. Depones, That the said David Scott, according to the best of this deponent's knowledge, information, and belief, died upon the said 22d day of January 1839; and that at the time of his death he resided, or had a dwelling-house near Thurso, in the county of Caithness, and that he was, at the time, owner of heritable or moveable estates in Scotland. Depones, That the estates of the said David Scott is still justly indebted and owing to this deponent the foresaid sum of £853. 9s. 8d., together also with the lawful interest of the foresaid sum of £671. 9. 2½., being the aggregate amount of principal sums due to the deponent, as contained in the said account-current from and since the said 22d day of January 1839; and that no part of the said debt has been paid or compensated, or extinguished in any manner of way; and that the deponent holds no security for the same, or any part thereof, except the several vouchers of debt enumerated and set forth in the foresaid inventory, and referred to in said account. And all this is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God."

Moncur himself being thereafter pressed by diligence used by the respondents, applied for sequestration of his own estates, which was granted, and parties friendly to the interest of the bank were appointed the trustee and commissioners on the estate, while their usual law-agent acted as agent in the sequestration. The result was, that the application to sequester Scott's estate lay over for a great length of time, till at last Moncur's creditors changed the management, and appointed Imrie to act as trustee in room of the previous trustee, with orders to proceed with Scott's sequestration.

Imrie accordingly joined Moncur in an application to the Lord Ordinary to resume consideration of the original petition at Moncur's instance, and having observed that the affidavit previously lodged did not in words comply with the 9th section of the Statute, they gave in together a supplementary affidavit, with the view of complying with the strict reading of the section cited. The Lord Ordinary of new granted warrant to cite the successor, and this order was gazetted in the usual form. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was dated more than year and day from the date of the previous order for intimation.

In this stage of the proceedings the Commercial Bank,—who had had themselves confirmed executors-creditors to Scott prior to Moncur's application for Scott's sequestration, after the seven months from the death,—gave in a minute to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, objecting on several grounds to the granting of the application by Moncur and Imrie. The objections were:—1st, That Moncur's original application was asleep: 2d, That it had lapsed through mora: 3d, That the next of kin or executors had not been cited: 4th, That the affidavit did not comply with the requisites of the 9th section of the Statute; and 5th, That the debt was prescribed, for it appeared that more than three years had expired since the date of the last article in the account for furnishings referred to in the affidavit.

Parties were heard before the Lord Ordinary on these objections, the answers to which were in substance as follows:

(1.) Sequestrations never fall asleep like processes in the Outer-House, though not moved in for more than year and day, as they are Bill-Chamber proceedings, or, in other words, Inner-House processes, to which the rule, on which the objection was grounded, never applies: That in truth a sequestration is not so much a judicial process, though of course necessarily originating in Court, as a ministerial proceeding for the distribution of an estate, of which the great part is managed extrajudicially, and so the common rules of form do not apply. But, on the other hand, there was, besides, authority against the rule. By the Act of Sederunt, 8th July 1831, it was provided, that suspensions and advocations should fall asleep if not moved in within year and day. These were proper Bill-Chamber processes, and to them the rule was to apply; but nothing was said in regard to sequestrations, which were of course in the Bill-Chamber; and consequently, as they were excepted, it must be held that the rule as to them did not apply. Again, it showed that prior to the Act of Sederunt, no Bill-Chamber process fell asleep at all. Then there was an omission founded on a speciality in the case, that the Lord Ordinary having ordered intimation of new, subsequent to the year and day, the objection was obviated, as that had the effect of a waking; and parties were not entitled to look beyond the last order.

(2.) As to the process having fallen through mora, attributable to the petitioner, it was argued to be jus tertii for the bank to urge such objection. They themselves had obtained a control over Moncur's own sequestration and estate, and delayed to proceed—consequently it was their act, not that of the petitioner.

(3.) As to the executors not having been cited, it was argued—that the Act was not precise in its enactments, if it were meant that they should be called as well as the heir. The Act had clearly a distinction in view between a sequestration of a deceased debtor obtained with consent, and without consent. In the first of these cases, the Act (section 4) provided that the "successors" must concur;—in the other, that the "successor," used in the singular number, should be cited. It was true that section 3 provided, that words in the singular number were to be held as in the plural, where the noun was of the masculine gender; but here the noun might either be masculine or feminine; and therefore, that part of the enactment did not apply. Besides, section 3, in explaining the meaning of the term "successors," as importing heirs of the various descriptions known in law, used the plural number, and not the singular—consequently it was not clear that the heirs in mobiliis were to be called, where the application was without consent as here. Moreover, the objection, if well founded otherwise, was not a fatal objection, but merely required that the process should be sisted till the next of kin were called. But here the objection was cured in the present instance by the appearance in the cause of the bank as executors-creditors confirmed. Their confirmation gave them a preference to the whole moveables, and the confirmation set forth that there were no other moveables remaining than those confirmed, unless some which had been preferably secured by other creditors, but that those exhausted the estate: See also Alexander's Bankrupt Act, ed. 1842, p. 292, note.

(4.) In reference to this objection it was maintained—that a liberal construction must be given to the Act, and that it was sufficient if the clause were complied with in substance. The affidavit, it would not be doubted, complied with, and set forth the substance of the Act; for, as it said that the petitioner held no security, and nothing but the estates of the deceased liable for the debt, it followed of necessity, that by implication it also set forth very sufficiently that there was no obligant for the debt. It was admitted that it did not state the fact in words; but it was argued that a judicial construction could not be taken where the Act (section 3) provided, that it should be construed in the way most beneficial for promoting the ends in view. If there was any objection, it could not be said to be fatal to the affidavit and sequestration, but might be remedied by a supplemental affidavit, which had been given in with this view. Under the English procedure, such matters were permitted to be remedied by a supplementary affidavit. See ex parte Maughan, 1 Glyn and Jameson, p. 365. Archbold's Bankrupt Law, ed. 1840, pp. 77–82. Rolledge, 2 Rose, 369. Cooke's Bankrupt Law, ed. 1823. 1 Deacon's R. & P. p. 111. Duiken, 1 Montagu and Chitty, p. 73. It was also maintained that it was impossible to comply with the 9th section of the Statute. The affidavit clearly imported, from necessary implication, that there was no security or obligant, and nothing responsible for the debt but the debtor's estates. Therefore the objection came to this, that the affidavit was invalid because it did not set forth that the deponent held the deceased liable. Now, it was absurd to say that this was required to be done when the party was long dead. That could not with propriety be set forth; and accordingly, as it was set forth that the estates were only liable for the debt, and that there was no security, that was sufficient, as it appeared plainly that, in these circumstances, there could be no obligant liable for the same.

(5.) In regard to prescription it was pleaded, that all that was necessary at this stage, before sequestration was awarded, was to set forth a prima facie case of debt. The grounds of debt and their validity might afterwards, no doubt, undergo scrutiny, but the investigation was not competent at this stage. But prescription did not cut off a debt, except the long prescription. It shifted the onus of proof from one party to another, but still a debt might remain capable of being substantiated scripto vel juramento. The short prescription merely affected the nature of the proof. But the triennial prescription was not here applicable. The debts were due on contracts in missives for the supply of certain building materials for houses which Scott was then erecting, in which case the vicennial prescription at once applied. Besides, these contracts had been put in suit against Scott, and likewise against the Commercial Bank, as creditors holding heritable securities over these houses; and that action only terminated about the time of Scott's death, so that, even if the triennial prescription applied, the period had not elapsed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"24th June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this cause, and heard parties' procurators upon the objections to the sequestration stated by the Commercial Bank, and made avizandum: 1. Repels the objection that the process is asleep. 2. Repels also the objection that the process has fallen or lapsed through the petitioner's mora, or from his failure duly to carry on the same, or in any other manner. 3. Repels the objection that the petition was not served upon the next of kin, or other executors of the deceased,—in respect that the Commercial Bank, who, so far back as August 1839, obtained themselves confirmed executors-creditors in certain portions of the moveable estate, themselves set forth in their application to be so confirmed, that though 'there may be other subjects belonging to Mr Scott, yet, so far as they know, they have all been seized by the Crown or road trustees for one set of taxes or another, or taken possession of by individual creditors who had assignments or other rights thereto, or have been seized by the heritable creditors under poindings of the ground;' and—while the rights of the said bank, as well as of all such parties, are now secure, by more than seven months having elapsed after the deceased's death before any step was taken towards obtaining sequestration of his estates,—it is not alleged that there remained at the date of the application for sequestration any portion of the deceased's moveable succession in the possession of, or vested in, any person or persons whatsoever, which could have been carried by, or taken up under that application. 4. But sustains the objection, that, by the 9th section of the Statute, it is necessary, in order 'to entitle a creditor to petition, or concur in a petition for sequestration,' that he shall, inter alia, in his oath to the verity of the debt claimed by him, 'state what other persons (if any) are, besides the bankrupt, liable for the debt, or any part thereof, and specify any security which he holds over the estate of the bankrupt, or of other obligants, and depone that he holds no other obligants or securities than those specified; and where he holds no other person than the bankrupt so bound, and no security, he shall depone to that effect;'—whereas, this notwithstanding, the petitioning creditor in the present case has omitted or failed to depone that he holds no other person than the deceased, or the successor or successors immediately entitled to represent him in his estate, bound to him as said is: Therefore, dismisses the petition for sequestration, as not duly supported in terms of the Statute by said oath; reserving to the petitioning creditor, if so advised, to apply of new in a habile and regular manner: Finds it unnecessary, in this state of matters, to pronounce any deliverance on the remaining objection, that the petitioning creditor's debt was not habile to support the petition, in respect of its being prescribed: Finds no expenses hitherto incurred due to either party, and decrees.

"Note.—1. The objection which the Lord Ordinary has reluctantly sustained, turns upon matter of express statutory requirement; and looking to the very precise terms of the enactment, it seems as difficult to get the better of it, as it was under the former Statute to get over the kindred injunction, that, in certain cases, the securities held by the creditor should not only be valued, but that, on the face of the affidavit, this value should be expressly deducted, and the balance specified.—See 2 Bell Com., 340; Jeffrey, 20th January 1821; Murray, 22d June 1821. It was there held to afford no answer, that the affidavit had substantially complied with the law, by furnishing all the necessary data out of which to ascertain the claim. The words of the Statute were held imperative; and the Court did not consider that they were entitled to receive or entertain equipollents.

"As to the observation, that the word 'bankrupt' does not strictly apply to a deceased debtor, the Court have already refused so to narrow the construction of the Statute in the recent case of Lord Melville, (decided this session by the First Division).

"And the case of a deceased debtor being thus once brought within the scope of the regulation, there can, it is thought, be no difficulty in accommodating the words of the affidavit, so as to meet in spirit and substance the requirement of the Statute.

"2. The objection of prescription, had it been necessary to deal with it, the Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, would, with every deference for the contrary opinion expressed by Professor Bell (2 Com. 323 and 345, and Suppl. 46), have been disposed to overrule. The English practice in regard to debts struck at by the Statute of Limitations, furnishes no analogy. The principle which there rules is, that the debt itself is extinct, so as no longer to afford ground either for action at law or claim in equity; and accordingly such a debt in England is not even admitted to be proved (Dewdney, 15 Ves. 479). So also would it be with us, in regard to an obligation which stood peremptorily and finally cut off by the long negative prescription. But, in the shorter prescriptions, it is only the evidence of the debt that is affected, while the debt itself may remain; and accordingly, it may at any time be made the ground of action in our Courts. Indeed, Professor Bell himself admits, that a debt affected by the shorter prescriptions will afford a good ground of claim in the process of sequestration,—'this claim being,' as he adds, 'analogous to an action for the debt;' and not only so, but that such a debt will be good even to support sequestration itself, provided the debtor concur in the application. Now, such a concession seems fatal to the whole principle and ground of the objection. Besides, it is not necessary that the petitioning creditor's debt be constituted:—It is enough that it be capable of constitution. And, therefore, where no voucher has ever existed for the debt (2 Bell Com., 344-6),—or where the voucher has been lost and its tenor not yet proved (Ibid. 344),—or finally, where the voucher cannot be received or looked at from objection under the Stamp Acts (Geddes, 4th June 1824; 2 Sh. App. Ca., 250; 2 Glyn, 414),—still, if the debt itself exist, and be sworn to by the creditor, it will be good to support the application for sequestration. A debt struck at by the triennial prescription falls within the same category. For what is it but a debt, which, though there be no written voucher to prove, and in regard to which parole proof is no longer competent, is yet, to all intents, capable of being established by a third mode of proof equally familiar to our practice, viz., the admission or oath of the debtor. And if the debtor's concurrence in the petition for sequestration,—which is nothing but his voluntary admission,—would (according to Mr Bell) put an end to the objection, surely all opposition on his part, to the application, when made by a creditor, must be neutralised and fall to the ground, if he cannot avoid making a similar admission when the fact is put to him, or if, when the debt is referred to his oath, he finds himself constrained to affirm its existence.

"The Lord Ordinary may just observe in conclusion, that it is very doubtful whether there be here termini habiles for the plea of prescription. For (not to mention other matters noticed in the debate) it is stated by the Commercial Bank (minute, No. 57 of pro., p. 2) that 'Scott, before his death, had been convened in an action' for the debt;—and, as he died in January 1839, it is more than probable that the date of this action must have fallen within less than three years of the date of the last article of the account."

Both parties reclaimed; but as the fourth objection, sustained by the Lord Ordinary, was the leading and most important one, it alone was discussed, as—if adhered to by the Court—it superseded consideration of the remaining objections.

Lord Moncreiff.—I cannot get over the words of the 9th section, and accordingly I agree with the finding of the Lord Ordinary. The petitioner ought to have set forth that he held no obligant, as obligant is different from security.

Lord Medwyn concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk also concurred; and as the sustaining this objection superseded the others, it was unnecessary to consider them.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it dismisses the petition for sequestration as not duly supported in terms of the Statute by the oath of verity emitted by John Moncur, reserving to the petitioning creditor, if so advised, to apply of new in a habile and regular manner: Find it unnecessary, in this state of matters, to pronounce any deliverance on the other objections specified in the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the Commercial Bank of Scotland entitled to the expenses incurred by them since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Rutherford, G. Dingwall Fordyce; George Monro, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), J. S. More; J. A. Campbell, W.S., Agent.—R. Clerk.
—[G.D.F.]

16th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 265.—JOHN HENRY ALEXANDER, Suspender, v.
J. H. ANDERSON, Respondent.

Interdict—Suspension—Competency—10 Geo. II. c. 28; 43 Geo. III. c. 142—Theatrical Entertainment—Construction—By the 10th Geo. II. c. 28, all performances of every kind on the stage are prohibited every where, except within the city of Westminster and liberties, and the place where the Sovereign is personally residing for the time; and, in consequence of the Statute, it has been customary to pass an act in Parliament for posting any locality with the privileges of a theatre. By the 43d Geo. III. c. 142, such an Act was passed repealing the previous Act, so far as it extended to Glasgow, and granting to the Sovereign liberty to establish a theatre in Glasgow and suburbs. Letters-patent were issued thereafter in favour of certain persons, granting to them "power, license and authority for collecting, receiving, forming, managing, having and holding a company of comedians for performing and acting such tragedies, plays, comedies, operas, and other entertainments of the stage only as have already been permitted by our Chamberlain, or may hereafter be permitted." And full and exclusive power, license and authority, was also given by the letters-patent "for permitting such persons" "to perform plays and entertainments of the stage, of every description, in peace and quietness, without blame or impediment of any person—Held, that the lessee under the patent was entitled to an interdict, to the effect of preventing a party enacting within the city of Glasgow or suburbs, all tragedies, comedies, operas, plays, farces, interludes, melo-dramas, burlettas, and all other entertainments of the stage of any description whatever, whether the same were licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or not, or any part or parts thereof.

Lis Alibi—Process—Expenses—Interdict—A party presented an application to the Sheriff for interdict. The respondent, who had lodged a caveat, and the complainer, were heard on the application for interim interdict. The Sheriff refused interim interdict, but ordered service of the application on the respondent, and answers in fourteen days. The complainer then applied to the Court of Session for an interdict in very nearly the same terms, and thereafter, by a note on the Inferior Court process, stated that he had abandoned that process, reserving all other remedies, but tendered no expenses—Held that this was no bar, as a lis alibi, against insisting in the application for interdict in the Court of Session.

The complainer, who is lessee of the Theatre Royal of Glasgow, presented this application (on caution) against the respondent, as designing himself of the minor theatre there, praying their Lordships to interdict and prohibit the respondent from representing and enacting the performances now to be referred to.

By the 10th Geo. II. c. 28,—entitled an Act to explain and amend so much of an Act made in the twelfth year of the reign of Queen Anne, entitled, "an Act for reducing the laws relating to rogues, vagabonds, sturdy beggars, and vagrants, into one Act of Parliament; and for the more effectual punishing such rogues, vagabonds, sturdy beggars, and vagrants, and sending them whither they ought to be sent," as relates to common players of interludes,—various provisions were made in regard to the stage.

The first and second sections imposed certain penalties on all who should perform any entertainments of the stage "without authority, by virtue of letters-patent, from his Majesty, his heirs, successors, or predecessors, or without license from the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household for the time being;" and specially referred to persons committing the offence who had no legal settlement in the place where the offence was committed; and it was provided, that they should be held as rogues and vagabonds under the 12th of Queen Anne, stat. 2, chap. 23, and punished as such; and the second section declared, that all persons offending against the Act, whether having a legal settlement in the place or not, should pay a penalty of £50 for each offence.

By the 3d section it is provided:

"That from and after the said 24th day of June 1737, no person shall, for hire, gain, or reward, act, perform, represent, or cause to be acted, performed, or represented, any new interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, or any new act, scene, or other part added to any old interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any new prologue or epilogue, unless a true copy thereof be sent to the Lord Chamberlain of the King's household for the time being, fourteen days at least before the acting, representing or performing thereof, together with an account of the playhouse, or other place where the same shall be, and the time when the same is intended to be first acted, represented, or performed, signed by the master or manager, or one of the masters or managers of such playhouse, or place, or company of actors therein."

The 4th section enforced this provision by declaring a penalty of £50 on offenders, and vested the Lord Chamberlain with a power of prohibiting all unlicensed plays.

The 5th section, upon which the present discussion in some measure hinged, is in the following terms. It is enacted,

"That no person or persons shall be authorised, by virtue of any letters-patent from his Majesty, his heirs, successors, or predecessors sors, or by the license of the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household for the time being, to act, represent, or perform for hire, gain, or reward, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, in any part of Great Britain, except in the city of Westminster, and within the liberties thereof, and in such places as his Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall in their royal persons reside, and during such residence only, any thing in this Act contained to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

By this Statute, accordingly, it was illegal, even with the license of the Sovereign or letters-patent, to enact any performance on the stage, except within the city of Westminster and liberties, and the place where the Sovereign might be residing in person for the time,—a special Statute being necessary for the passing of letters-patent, in order to extend the privileges of a theatre to any particular locality.

In 1803, an Act (43 Geo. III. c. 142,) was passed, entitled "an Act to enable his Majesty to grant letters-patent for establishing a theatre under certain restrictions in the city of Glasgow. On the preamble, that "whereas a licensed playhouse in the city of Glasgow would be of convenience to the said city, and to persons resorting there," it enacted,

"that so much of an Act of Parliament which passed in the tenth year of his late Majesty's reign, entitled, 'an Act to explain and amend so much of an Act made in the twelfth year of the reign of Queen Anne, entitled an Act for reducing the laws relating to rogues, vagabonds, sturdy beggars, and vagrants, and sending them whither they ought to be sent,' as relates to common players of interludes, whereby all persons are discharged to represent any entertainments of the stage whatever, in virtue of letters-patent from his Majesty, or by license of the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household for the time being, except within the liberties of Westminster, or where his Majesty is residing for the time being, be, and the same is hereby repealed, so far as the same respects the city of Glasgow, suburbs, or neighbourhood thereof, and that it shall and may be lawful to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, to grant letters-patent for establishing a theatre or playhouse in the city of Glasgow, suburbs, or neighbourhood thereof, subject to such restrictions as to the number of persons to be interested therein, and in the profits thereof, and with such privileges, and under such provisions and regulations, for the due and orderly conducting and managing the same, as to his Majesty shall seem fit." "Provided always, and be it enacted, That the said theatre or playhouse, and management thereof, shall be under and subject to the control and inspection of the Lord Provost, Bailies, Dean of Guild, and Deacon-Convener of the Trades of the city of Glasgow, and of the Sheriff-depute of the county of Lanark for the time being."

In virtue of this Act, his Majesty granted letters-patent to Mr Macdowall of Garthland; and Mr Alexander of Southbar, afterwards assigned to the committee of a joint stock company, which erected a Theatre Royal in Queen Street. This theatre was destroyed by fire in 1829; and with the view of carrying on theatrical entertainments in another part of the town, new letters-patent were granted in the year 1830. These letters were granted in favour of Mr Campbell of Blythswood and Mr Monteith of Carstairs, in trust for the purposes of the patent; and the letters conveyed to these gentlemen and the survivor or their assignees,

"for and during the full term and period following, viz., to commence at the date of these presents, and to terminate on the 24th day of June 1847, being the time to which the letters-patent hereby recalled were limited, full and exclusive power, license, and authority, for collecting, receiving, forming, managing, having and holding a company of comedians in our service, for performing and acting such tragedies, plays, comedies, operas, and other entertainments of the stage only as have already been permitted by our Chamberlain, or may hereafter be permitted, within any theatre, built or to be built in any fit place in the city of Glasgow, its suburbs or neighbourhood, in place of the other recently destroyed, during the said period."

It was also declared, that

"We, by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, grant to the said Archibald Campbell and Henry Monteith, and their survivor, and their or his said assignees, full and exclusive power, license and authority, for permitting such persons, during the pleasure of the said Archibald Campbell and Henry Monteith, and their survivor, and their or his assignees aforesaid, from time to time, to perform plays and entertainments of the stage, of every description, in peace and quietness, without blame or impediment of any person or persons whatsoever, for the pure gratification of such as desire to witness the same. Nevertheless, under the regulations hereinafter recited, and such others as the said Archibald Campbell and Henry Monteith, and their survivor, and their or his said assignees, shall, from time to time, consider, in their wisdom, to be reasonable and necessary for our service."

On obtaining these letters-patent, the grantees assigned them to Messrs Monteith, Maxwell, and others, the proprietors of the old theatre in Queen Street, agreeably to a provision in the patent so limiting their power of assignment. A power was given by the patent to grant leases of the privileges thereby given, provided they should not be of longer duration than five years, and with a certain limitation on the amount of rent to be demanded. Under this provision the suspender, Mr Alexander, became the lessee of the letters-patent. He paid for his lease a price or grassum of £1050, and pays besides a nominal yearly rent.

The respondent had lately fitted up, as alleged by the complainer, a large wooden building, formerly occupied as a circus, fronting the Green, as a place of public amusement or theatre, with stage, side wings, scenery, orchestra, and other appurtenances of a theatre, with accommodation for an audience of 800 to 1000 persons, in which, by the aid of a large company, he represented, or caused to be represented, entertainments of an essentially dramatic character, such as are acted on the stage, composed of a dialogue, &c., continuous story or plot,—such as "The Dumb Orphan of Genoa, or The Bandit Merchant,"—"The Idiot Witness, or A Tale of Blood,"—"Gilderoy, or The Farmer and His Herd,"—which were performed on certain evenings condescended on, and admitted by the respondent, and that he carefully "excluded from his performances all such theatrical entertainments as have been licensed by the Lord Chamberlain."

Against these performances, &c., as infringing his patent right, and directly invading his patrimonial interests in the Theatre Royal, on which he had expended, as alleged, upwards of £21,000, the complainer presented this note of suspension, on offer of caution, praying the Court

"to suspend the proceedings complained of, and to interdict, prohibit and discharge the said respondent, and all others representing him, or acting by or under his authority, or otherwise, from acting, representing or performing, or causing to be acted, represented or performed, at the place mentioned in the said statement of facts, or any other place in the city of Glasgow, or in the suburbs or neighbourhood thereof, all tragedies, comedies, operas, plays, farces, interludes, melo-dramas, burlettas, and all other entertainments of the stage of any description whatsoever, whether the same have been licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or not, or any part or parts thereof; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

The respondent objected to the interdict as craved; and while he admitted that his exhibitions consisted of exhibitions of mechanical skill, scientific experiments, and such burlettas, ballets, and melo-dramas as were not licensed by the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household, he stated that he always studiously excluded from his performances all such theatrical entertainments as had been licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, and included in the letters-patent.

In reference to what he contended were the privileges granted to the complainer, the respondent averred they were limited to "such tragedies, plays, operas, and other performances of the stage only as have already been, or shall hereafter be, licensed by the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household." That neither the patentees of the theatre in Glasgow nor the suspender, as their lessee, ever obtained any exclusive privilege from the Crown of acting or performing in Glasgow or elsewhere, such performances of any description as should not be licensed by the said Lord Chamberlain; and that according to the usage which had followed upon the Statute 43d Geo. III. c. 142, and the letters-patent, the exclusive privilege granted to the patentees had not been held to include such burlettas, ballets, melo-dramas, and similar entertainments as were not licensed by the Lord Chamberlain; and the same had been performed at minor theatres established from time to time in Glasgow, notwithstanding the existence of such patents. Such entertainments, as burlettas, ballets, and melo-dramas, were comparatively of modern invention. They were unknown at the date of the Statute of the 10th Geo. II., and were and had been in constant use of being performed at minor theatres every where throughout Great Britain, although such minor theatres were not established by letters-patent.

In support of the interdict the suspender maintained, under the letters-patent, that he had the exclusive right of performing all dramatic entertainments, of every sort whatever, within the city of Glasgow;—that the circumstance of the plays being unlicensed—a circumstance which involved an infringement on public police, as well as private property,—could afford the respondent no defence, but was, on the contrary, an additional reason for the interdict; and that the complainer's patrimonial interests being directly injured by the proceedings of the respondent in acting unlicensed plays, he was entitled to have the respondent interdicted from doing unlawfully that which the complainer had the exclusive right to do lawfully.

In regard to the 10th Geo. II. c. 28, &c., the suspender maintained—That all persons were interdicted and prohibited from performing dramatic entertainments of any kind whatever within the city of Glasgow, except in so far as permitted by the Statute, or other special Acts; and the respondent not possessing any legal authority to act any thing of the kind whatever, the complainer was entitled to have him interdicted from performing all dramatic entertainments, without distinction. And the respondent was not entitled to have any exception made from the interdict of unlicensed dramatic pieces, inasmuch as, (1.) The statutory prohibition applied to all dramatic performances whatever, without distinction; and, (2.) The respondent was not entitled to ask the Court, directly or indirectly, to protect or sanction unlicensed dramatic performances.

On the other hand, the respondent maintained, and his pleas resolved into this general argument—That as the suspender, by his patent, was limited to the performance of such plays as should be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, it was only as to such plays that he was entitled to obtain protection by interdict. The respondent, it was admitted, might subject himself to pains and penalties at the instance of the public prosecutor; but still, while admitting that, it could form no competent ground to the complainer in support of the application, as it was jus tertii to him to found on it, being a ground only open to the public prosecutor; neither had he any title or interest to ask the interdict, on the medium of being indirectly affected by the performances of the respondent; because, as he was only entitled to an interdict against the employment of licensed pieces, he could not competently ask an interdict against a party doing that which he himself had no right, title, or interest himself to do.

The Lord Ordinary (Ivory) passed the note, and granted interdict ad interim,

"to the effect of prohibiting the performance of all interludes, tragedies, comedies, operas, plays, farces, including melo-dramas and burlettas, and all other entertainments of the stage whatsoever, or any part or parts thereof, unlicensed as well as licensed, which require to be submitted to the Lord Chamberlain for his license."

The following note was appended to the interlocutor:

"The Lord Ordinary has, with the respondent's consent, granted interdict ad interim in the broadest terms for which he can find a precedent, having adopted, in fact, the very words of the judgment in Hamilton v. Alexander, 14th February and 15th November 1827.

"He has great doubts whether the complainer is in any view entitled to more. The present application being laid solely on the title and interest arising by force of the exclusive privilege conferred by the patent or license, it does not occur that the complainer can insist for any thing beyond an interdict which shall protect him in the exercise of that which his license expressly covers. It was well argued for the respondent, that as the complainer could not insist for interdict against one performing plays beyond the territory of his privilege, so neither can he do so against performances which do not fall within the range of the subject of his privilege. It is nothing that consequently his interests may suffer. An indirect prejudice of this kind, from acts in respect to which there is no exclusive privilege conferred, has never been considered as constituting encroachment or invasion of the privilege in a legal sense. One who has an exclusive privilege to manufacture woollen cloths, would not, by the mere force of that privilege, be entitled to interdict another in the manufacture of cottons, how illegally soever the latter might be proceeding in his own department, or however much prejudice might indirectly and consequentially arise in competition from the markets being occupied by an additional commodity.

"It is a different matter whether, in respect of the illegality of the acts done, the complainer may not protect himself, independently of his exclusive privilege, through the medium of the Statute which declares those acts illegal, or in other words, by the enforcement against the wrong-doers of the statutory pains and penalties. But in such a case the Statute alone must be the source as well as the measure of redress. Where, indeed, the act done is not only an offence against the law, but also an innovation of the privilege, there would of course be open to the complainer a double remedy—(University of Glasgow, 3d Vol. XIV.—No. XXXVIII.

March 1837). But where the act complained of amounts only to the statutory offence, without at the same time constituting an invasion of the privilege, the Lord Ordinary does not see how the statutory illegality can on principle enlarge the operation of the privilege, or extend the patrimonial title and interest under the license. Nor does the opinion delivered by Lord Glenlee in Siddons, 24th February 1825, appear, when properly read, to lead to such a result. The objection which his Lordship was there dealing with was one of a totally different kind from that in support of which his opinion has been here cited. It was, that Mrs Siddons's license did not confer exclusive privilege, but merely operated to the effect of relieving herself from the statutory penalties imposed on those who act without license; and hence, that she had 'no title to apply for interdict at all,' even within the class of performances to which the license reached. The answer was, that the patent did 'vest her with an exclusive privilege, and every person was entitled to interdict others from doing any illegal act whereby an injury was suffered in the exercise of a lawful act;'—still, however, assuming that the illegal act was within the scope and operation of the license—and to this plea, in the sense in which it was thus submitted, Lord Glenlee gave his sanction, but he does not appear to have done so in any other or more extended sense. That his Lordship did not mean to lay down the general proposition, that whether the illegal act did or did not fall within the scope of Mrs Siddons's patent, she was entitled to an interdict against it in respect of its mere illegality, is apparent from the concluding passage of his opinion. Nothing of the kind was indeed necessary for the disposal of the only matter then competently before the Court.

"Be this, however, as it may, the Lord Ordinary is not prepared, in the present stage at least, to grant a broader interdict than he has done. Such an interdict appears to have been expressly refused by Lord Hermand in 1818; and from any thing said in Mrs Siddons's case, it would seem that Lord Glenlee and the Court did not call in question that decision. The interdict asked by Mrs Siddons in 1825 was expressly limited to licensed plays. That granted in Hamilton, supra, was confined to such as required license. Nor was the older interdict in Jackson, 26th February 1793, Dict. 10,611, conceived in a different spirit.

"On the whole, therefore, in so far as the complainer insists for interdict against performances which do not 'require to be submitted to the Lord Chamberlain for his license,' it has been thought best to go no farther at present than to pass the note, and leave the question to be deliberately tried in an ulterior stage.

"The objection of lis pendens the Lord Ordinary understands to have been given up, at all events, as a bar to passing the note, by the respondent's consent that an interdict should go out to the limited effect for which it has now been granted. In any view, the Lord Ordinary should not have felt disposed to deal definitively with it to the effect of refusing the note as incompetent, without hearing farther on the subject. He has therefore passed the note, holding the case to remain open on this point as on the rest. Of course the objection of lis pendens may be renewed by the respondent, if so advised, when the note, as now passed, comes to be discussed."

Afterwards, a record was made up, and mutual cases ordered.

In the record the respondent stated a plea of lis alibi as a bar to the application for interdict. It appeared that the complainer had presented an application to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for an interdict against the respondent, in terms almost similar to the present. The respondent, who had previously lodged a caveat with the Sheriff-clerk, craving to be heard in case of any such application, entered appearance to the application. Parties were heard thereon, when the Sheriff issued a note as to the interim interdict craved, in which he found that the complainer had not instructed such a prima facie case as to warrant the granting of the interim interdict. His Lordship, however, reserved the whole pleas of parties, and appointed service of the application, meantime, on the respondent, and answers within fourteen days. The petition was, however, never served. In this state of matters, the application for interdict was made in this Court, and after that the complainer inserted a note on the Inferior Court record, stating that he had abandoned that process, but reserved other proceedings. No expenses were tendered to the respondent, and there was no interlocutor interponing authority to the abandonment.

In reporting the cause to the Inner-House, the Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame, stated his opinion in the following note:

"This case was heard before Lord Murray last winter, and it is understood his Lordship's view was to report it to the Court. The Lord Ordinary concurs in the propriety of that course, as questions are involved in it which have been formerly the subject of much discussion before the Court.

"The suspender and complainer, Mr Alexander, is the lessee under the patentees of the Theatre Royal in Glasgow, who had a patent, granted under a special Act of Parliament, for erecting a theatre in Glasgow (42d Geo. III.) to act 'such tragedies, plays, comedies, operas, and other entertainments of the stage only as have already been permitted by our Chamberlain, or may hereafter be permitted,' &c. &c. &c. The respondent, Anderson, again, is the lessee or occupant of a place of public amusement, called a minor theatre, opened near the Green of Glasgow, for the performance of pantomimes, comic operas, and other similar exhibitions, got up at a small cost to entertain the humbler class of society.

"The suspender, the lessee of the regular theatre, pleads, that under his letters-patent, he not only has the exclusive privilege of all dramatic performances in Glasgow, but also that he has a legitimate title and interest to apply to this Court to enforce the Act of 10th Geo. II. cap. 28, by interdicting all entertainments of the stage attempted to be got up by the respondent, or any other party, in violation of that Act.

"On the part of the respondent, again, a plea was at one time indicated, that the Act of 10th Geo. II. was repealed in toto as to the city of Glasgow, and that, by the phraseology of the Act 43d Geo. III., it could not be enforced within any part of that royalty. That plea does not seem to be now insisted on. It is plain from the whole provisions of the Act 43d Geo. III., taken together (though undoubtedly it is framed with great looseness and inaccuracy), that the meaning of the Legislature was simply to authorise his Majesty to grant a patent for opening one theatre in Glasgow for the representation of licensed dramatic performances, and with that intent, and to that effect, only to repeal the Act of 10th Geo. II., while manifestly the Statute was to be in force quoad ultra against the erection of other theatres. In any other view, and particularly if the Act 10th Geo. II. had been repealed in omnibus as to Glasgow, the limitation of the Sovereign's right to license one theatre only in that place would have been unnecessary and absurd.

"The respondent's chief plea, however, seems to come to this, that he in no respect violates the suspender's patent. The right of that party, it is said, extends only to the legitimate drama, or to such entertainments of the stage as the Lord Chamberlain (acting under the 10th of Geo. II.) shall permit; but that he (the respondent) does not exhibit any such performances, but confines himself exclusively to unlicensed dramas, or to such representations as do not require a license.

"With respect to the first of these pleas, the Lord Ordinary must own that he extremely doubts its relevancy. He apprehends that it is not in any party's mouth to allege that he exhibits entertainments forbid by Statute; and it seems equally clear, that the suspender has a good title and interest to apply for an interdict against any deliberate violation of the Statute by the respondent or any other parties. It is apprehended that his monopoly includes all dramatic performances and entertainments of the stage which the law allows to be exhibited in this country. The patent, no doubt, is so expressed as to comprehend those entertainments permitted, or that may be permitted by the Lord Chamberlain, but it was necessarily implied in such a grant, that no other party shall be allowed to exhibit, either licensed performances, or, a fortiori, entertainments of the stage unlicensed, within the bounds of the patentee's right.

"Accordingly, this was very clearly and forcibly laid down by Lord Glenlee in the case of Mrs Siddons v. Ryder, in 1825 (3 Shaw, 576), when his Lordship delivered an opinion partially quoted in these papers; but the whole of which well deserves perusal in the present question. It is true that the Court, in that case, only interdicted Ryder from performing licensed dramas, because no more was asked; and that case did not go further than the Bill-Chamber. But it is manifest that the opinion of the learned and eminent Judge referred to, went the full length of the interdict now claimed by the suspender.

"Accordingly, it is thought that there is not a little inconsistency in the course taken by the respondent in the present case. While maintaining strenuously the argument now advanced to, be, towards the close of his paper, expresses his assent to the interdict which Lord Ivory granted in the Bill-Chamber. By that interdict the respondent was prohibited from the performance of 'all interludes, tragedies, comedies, operas, plays, &c. &c., and all other entertainments of the stage, &c., unlicensed as well as licensed, which require to be submitted to the Lord Chamberlain for his license.'

"It is possible that the interdict, in the preceding terms, properly enforced by the Judge Ordinary on the spot, might be sufficient for the protection of the suspender's right. At the same time, as the Act of 10th Geo. II. prohibits all entertainments of the stage from being performed which are not licensed, it is possible that some evasion of the Act, and of the suspender's privilege, may be successfully practised, if it has not been the usage to submit to the Lord Chamberlain every class of stage entertainments which fall within the Statute. Thus, it is not known whether it may have been customary for the Lord Chamberlain to license pantomimes, melo-dramas, ballets and similar entertainments. But whether it has been so or not, it seems to be held in sundry English cases quoted, that such performances fall within the entertainments of the stage prohibited by the Act 10th of Geo. II.

"The cases tried in the English Courts are obviously precedents of weight in the consideration of this British Statute in Scotland. At the same time it deserves remark, that the cases relative to houses of public entertainment in London often depend on another Statute (25th Geo. II. cap. 36, relative to dancing and music rooms), which is exclusively applicable to London and Westminster, and can throw no light on the present question.

"Keeping these considerations in view, it is for the Court to consider whether it would not be proper, both in reference to the rights of the suspender, and to obviate future expense and litigation, to make the interdict, if possible, more special and precise than it is under the interlocutor in the Bill-Chamber. The respondent admits, in the outset of his paper, that he exhibits in his theatre 'burlettas, ballets and melo-dramas.' It is for the Court to judge whether these are not entertainments of the stage in the sense of 10th Geo. II. It will also be considered by the Court if the programmes circulated by the respondent (vide appendix to suspender's case, pp. 52, 53), of the pantomimes, melo-dramas and other pieces brought out at his theatre, should not have been licensed by the Lord Chamberlain. Both parties have been very sparing of their information as to the practice followed in the Chamberlain's Office as to such pieces, which is remarkable in a class of cases litigated so often and so keenly as that now under discussion. But if necessary, the Court can order additional information to be furnished as to the practice of the English theatres in this matter."

At advising, the Court unanimously considered that the plea of lis alibi was untenable. There had been no service, and consequently there never was a process, properly speaking, in the Inferior Court. In regard to the merits, their Lordships held that the 10th Geo. II. was not repealed, and coincided in the views indicated by the Lord Ordinary; and accordingly,

"Suspend the proceedings complained of, and grant interdict as craved, and decern: Find the suspender entitled to the expenses incurred by him; appoint an account," &c.

Suspender's Authority.—Laidlaw v. Smith, 8th March 1834; Shaw, XII. 538.

Respondent's Authorities.—Chitty's Treatise on the Prerogatives, p. 391. Webster's Law and Practice of Patents, p. 85. Tailors of Perth v. Lyon and Others, 10th December 1756; Mor. 1947. Syme v. Steel, 10th August 1765; Mor. 14,979. Darby, 10th February 1796; Mor. 7907. University of Glasgow v. the Physicians of Glasgow, 3d March 1837; 15 Shaw, p. 736. Siddons v. Ryder, 24th February 1825; 3 Shaw, 397. King v. Handy, 6 Durnford and East, p. 286.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Penney; A. Hamilton, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), J. Inglis; Handyside and Wilson, W.S., Agents.—Beveridge, Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

16th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 266.—ARCHIBALD WATT, Suspender, v. WILLIAM KNOX, Charger.

Process.—Poor.—Assessment.—Consuetude.—Suspension.—According to use and wont for a length of time, poors' assessment had been levied on certain lands, as situated within the parish of St Ninians, but on an action for payment of the assessment of a particular year, the proprietor of the subjects pleaded that the action ought to be dismissed, on the ground that the subjects were situated within the parish of Stirling, and so not liable for the assessment. After a proof as to the situs of the lands, the Sheriff substitute dismissed the action, but the Sheriff, proceeding on the usage as to the mode of assessment, the proof of which he held to be complete, and enough for the decision of the case, reversed that finding, and decerned for the assessment and expenses of process.—Held that suspension was a competent mode of review of the Sheriff's judgment; but opinion indicated, that the main question as to the situs of the lands, and consequent liability to a particular parish, could only be raised by declarator.

Knox, who is collector of poors' money for the parish of St Ninians, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Stirlingshire against the suspender, who is factor for Spittal's Hospital in Stirling, for payment of £2. 6s. 3d. as the amount of poors' rates for the period from Whitsunday 1836 to Whitsunday 1837, alleged to be due by the hospital for their lands of Southfield, as situated within the parish of St Ninians. Along with the summons there was lodged a certificate under the hands of the minister of that parish, to the effect that the sum claimed was the "quota assessed upon the lands of Southfield, in this parish, belonging to the said hospital." In defence it was pleaded, that the action could not be maintained, because, as alleged, the lands in question were not situated in the parish of St Ninians, but lay within the parish of Stirling; in support of which averment, reference was, inter alia, made to a variety of the steps of the progress of the titles, in virtue of which the hospital came into possession of the lands, and which distinctly set forth, as alleged, the fact as stated by the suspender. On the other hand, the collector averred that the lands were situated within the parish of St Ninians, or were so reputed from time immemorial, and had invariably been assessed upon as in that parish, and had accordingly paid, without challenge, till the institution of the present action, the poors' assessment, schoolmaster's salary, and the other usual parish burdens—as exigible from these lands—as being locally situated within the parish.

This was admitted, but it was averred that the payments had been made in error. It was also set forth by the collector, that from time immemorial the hospital had exercised and enjoyed the rights and powers of heritors in the parish of St Ninians in respect of these lands; and that they had been in the habit, from time to time, of attending and acting at meetings of heritors. The hospital also possessed seats in the church, and burying-ground in the churchyard of St Ninians, in virtue of an allocation to them as heritors.

The hospital was alleged to have been instituted for charitable purposes, in support of which the lands in question had been disposed to the trustees in 1684 by the Crown "pro usu et utilitate pauperum," but a portion of the subjects had been feued out, and the revenue of the hospital consisted for the most part of feu-duties.

The Sheriff-substitute having allowed a proof to both parties of their respective averments, pronounced this interlocutor:

"Stirling, 31st January 1840.—Having considered the proofs of parties, productions, and whole case.—Finds that the pursuer has proved seats have been set apart for the lands of Southfield in the parish church of St Ninians, and the defender's constituents have derived a revenue therefrom, and that they still do so: Finds that the defender has not proved that the lands in question have been localled on, or that he has paid stipend therefor to the minister of Stirling, as averred in article ninth of his revised condescendence; but finds it proved that the lands in question are situated in the parish of Stirling, and cannot therefore be subjected in payment of poors' rate to the parish of St Ninians: Therefore, assolvies the defender from the conclusions of the action; dismisses the same, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in the dues of extracting and recording this decret, but finds no other expenses due, and decerns."

(Signed) "Jo. HAY."

On an appeal, the Sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Stirling, 5th February 1841.—The Sheriff having considered the appeal for the pursuer, and advised the whole process —the Sheriff-substitute, as advised by the Sheriff, sustains the appeal, alters the interlocutors appealed from, repels the defences, decerns against the defender, as factor for Spittal's Hospital, for the sums concluded for in the libel: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses of process; allows an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor of Court to tax the same, and report."

(Signed) "Jo. HAY."

"Note.—Without going into the question of whether the Sheriff's duty, as pleaded by the pursuer, is merely ministerial, and not judicial, in questions of payment of assessment for poors' rates, the Sheriff is of opinion that the usage of rating lands in a particular parish affords a sufficient ground for the Sheriff de plano decerning for the assessment laid on by the heritors. In this case the usage is unquestionable, extending from the present time as far back as can be traced, and not confined to assessments for the poor, but extending to all parochial burdens. Besides, there are the facts, 1. That the privilege of sittings in the parish church were, so long ago as in 1751, allotted to the lands assessed. 2. That these sittings have been let, and the rents drawn by the factor for the hospital, having the right of property in the lands assessed. 3. That a portion of the new kirk-yard was, at its foundation a great number of years ago, allotted to the lands assessed. In addition, there is the total failure to show, as averred by the defender, that the lands assessed have ever paid stipend or any parochial burdens to the parish of Stirling. These circumstances appear to the Sheriff amply sufficient to entitle the pursuer both to decree for the assessment imposed, and to vindicate the right of the heritors and kirk-session of St Ninians to continue to assess the lands of Southfield until the hospital shall, by a regular process, establish their exemption from payment in future of parochial burdens to that parish.

"The Sheriff will indicate no opinion of his own on the comparative value of the evidence hitherto brought by the parties to prove in which of the two parishes the lands of Southfield are situated. But the shape which this case, originating as it did in the Small-Debt Court, has taken by the proof allowed, though before answer, of the particular parish in which the lands lie, made the present Sheriff devote to the case a very deliberate and anxious consideration before giving effect to the views he entertained of the proper and limited question for his disposal in it. The expense of process must, under the circumstances, of course fall on the defender."

The expenses were modified to the sum of £31. 1s. On a charge being threatened for the same, as well as the original assessment, a suspension was presented on caution, and on the following pleas:—1. As the action by the respondent had for its object to constitute a liability against the complainer, on the ground that the lands were locally situated within the parish of St Ninians, it was incumbent on the Sheriff to give judgment on the evidence as to whether the lands were situated within the parish of St Ninians or not. 2. It was not competent under the Acts of Parliament to assess lands situated in one parish for poors' rates payable in another parish; and it having been proved that the lands in question were situated, not in the parish of St Ninians, but in the parish of Stirling, it was not competent for the heritors to assess these lands, nor was it competent for the Sheriff to give effect to the illegal and incompetent assessment made by the heritors. 3. The alleged usage of payment was not warranted by the Acts of Parliament as a ground for levying poors' rates in respect of lands not situated in the parish, and it was therefore incompetent for the Sheriff, in respect of such alleged usage, to ordain the complainer to make payment of the poors' rates claimed by the respondent. 4. It was competent for the Sheriff to decide incidentally, and to the effect of ascertaining whether the complainer was liable in poors' rates,—whether the said lands were situated in the parish of St Ninians or not. 5. Even if the lands were locally situated within the parish of St Ninians, the complainer was not liable in poors' rates, in respect that Spittal's Hospital was a charitable institution, and the lands were mortified for the use of the poor; and farther, in respect the hospital was the superior, and the revenue derived therefrom consisted of feu-duties. 6. The Sheriff did wrong in ordering the expenses to be taxed on a scale exceeding £8. 6. 8.

The respondent pleaded—1. The lands of Southfield were locally situated within the parish of St Ninians, and were generally and immemorably reputed to be so. 2. The duty of a Sheriff, in enforcing payment of the ordinary parochial assessment for the poor, was merely ministerial, and provided he was furnished with the usual attestation by the minister of the parish within which the assessment was laid on, was bound de plano to interfere to compel payment by the party assessed, and his order to that effect was not liable to review by suspension or otherwise. 3. The suspender's allegation, that his lands were not within the parish of St Ninians, could not competently be entertained in the Court below, and his alleged immunity thereon founded, could be considered in this Court only in a process of declarator. 4. The suspender, by his own actings, as well as by those of his predecessors, was barred from maintaining (at least in this process) any plea founded on the allegation of his lands not being within the said parish. 5. The decree sought to be suspended was well founded, and the reasons of suspension fell to be repelled, with costs.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties on the competency of the suspension—Repels the objection to the competency; and in respect that the charger intimates that he is not to acquiesce in the interlocutor, finds him liable in expenses, and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—It was admitted by the charger that the suspender had never refused to pay in the meantime, and that there was no attempt to stop the levying of the assessment, or in any way to interfere with the supply of the poor. In this situation, the Lord Ordinary considers the case of Crawford, 31st May 1838, to fix that suspension is a competent process for trying the question; but besides the question at issue as to liability of these lands, the Sheriff gave expenses, and the charge is partly for these. It is surely competent to suspend a charge for expenses, and although the charger says that the Sheriff was acting purely ministerially, and had no power except to enforce the assessment, the fact is, that with the virtual consent of the charger himself, he acted otherwise, for he allowed a proof, and it was on facts said to be established by this proof that both the Sheriff-substitute and depute decided."

The charger reclaimed, praying the Court

"to recal the said interlocutor, to sustain the objection to the competency of the suspension, and to find the suspender liable in expenses; reserving to the suspender to institute an action of declarator, or such other action as may be competent in the premises."

At advising, the Court were unanimously of opinion that the suspension was competent, but indicated also an opinion that the main question raised by the suspender in his pleas ought properly to form the subject of a declarator. Their Lordships accordingly adhered, and found the reclamer liable in additional expenses.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Shaw; Dundas and Jamieson, W.S., Agents.—Alt. A. S. Logan; A. Dun, W.S., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

19th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 267.—THE EARL OF KINNOULL, Pursuer, v. The Rev. Dr Robert Gordon and Others (Trustees of the Ministers' Widows' Fund), Defendants.

Church—Patronage—Vacant Stipend—Statutes 1592, c. 117, and 54 Geo. III. c. 169. (Ministers' Widows' Fund)—Where a presbytery had rejected a presentee on the veto, and refused to proceed with his trials after it had been found that they were still bound to do so—Held that, subsequently to the date of the citation in an action of declarator directed against all having interest, the stipend falling due during the life of the presentee belonged not to the trustees for the Ministers' Widows' Fund but to the patron.

Continuation of the Auchterarder case. The summons contains the following alternative conclusion:—

"Or otherwise, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the pursuer, Thomas Robert Earl of Kinnoull, has legally, validly, and effectually exercised his right as patron of the church and parish of Auchterarder, by presenting the pursuer, the said Robert Young, as aforesaid, to the said church and parish, and that the said Presbytery of Auchterarder, and the individual members thereof, have illegally, and in violation of their duty, and of the several laws and statutes before libelled, refused, and continue to refuse to make trial of the qualifications of the said Robert Young, presentee foresaid, and to admit and receive the said Robert Young as minister of the church and parish of Auchterarder; but have illegally, and in violation of their duty, and of the laws and statutes libelled, as aforesaid, rejected the said Robert Young as presentee to the said church and parish (all which has now been decreed), and therefore, that the pursuer, Thomas Robert Earl of Kinnoull, has right to, and is entitled to receive and retain the whole stipend and emoluments of and pertaining to the said church and parish of Auchterarder, from the date of citation hereto, and in all time coming during the life of the said Robert Young; and it being so found and declared, the said Presbytery of Auchterarder, and the said (naming them), the present individual members thereof, and their successors, and Dr Andrew Grant, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, collector nominated and appointed under the several Statutes passed for the better raising and securing a fund for a provision for the widows and children of ministers of the Church of Scotland, and all others, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to desist and cease from molesting and disturbing the pursuer, the said Thomas Robert Earl of Kinnoull, in the possession and use in time coming, during the life of the said Robert Young, of the said localised and modified stipend, manse, glebe, and other emoluments belonging and pertaining to the said church and parish of Auchterarder: And it being so found and declared, the said (naming them), heritors of the said parish of Auchterarder, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer, the said Thomas Robert Earl of Kinnoull, of the stipend payable by each of them respectively, according to their several proportions, in terms of the subsisting decrees of locality, and that from the date of citation hereto, and in time coming during the life of the said Robert Young."

Mutual cases having been lodged on this point of the case by the Earl of Kinnoull, and by Dr Gordon as collector for the Widows' Fund, in obedience to an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship reported the cause to the Court, who ordered cases to be prepared upon the point, "Whether the trustees for the Ministers' Widows' Fund can legally claim the stipend of vacant charges, in case it appear that these remain vacant by the illegal proceedings of the Church?" and appointed the parties to box them to the Judges of the Second Division and Permanent Lords Ordinary for the opinion of the whole Court.

The following opinions were returned:—

Lord Medwyn:

"The Reverend Charles Stewart, minister of the parish of Auchterarder, having died on 31st August 1834, Lord Kinnoull, the unquestioned patron, granted a presentation in favour of Mr Young, a licentiate of the Church, which was laid before the Presbytery on 14th October 1834, with all the requisite documents of acceptance, &c. On 27th October the Presbytery so far sustained it as to find themselves prepared to appoint a day for moderating in a call to Mr Young, which was appointed accordingly for 2d December 1834. Dissents from the call and presentation were called for by the Presbytery on that occasion, and, on ascertaining that there was a majority of dissents, the Presbytery, on 7th July 1835, rejected the presentee, acting in obedience to the Act of the General Assembly anent Calls.

"According to this state of matters, the executors of Mr Stewart being entitled to draw the first half of the stipend for crop 1834; and the other half due at Michaelmas being payable, as the ann. vacant stipend would be due only at Whitsunday 1835, before which time, in the usual course, if there had been no obstruction to Mr Young's trials, and he had been found qualified, he would have been admitted, and would therefore have been entitled to the first half of crop 1835; so that in such a case no vacant stipend would have arisen.

"In the summons of declarator raised by Lord Kinnoull and Mr Young, on account of his rejection, besides the conclusion against the Presbytery as to their refusal to take Mr Young on trials, and admit him if qualified, there is an alternative conclusion, that Lord Kinnoull has legally exercised his right of presentation, that the Presbytery have illegally, and in violation of their duty, refused to admit the presentee as minister of Auchterarder, therefore that he, Lord Kinnoull, has right to, and is entitled to receive and retain the whole stipends and emoluments of the said church and parish from the date of citation, and in all time coming during the life of Mr Young; and that the Collector of the Widow's Fund, and all others, should not molest or disturb him in the possession and use of these. The date of citation is 25th October 1835. So that the vacant stipends payable at Whitsunday and Michaelmas of that year, 1835, are not claimed, but will go to increase the Ministers' Widows' Fund; while that payable at Whitsunday 1836, and what is subsequent thereto, only falls under this summons.

"A multipoleinding has also been raised in name of the heritors, and a collector has been appointed by the Court. The case then may be viewed as a competition, in which the patron and the Collector of the Widows' Fund each claim; and the question is, which of them, or whether either of them, has shown a right to the vacant stipend which arose after the 25th October 1835.

"The claim depends upon the import of the Act 54 George III. c. 169, in favour of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, and whether it is to be held that the enactment of that Statute is so broad, and the words so stringent, that whenever, by an illegal act of the Church, a benefice is not filled up in terms of law, the stipend which would in due course have fallen to the minister must be paid to the Collector of the Widows' Fund. Whether, in short, it must be said here, Lex non distinguit, neque nos.

"I think there cannot be a doubt that in this country originally, it was one of the privileges of patrons to enjoy the fruits of vacant benefices. The claim of the Pope to the annates was with us effectually resisted: in this respect we were more resolute and successful than they were in England. Accordingly, we find that by 1546, c. 4, an Act was passed expressly 'with the consent of the Prelates, Earls, &c., and all others patrons of benefices, both spiritual and temporal, that all kirkmen slain in this present armie, their nearest of kin are to have the presentation to his benefice, and the profits of the benefice, with the fruits speciallie on the ground, with the annat thereafter, to pertain to them and their executors.' To this Act the consent of all patrons was necessary, and was given. And in like manner, upon the Reformation, Queen Mary stated, as an objection to a request of the General Assembly as to patronage, 'that her Majestie thinks it noways reasonable that she should defraude herself of sa great a part of the patrimonie of the Crowne, as to put the patronage of benefices furth of her awin hands; for her awin necessitie in bearing of her port and common charges, will requyre the retentioun of ane good part in her awin hands.' Buke of Univ. Kirk, p. 63.

"Accordingly Stair distinctly laid it down—'In benefices patronate, the patron had right to the teinds sede vacante. But several Acts of Parliament have restricted the rights of patronage, and now the patron has only the application of vacant stipends to pious uses within the parish.' B. IV. t. 24, § 7.

"Now this right continued till the benefice was filled up, not merely by presenting a person, but by his being admitted so as to have in him jus in re, and the right to draw the teinds and sue the heritors.

"When the Presbyterian form of church government was sanctioned in 1592, it was made a condition that patronage should continue, as it had also been when the Reformed Church was adopted instead of the Papistical; and presentations were now to be directed to presbyteries, who were to be bound and restricted to receive and admit the presentee; but considering the views of the leaders of the Presbyterian party, it was thought proper expressly to provide, 'in case the presbytery refuses to admit any qualified minister presented to them by the patron, it shall be lawful to the patron to retain the haill fruits of the said benefice in his ain hands.' (1592, c. 117.) This applies no doubt to the case where the patron has done all that in him lay to fill the benefice; but I do not think that, either from the phraseology thus used in this Act (and the same words are used in the Act 1612, c. 1.) or in the law language of Scotland, I can affirm that they import anything different from what in subsequent Statutes is termed vacant stipend, or that stipend of a parish where the presbytery refuses to admit a qualified presentee, is not vacant stipend. The fruits of the benefice was then the legal description of the emoluments of the beneficiary, because, although the reformed clergy in general had only stipends assigned to them out of the thirds, all were not in the same situation (see 1592, c. 161); and this was expected to be a temporary arrangement, and only as long as the Popish incumbents survived. Accordingly that very year, (1592, c. 15, Thomson's Acts, Vol. III. p. 545,) and as part of the same plan for establishing the true Kirk, besides an Act ratifying an Act of the Privy Council made in February 1587, in favour of 'the Ministrie their Stipends and Rents,' an Act was passed appointing a 'Commission to confer and treat with the minister anent the provision of sufficient and local stipends to the ministeria.' (1592, c. 27, ib. p. 553.) I think the object of the enactment was this, while it secured to the patron the right he already had to retain the whole fruits of the benefice, as long as the church was vacant by the presbytery refusing to admit his qualified presentee, if another was admitted, whether selected by themselves, the General Assembly, or the people, the patron was still to have this right; this latter it was important to provide, and when the patron had thus the right to retain these fruits, he might apply them as he thought proper.

"The Act 1661, c. 52, proceeds on the narrative, that by divers Acts it is found that stipends during a vacancy should be employed on pious uses. Now, I am not acquainted with any such Acts, except the Act 1644, c. 47, (Thomson's Acts, Vol. VI. p. 128,) which directed that 'stipends and benefices of kirks now vaiking, or which may hereafter vaike by decease, deposition, suspension, or transportation of ministers, or by disunion of kirks, or any other wayes, during the vacanoy thereof, shall be employed upon pious uses' within the parish, by the patrons, with the advice and consent of the respective presbyteries. This Act fell of course by the Act rescissory at the Restoration; but, like many other beneficial Acts, it was re-enacted by the Statute already referred to, which 'ordains all stipends or benefices of kirks that are vacant, and not already disposed of, or which shall vaik by decease, deposition, suspension, translation, or any other wayes, to be employed, in the manner there pointed out, and a collector was appointed for collecting them; and the records of Parliament (See Vol. VII. pp. 123, 235, 240, 262, &c.) are full of warrants upon him for payments to loyal clergymen and their families who had been dispossessed by the covenanting party.

"Now there is evidence in these proceedings as to what was considered vacant stipend, and collected as such. For a petition is given into Parliament by the heritors and inhabitants of Newbottle, 'mentioning that the kirk had been a good while vacant and without a minister; that the elders and heritors did, according to the constitution of that time, call a worthy person to be their minister, who was not actually received by the presbytery, but allowed by them to preach and to do all ministerial acts, which he very well performed to their satisfaction, yet the presbytery would not, on their earnest pressing sute, admit him;' (1661, c. 108, Vol. VII. p. 198.)—also mentioning that a bridge needs reparation; and it prays that some fit proportion of the vacant stipend of the said kirk be given to the minister, and the remanent for the reparation of the bridge. The Parliament accordingly gave 500 merks to the minister, and the remainder for the bridge, and appoint Wilkie the collector to allow the same accordingly. See also 1661, c. 186, p. 267; 1662, c. 23, p. 390.

"Thus, then, vacant stipend, under an Act which specifies stipends vaiking by decease, &c., or any other wayes, was held to embrace stipends of churches kept vacant for years by the act of the presbytery; and I think it reasonable to infer, that when the subsequent Statutes, 1672, c. 20, and an intermediate one not mentioned by the parties, 1663, c. 62 (Thomson's Acts, Vol. VII. p. 491), as well as 1685, c. 18, simply speak of 'vacant stipends,' without specifying in what manner they become vacant, that these words have the precise import of the more enlarged expressions in the two Acts first noticed; that, in short, it is the generic expression for the precise subject of these Acts. This last Act restored to patrons their ancient rights as to vacant stipends, except that they must be employed on pious uses within the parish, and more particularly for building and repairing of bridges, repairing of churches, or entertainment of the poor, as the patron shall determine, yearly. The Act 1690, c. 23, which took away the patron's right of presentation, specially reserved his right 'to employ the vacant stipends on pious uses' within the parish; and by 10 Anne, c. 12, patrons are restored to their ancient rights of presenting ministers to vacant churches, and of 'disposing of the vacant stipends for pious uses within the parish.'

"On this footing, the patron's right remained till the year 1814, when a bill having been brought into Parliament for amending former Acts establishing the Ministers' Widows' Fund, a provision was introduced as to vacant stipends, upon which alone the claim of the collector in this competition is founded. The provision was introduced with the express consent of the Crown, and the tacit consent of the other patrons, or at least without opposition from the latter. It is of importance to consider the precise amount of the grant so made, and whether it can bear a construction so obviously beyond the meaning and intention of the parties, as that whenever a church continues vacant, not from any delay in the patron issuing a presentation, nor from any necessary delay by the presbytery in going through the requisite trials of the presentee, or in disposing of any relevant objections stated by any parishioner to his appointment, but from an illegal act and resolution of the Church, contrary to the law; and moreover, when this is persisted in after it had been declared to be illegal by the competent authority in the State, the stipend which accrues during these years is to go to increase a fund in which the ministers of the Church at large are so deeply interested on behalf of such of them as are married—I say, against the meaning and intention of the parties; for I cannot believe that such a case of refusal and rejection as Lord Kinross complains of here, was 'in the contemplation of the patrons and of the other parties in the Church who were the promoters of this Act,' and for this plain reason, that no sane man would have paved the way for such an Act passing, if any avowal had been made of an intention by this clause to provide for such illegal proceedings on the part of the Church as have kept this parish of Auchterarder vacant now for nearly seven years, with an obvious advantage to the Widows' Fund. At the time this Act was passed, all attempts on the part of the church courts to disturb the right of patronage had been long abandoned, the quiet induction of presentees was quite fixed and settled; and to commence a revival of the contest by an obstruction of the right without legislative enactment, could never be anticipated. Although I am persuaded, then, such conduct was not in the view of either of the parties, and of course no such case was contemplated nor provided for at the time of this surrender of the patron's rights, yet it does appear to me, that the words of the enactment are such as must exclude the claim of the Widows' Fund to the continuous stipends falling due beyond the date of citation in this action.

"The Act was obviously, in this branch of it, framed upon the model of the Acts 1644 and 1661, but with this remarkable difference, that while it specifies how the parish becomes vacant by particular events occurring to the incumbent, it does not add, 'or any other ways.' There must have been some reason for this marked departure from the phraseology of Acts which were plainly lying before the framers of this one. The words of the Statutes in the seventeenth century have been already given: the enactment of the nineteenth century is, 'That when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, resignation, or deprivation of an incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice of such parish, and that vacant stipend thereby arises,' subsequent to 1813, 'such vacant stipend, in so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes, shall thenceforth and in all time to come be levied in manner hereafter mentioned, and paid to the general collector,' &c. (54 Geo. III. c. 169, § 9.)

"And the mode in which it is to be levied is this—§ 12, 'As often as any portion of vacant stipend shall occur in any parish within the bounds of any presbytery, the moderator is hereby expressly required, within three calendar months after the terms of Whitsunday or Michaelmas, at which such vacant stipend shall become due, to make intimation thereof by a writing under his hand to the general collector at Edinburgh, which writing shall also contain an attested list of the several heritors or others by whom such vacant stipend is payable, and of the proportion thereof payable by each of them.' The moderator is also to intimate to the heritors to pay their proportion of stipend to the collector.

"This duty is imposed upon the moderator of the presbytery, who of course knows when the benefice becomes vacant and when it is filled by admission of the presentee; and it will be particularly noticed, he is to intimate to the collector every portion of vacant stipend as it shall occur.

"As to the appropriation of vacant stipends, it is provided (§ 16–21,) that a capital stock or fund is to be created by accumulating the annual produce of these stipends, with various other funds mentioned in the Act, and yearly adding the interest, out of which additions are to be made from time to time, at certain intervals, to the rates of the annuities of the widows, each interval being not less than fourteen years.

"This Act, it must always be recollected, is a private Act (it is printed among the local and personal), transferring valuable privileges from one party to another, and this gratuitously, and is therefore to be construed with a view to carry into effect the fair meaning of the parties, but not to give it a more extensive interpretation and effect than was intended, or it will reasonably bear. It contemplates the ordinary case where a parish becomes vacant—that vacant stipend arises in consequence of some necessary, or at least not illegal delay in filling it up, either from the presentation being only near the end of the six months, or the jus devolutum occurring, or of some dispute about the right of patronage, or from some innocent error in judgment in the church courts, engaged honestly and conscientiously in discharging their duty. But it seems difficult to hold, that the enacting words are such as to compel the Court to say it comprehends vacant stipend, from whatever cause it can arise. If the General Assembly were to vote that patronage was unscriptural, and therefore resolve that no presbytery should receive a presentation, but should reject every presentee, would the stipends of churches kept vacant in consequence of such an illegal resolution fall to the Widows' Fund? Or if they were to resolve that it would be an advantage to the Church if this fund for the benefit of the widows of ministers were increased, and therefore that while presentations were received and sustained, no admission should be given for a given period, say one, two, or three years, would the portions of stipend thus becoming vacant be appropriated under this Act? I can scarcely think that in either of these cases this could be so.—Take this other case. The General Assembly once enacted, with the view of controlling patronage, 'that none seek presentations to benefices without advice of the presbytery within the bounds whereof the benefice is; and if any do in the contrary, they shall be repelled as rei ambitus.' Now if such an Act were to be again passed by the Assembly, and enforced by a presbytery, would stipend occurring during the vacancy, till redress was obtained for such an illegal resolution, become the property of the Widows' Fund? In all these cases, there might be a portion of vacant stipend which could be said to have become vacant by the death of the former incumbent, and the moderator would be fully warranted to hold this to be so, and to make intimation accordingly; but after he has made intimation as to those portions of vacant stipend, how could he, in terms of the 12th section, make intimation as to subsequent portions which were not vacant by the death of the last incumbent, but kept vacant by an illegal resolution of the General Assembly, which the Presbytery think themselves bound to obey? In this Widows' Fund Act there is no general declaration as to vacant stipend in certain specified events, followed by, 'or any otherways,' which might be argued to include a continuance of the vacancy from a different cause from that in which it commenced. In this respect it is limited and restricted from the ampler form of expression used in preceding Statutes, and does not even employ the generic expression of 'vacant stipend,' which might be supposed to comprehend whatever was embraced by the other and more particular enumeration; but it limits it to the case of vacant stipend arising in consequence of the death, &c., of the last incumbent. Vacant stipend, from a cause mentioned in the Act 1644, would unquestionably not fall to the Widows' Fund, viz., that from the disunion of kirks. For none such is specified in the Act 1814: in this respect, then, it is more restricted than the old Act, even as to special enumeration, still more by the omission of all other ways whereby it may arise.

"But, truly, it seems impossible to say that the vacant stipend, which is the subject of this competition, has arisen from any other cause than from the Church persisting illegally in enforcing the Veto Act, and the Presbytery, in violation of their duty, refusing to take the presentee on trial. The Widows' Fund will be entitled to the two portions of vacant stipend falling due at Whitsunday and Michaelmas 1835; thus far it may be admitted that vacant stipend has arisen by the death of Mr Stewart; but beyond this it is impossible to go;—the fund is only to get what is vacant by his death; now the vacancy by his death would have been filled up long ago, but for the resolution to enforce this illegal Act, and therefore the subsequent portions of vacant stipend not arising 'thereby,' i. e., his death, but from a totally different cause, have not been made over to this fund.

"It must never be forgot that in the Act there is no general forfeiture of the patron's right; it is not said, patrons shall no longer, in any case, be entitled to vacant stipend for pious uses; that their right to it and interest in it shall cease and determine; but only that vacant stipend, arising by the death of the last incumbent shall be paid to the Collector of the Widows' Fund; and the words which follow, 'in so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes,' will not enlarge the gift, nor make the transfer from the one to the other more ample than is implied in the sound meaning of the words bestowing the right. The words are not, that all vacant stipends heretofore applicable by the patron for pious purposes shall hereafter be paid to the collector; neither is there any declaration that this is the pious use to which hereafter patrons shall apply vacant stipend, or the pious use to which vacant stipends shall be applied. It is nowhere in this Act said to be a pious use of vacant stipend, just as little as the donation from the bishops' rents is said to be.

"Now, then, is the Court prepared to say that this clause, so cautiously worded, conveys to this fund vacant stipend arising not from any proceeding of a presbytery in the honest discharge of their functions as a church court, though it may be occasioning undue delay, by acting mistakenly from some error in judgment, but portions of a stipend which continues vacant in consequence of an illegal resolution of the Church to resist the law, acted on by the Presbytery, in contempt of the authority of the courts of law, and in a matter of civil right? I can scarcely think that the Court will come to this conclusion, but will view the portion of vacant stipend which first arises, as totally different (as in fact it is) in origin, effect, and character, from that which continues to arise afterwards; and, therefore, though it may all pass popularly under the name of vacant stipend, because the church continues vacant, that the one is quite distinguishable from the other: so that while the one clearly falls under the Act, the other as clearly does not.

"If this be so, it is unnecessary to found much upon the case of the College of Glasgow, 1694, which proceeded on the ground that the words of the Statute there necessarily included the stipend claimed by the college; and they were not successful on this ground alone, that it was casus incogitatus, the words going beyond the meaning of the Statute. The case was this: The Act 1685, c. 22, which restored to patrons the right of employing vacant stipends, makes certain exceptions for five years, and among these 'the vacant stipends of the dioceses of Glasgow and Galloway shall be employed to the use of the College of Glasgow.' Under this Statute, the college had 'right to the vacant stipends for 1689, and the term used is vacant stipends' simply, and without any qualification as to how it arises or continues. It appears that Mr Wilson, the incumbent of one of these parishes, had suffered from the lawlessness of the Covenanters of the west, who, as is well known, after King James had issued his proclamation in 1687, dispensing with all tests and penal laws as to religion, broke out into such acts of violence, that the rabble in winter 1688 went about in the five associated shires and dispossessed more than two hundred clergymen, driving them and their families from their churches. The Privy Council were at that time powerless and unable to preserve the peace of the country, and order was not partially restored till the meeting of the Estates in March 1689. Mr Wilson seems again to have officiated occasionally in his church till legally dispossessed in 1690. The college claimed the stipend when he was driven away, or rabbed out of his church as it was termed, as vacant stipend. It is quite true the church had not been served,—it was vacant, not by death or deposition, but 'by other ways;' and as the generic term 'vacant stipend' had the same meaning as the more ample description of the Act 1661, this stipend was vacant, and belonged to the College of Glasgow. But the Court held that 'the vacancy occasioned by the rabble's thrusting out ministers was casus incogitatus, and not foreseen or meant by the said Act of Parliament; and that Mr Wilson proving he served at that kirk after the 13th April 1689 (which was the date of the proclamation of the meeting of Estates), he had right to that half-year's stipend;' (16th February 1694, Fount. 4 Sup. 143). It was held that the words went beyond the meaning of the Act, and they were not allowed to comprehend a case which fell within them, but was never contemplated.

"But as I am of opinion that the words of the Widows' Fund Act do not comprehend the portions of vacant stipend here claimed, it is unnecessary to resort to this case as an authority.

"The only parties in this competition are the Patron and the Collector of the Widows' Fund; and my opinion is, that the patron is entitled to be preferred, but that he must, in terms of the Act 1685, apply these stipends to pious uses.

"But it may be a question, whether the presentee, when the patron has done all in his power to put him into the benefice, and when he has been illegally kept out of it, should not be preferred to the vacant stipend; in short, whether, if the Court cannot enforce his being received and admitted by the Presbytery as minister of the parish, they may not, as a surrogatum, award to him the stipend till the benefice is legally filled by himself or some other. But the presentee does not appear in this competition;—no such claim is brought forward; and therefore I do not think it necessary to discuss this point, nor show why, at present at least, I am not inclined to hold that for vacant stipend, not falling under the Widows' Fund Act, there can be any claim except through the patron.

"Upon the whole, therefore, I am for preferring Lord Kin-noull, in terms of his summons."

Lord Meadowbank :

"I concur in the preceding opinion."

Lord Cuninghame :

"I concur entirely in the views of this case expressed by Lord Medwyn, and I am clearly of opinion that the Collector of the Widows' Fund has no claim, by the Statute on which he founds, to any of the stipend of the parish of Auchterarder falling due after 25th October 1835, the date of citation in the present action. As the case involves a question of statutory and constitutional law of great interest, I trust I may be excused for stating in a few words the considerations which more particularly impress me with the untenable nature of the collector's plea.

I. In the first place, upon a sound construction of the Act of 1814, I apprehend that the vacant stipend transferred to the Widows' Fund by that Act is specially confined to the cases, 'when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, or deprivation, of any incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice of such parish, and that vacant stipend thereby arises subsequent to the crop and year 1813,—such vacant stipend, in so far as it has heretofore been applicable to the patron to pious purposes, shall henceforth, &c. &c., 'be paid to the general collector,' &c.

"This was a statutory transfer, not of the whole vacant stipend that might fall due in all the parishes of Scotland, from whatever cause the vacancy might be created or continued, but solely of such vacant stipend as might arise from the death, translation, or deposition of the preceding incumbent. The object and effect of the provision are well known to all conversant with the ecclesiastical law and usages of Scotland. As a patron has six months after each vacancy has occurred to fill up the benefice, and an additional period often elapses, either from the non-acceptance of presentees, or from the time unavoidably required for their trial and induction, it has necessarily happened, perhaps in the majority of settlements in Scots parishes, that on each vacancy by death, there is a certain delay, in consequence of which an arrear of stipend (seldom exceeding one term's payment in amount) arises, which the new incumbent cannot claim before induction, and which of old fell to the patron as vacant stipend, to be employed ad pios usus. That clearly is the vacant stipend, arising from death, which was transferred to the Widows' Fund by the Statute on which the present question depends.

"No doubt, in cases of difficulty, the extent of this transference or claim has not been measured in nice scales. When a question as to a new presentation, arising from the death of the preceding incumbent, occurs, requiring long discussion and deliberation in the civil and ecclesiastical courts, the vacant stipend may be increased beyond an ordinary amount, without fault or mala fides attributable to any party; and in such cases the Court has not been asked to infer, that the vacant stipend did not arise from proceedings bona fide rendered necessary by the death of the preceding incumbent.

"But the present case, as maintained by the opposing patron, does not fall within that class. It is alleged that the vacant stipend, which is the subject of this question, does not fairly and honestly arise from the death of the last incumbent, but has been accumulated solely in consequence of an illegal law of the Church recently passed by that body, of their own authority, setting a Statute of the Legislature at defiance, which they still peremptorily refuse to obey. This being the plea of the patron, I cannot hold that it is inconsistent with, or excluded by the words of the Statute, giving a right to the Widows' Fund to the vacant stipend in the limited class of cases before specified.

"Neither does it appear to me, that this plea of the patron can be obviated by any reference on the part of the widows to the probable views and intention of parties in passing this Act, as justifying any strained or very wide interpretation of its terms. It has been insinuated, no doubt, on the part of the fund, that as no mortal in 1814 anticipated that such a course of proceedings and policy would be adopted on the part of the Kirk, as has been lately exhibited, this accounts for no exception being made to exclude the widows' claim under the circumstances which have here emerged. But the patron is entitled to reply with equal probability, that if the case which has now occurred was not foreseen, no surrender on his part was asked or understood to be made, so as to bar his legal claim under this new combination of circumstances.

"This view of the case is strongly supported by the history of the Statute, and the clear deduction as to the previous rights of patrons over vacant stipends, given in the opinion of Lord Medwyn. It is clearly shown by his Lordship, that patrons, from time immemorial, had right (recognised in different Statutes) to all vacant stipends, whether created by death, resignation, deposition, or in any other way. It is also demonstrated by his Lordship in what manner vacant stipends arose in the earlier and more disturbed periods of the history of the Church after the Reformation, from other causes than the decease or removal of prior incumbents. The Act 1592 specially gave patrons a right to retain the fruits of the benefice in their own hands when presbyteries refused to induct qualified presentees; while the fact that presbyteries in ancient times did refuse to ordain presentees for years (generally when the law was too weak to compel them), may be gathered from other Statutes, unnecessary to be quoted. It is also matter of record in our books, that presbyteries in former times occasionally chose (as in the case of Auchtermuchty and Lanark) to induct other ministers than the legal presentees into benefices, which took away, at least in ecclesiastical law, the technical character of vacancy in such parishes; but nevertheless, the stipend in the latter class of cases was claimable by the patrons, and not by the incumbents preferred by the ecclesiastical courts. In this known state of the law the Act of 1814 was passed, which, as noticed by Lord Medwyn, was specially classed by the Legislature among the local and personal acts: It was thus plainly a statutory compact between the Kirk and the patrons of Scotland; whereby the latter gave up, not the whole of their rights over vacant stipends per aversionem to the Kirk, but the vacant stipend legitimately arising from the three events specified in the Act. In these circumstances, the Act is to be construed as an agreement, and held to include all that can be reasonably presumed as intended to be given, according to the ecclesiastical law and system then administered; but certainly the words of the Statute, are not to be strained beyond their plain and ordinary sense, to extend the surrender of the patrons to cases neither expressed nor contemplated when the Act was passed. In that view, it would be absurd to infer, that patrons meant also to surrender (and that to a trust for the widows and children of ministers) such vacant stipend as might be created solely by the illegal acts of the Kirk, and their positive refusal to execute a fundamental law of their own constitution.

"II. Upon the preceding construction of the Statute, the question in the present competition comes simply to this—Whether the stipends in medio fall to be viewed as fairly and bona fide arising from the death of the preceding incumbent, or from any other cause to which the statutory assignment in favour of the Widows' Fund does not apply? On this point the facts at least admit of no dispute. It is admitted that the patron did his duty, by presenting in due time to the Presbytery a person alleged to be qualified,—that the Presbytery, in consequence of a new regulation of the Kirk (called the Veto Law), rejected the presentee,—that that regulation was declared, both by this Court and by the House of Lords, to be contrary to law; and it was farther found that the Presbytery were bound to take the presentee on trials; but that the Presbytery nevertheless refused, and still refuse to obey that decree. I am of opinion that the vacancy created or prolonged from such causes, cannot in law, or according to the common sense and understanding of mankind, be held as a vacancy arising from the death of the preceding incumbent,—but as a vacancy attributable solely to the tortious and illegal proceeding of the Kirk, and that the Statute founded on by the widows is inapplicable, and cannot support their claim.

"It has been said that the stipend was claimed as just of the same nature as the vacant stipend which has arisen in numerous cases on record, where delays have occurred in disputed questions of patronage, when the claim of the Widows' Fund was not disputed. But there is an essential distinction between the present case and every other on record prior to the passing of the Veto Law. In previous cases, delays of settlements no doubt often occurred from opposition, sometimes groundless, on the part of the church courts; but in none, since 1814, was the vacancy occasioned for one day, by an avowed disobedience of the statutory law, as expounded by the civil courts. When settlements were postponed, therefore, by a litigation on other grounds, peculiar to each case as it arose, it was not considered a point worth disputing, that the vacant stipend claimable in these instances, arose from the death or removal of the prior incumbent.

"The plea for the widows, in the present instance, is so stated, as if the stipends now claimed, and others accumulated in similar circumstances, formed an accidental and unexpected accession opening to them from ordinary and legitimate causes,—as if a charitable trust got a grant from Parliament of the criminal fines in a district, which were augmented by a sudden increase of the population and demoralization of that locality,—or as if they had a grant of the tolls on a great public thoroughfare, which were unexpectedly increased by a large addition to the traffic; in which cases, and in others analogous, by a well-known rule of statutory law, the benefit, though beyond the original calculation, accrues to the grantees, upon the unlimited terms of their right. In every view the present is a very different case. The stipends in dispute have arisen solely from the unjustifiable and lawless conduct of public functionaries; in fact, from their quasi delinquency, which no party can profit by, or found upon, as extending any previous grant in their favour. Put the case that even a charitable trust had a grant of fines, or of tolls, of a particular description, legally and usually exigible, such a grant would not include fines or tolls illegally imposed or levied contrary to the declared judgment of the Supreme Civil Tribunals of the country.

"Still less can the construction of the Act contended for by the widows be maintained under the specialties of the present case. The statutory grant in 1814 was a great boon granted to a fund for the benefit of ministers of the Kirk and their families, who were intrusted with important duties in the settlement of ministers by other Statutes, which they had recognised and given effect to for many years. It is not, therefore, unfair or unreasonable to hold, that it was an implied condition of the grant, that the subsisting laws in the supply of vacancies would be fairly and honestly administered. It cannot be presumed that the Legislature meant that the families of the clergy should draw profit from vacant stipend created by their contumacy to the law. While the Act, therefore, is not to be so interpreted, as that widows shall be subjected to any forfeiture or loss by the fault of the clergy,—or that anything shall be withheld from the fund on which its members were fairly entitled to rely for their provision, it is only just that the fund shall not be held to acquire gain from the open and continued resistance of the law, manifested by the reverend functionaries bound to give implicit effect to it. The statutory assignment does not apply to such a case. And indeed, if a contrary interpretation were given to the Act; and if the course followed by the Kirk in the cases of Auchterarder, Marnoch, and Daviot (which have all been under review of this Court), were sufficient to support the claim of the Widows' Fund to the vacant stipend arising during the obstruction of the settlement of the legal presentees, it is manifest that ere long a large proportion of the stipends of the parishes of Scotland might be transferred to that fund. It is very far from my intention to insinuate that this was either contemplated, or had any influence on the proceedings of the Kirk, in the cases in question. But the consequences resulting from the course adopted by them, as exemplified by the claim of the widows in the present question, cannot be thrown entirely out of view.

"The circumstances under which the vacant stipend at present accumulated in the parish of Auchterarder has arisen, appear to me to be analogous in principle with the case of vacancies created by any vis major, which might, for a time, supersede the ordinary administration of justice in the country;—as if a civil rebellion arose,—or if a certain district were occupied by an enemy's force. In such a case it would surely be extravagant to hold that the whole stipends of emerging vacancies were claimable by the widows, as arising from the death of the last incumbents, when, in point of fact, the supply of the vacancies was obstructed by the supercession of the regular tribunals of the country. The case of the College of Glasgow in 1694, quoted in Lord Medwyn's opinion, is an authority in point, to show that an ordinary grant of vacant stipend was not held to include stipend, when the vacancy arose from the ascendancy and defiance of the law by a mob;—and it humbly appears to me that that decision on principle rules the present question.

"In holding that the fund now in dispute has been created solely by unwarrantable disobedience of the law, and in fact by rebellion to its authority, I need not disclaim every intention to offer any violence to the feelings and conduct of the individual members of the Church establishment who have advised or concurred in the proceedings which have fallen under the animadversion of this Court. They have of course acted in accordance with their views of their duty, and they have probably been influenced by advice and opinions which they felt that they could not honourably surrender. This is the feeling of all men who resist particular laws, or established systems of government on conscientious grounds; the purity of their motives in general is unimpeachable; but these are the very cases in which courts of justice are the more strongly called on to show that neither the influence of station nor the weight of individual character can affect the course of the law. It would be difficult to say, that the members of the Church entertain stronger feelings as to the illegality of the judgment of this Court and of the House of Lords upon the Veto Act, than the dissenters of Edinburgh did as to the Annuity Act, which we have been repeatedly called on to enforce; but the scruples of both must be disregarded. Till the law of patronage is altered by the Legislature, the proceedings of the church courts, as to the presentation to Auchterarder, must be viewed as a renunciation (at least as to that question) of all allegiance to the civil tribunals of the State; and where there has been so flagrant a resistance to the law, in the settlement of a legal presentee, it is impossible to hold the vacancy as in any respect attributable to the death of the preceding incumbent.

"In this view I conceive that this Court is entitled and bound, if called on by a party having a legal title and interest, to inquire into the grounds on which the alleged vacancies have arisen, when a claim is preferred for their stipends on the part of the Widows' Fund; and here it is proper to refer to other branches of the assignment given by the Statute to the Widows' Fund. It will be particularly observed, that the Act gives the widows the vacant stipends, not merely in cases of 'death,' but of deprivation; but nevertheless, if it were alleged and offered to be proved, that the ecclesiastical courts had deposed a minister in violation of a Statute or of an express judgment of the House of Lords, it is supposed that the Court would pause before transferring any part of that minister's stipend to the Widows' Fund as vacant stipend. On the same principle, if a vacancy on death is prolonged illegally, and the settlement of the next presentee obstructed on illegal and unconstitutional grounds; still more, if induction, or the steps essential to it, are refused by the church courts in the face of a competent decree, that is equivalent to an illegal suspension of the presentee, and the stipend is no more claimable by the widows in the one case than in the other.

"The only difference between the claim of widows to the stipend in the case of an illegal deprivation, and of a vacancy on death, prolonged by an incompetent law of the Church, is, that in the latter case a claim may lie for a certain amount of vacant stipend in the commencement of the vacancy, as fairly devolving to the widows on the death of every incumbent; while, of course, in the case of deprivation there is no room for any such claim. But the law would be easily hoodwinked, indeed, if it could not ascertain the limit between the vacant stipend arising from the death of the incumbent, being that falling due for the period usually required in ordinary course of the law for the induction of a new minister, and that subsequently occasioned by the resolutions of the church courts to obstruct the settlement of every presentee who did not comply with their illegal resolutions. As the patron limits his claim here to the stipends falling due after 25th October 1835, enough is left upon the balance of the stipends which fell due after the death of the preceding incumbent to satisfy every claim which the widows could have realised on this vacancy, if the church courts had not unduly obstructed the settlement of the presentee.

"Indeed, it is not very clear to what extent the claim on the part of the widows is meant to be carried over the vacant stipend arising in the present and in analogous cases. Had the church courts followed up the Veto Law as originally passed, the Presbytery would have held the jus devolutum as vested in themselves by the refusal of the patron to nominate another presentee, and they would have inducted a minister of their own into the cure, to be maintained there by such resources as zealous partisans might raise, for the whole life of their chosen nominee. As the claim of the latter, however, to the civil fruits of the benefice, according to the views of this Court and of the House of Lords, could never be sustained, it remains to be asked, if the Widows' Fund could claim this stipend as vacant for ten or twenty years, or the ordinary duration of a man's life? It seems hardly possible that any parties could seriously maintain that their right by Statute to the vacant stipend arising from the death of the last incumbent, included that created by the intrusion of a wrong presentee into the benefice, for the whole duration of his life. It is apprehended, however, that the widows have no better claim for the stipend kept vacant by the operation of the Veto Law, to the extent to which it is now enforced by the Kirk, than if that Act had been carried into effect, in all its heads, by the induction of a presentee chosen by the Presbytery. In neither case can the unappropriated stipends allowed to accumulate be held as vacant stipend arising from the death of the last incumbent.

"III. On the supposition that the stipends in medio do not fall under the statutory assignment to the Widows' Fund, I am of opinion that they belong to the patron, at least in a question between him and the collector of that fund. Mr Erskine, in treating of the powers of patrons, observes (B. I. tit. 5, § 13), 'that they have also the power of receiving and disposing of the fruits of the benefice during a vacancy. This last right appears, by our Statutes, passed soon after the Reformation, to be not a bare right of administration, but of property; so that the patron could have held and disposed of them as his own: 1584, c. 137; 1592, c. 115; 1593, c. 172; 1612, c. 1. But by 1664, c. 20, the patron was obliged to apply them, with the advice of the Presbytery, to pious uses within the bounds of the parish, or at least of that Presbytery; and though patrons were, by the Act rescissory, 1661, c. 15, restored to their former rights, it appears by 1661, c. 52; 1672, c. 20, &c., to have been the sense of the Legislature in the reign of Charles II., that the right of patrons to the vacant stipend was merely a trust; so that they still continued under the restraint imposed on them by the Act 1664, of applying them to pious uses. The Statutes quoted in the opinion of Lord Medwyn, amply support this view of the law.

"It is an ulterior question whether the patron, in the present instance, will not be entitled and bound to apply a portion of the vacant stipend, if he is preferred, to satisfy such part of the claims of the presentee, Mr Young, as he may not establish in his action against the members of Presbytery whom he has convened in the separate action already before the Court, and now under appeal. Although Mr Young has not entered appearance in the present competition (possibly waiting till the title and claim of the widows should be disposed of), he may not be foreclosed from urging his claims on the patron, if the latter should be preferred. Under the competition as hitherto conducted, the Court has no materials for judging either of the competency or merits of the presentee's claim on the patron, and of course no opinion is given on that point."

Lord Murray :

"My first impression on this case was, that the Act of Parliament transferred to the Widows' Fund the vacant stipends in every case in which the patron could have right to them—but after considering the opinions of Lord Medwyn and Lord Cunningham, I have come to be of opinion that the Statute 1592 makes the case of the Presbytery refusing to admit any qualified minister presented to them by the patron, a special case in which it is declared to be lawful for the patron to retain the whole fruits of the benefice in his own hands. This is again specially re-enacted by Statute 1612, cap. 1, in case of archbishops or bishops refusing to admit a qualified minister presented by the patron. I view that, as recognised by Statutes, as a separate case from vacancy arising from death, translation or deprivation of an incumbent, and that the words 'or otherwise' in the Statutes transferring stipends to pious uses which have been referred to, were added to cover that case. Although, therefore, in that, as well as in other cases, the patron must employ the vacant stipend in pious uses, it is not one of the cases in which vacant stipend is transferred to the Widows' Fund. The vacant stipend in this case does not arise from the death of the former incumbent, but from a case specially distinguished by the Legislature, of the refusal of the Presbytery to admit a qualified person; and while one class of Statutes reaches that case, the Statute 54 Geo. III. does not comprehend it.

"I do not go on the ground that the holders of the Widows' Fund are barred by the conduct of the Church in this matter; but in interpreting the Statute, I feel fully convinced, that if the words or otherwise had been added, and it had been asked what other vacancies can there be, and it had been answered that the Statute 1592 and the Act 1612, passed in the time of Episcopacy, both gave the patron an express right vi statuti to the vacant stipend where the church court refused to admit a qualified minister, and that such an addition would comprehend that case also, the patrons who consented to the Act would naturally have opposed any such addition being made, and the Legislature would not without their consent have passed it."

Lord Jeffrey, concurred in by Lords Cockburn and Ivory :

"We are of opinion that all the stipends of vacant parishes which the patrons were bound to have applied for pious uses previous to the Act of 54 Geo. III. c. 169, were, by virtue of that Act, made over to the Collector of the Widows' Fund, the only comparing defender in this branch of the cause; and that the words importing this transference, or new destination of these stipends, amount to a plain declaration, that the increase of the said fund should, in all after time, supersede and be preferable to any other pious uses; and that these words are too clear and absolute to admit of construction.

"We are unable, therefore, to see how the patron, who is the only pursuer now insisting in the cause, can possibly prevail in this competition, unless he can make out that stipends which remain or come into his hands in consequence of the illegal refusal of Presbyteries or other Church Courts to supply a vacancy, are in a different situation from other vacant stipends, and were not, before the date of the Act, legally applicable to pious uses. Now, whatever doubts might have been originally raised upon the general words of the Act 1592, c. 117, or on what is assumed to have been the common law anterior to that date, we think it clearly established by the whole course and current of subsequent authorities, that there is now no room for such a distinction; and that nothing is better settled in law and in practice, than that no patron, for at least two hundred years back, has had any right to stipends arising from an actual vacancy in the cure, except as a trustee for their application to pious uses within the parish. Whether the particular case upon which the question has now been raised was casus improbius when the Statute relied on was passed, or whether, from the hazard of its frequent recurrence, it may require some farther remedial provision from the Legislature, are not points, in our apprehension, for the consideration of a court of law. But the Act of 1592, c. 117, undoubtedly contemplates the case of vacant stipend arising from the illegal refusal of church courts to induct: and the cases of Auchtermuchty, Culross and Lanark, appear to us not only to have been, all of them, cases of such illegal refusal, but of refusal aggravated by proceedings which put it totally out of the power of the offending parties to repair the wrong that had been committed. Yet in all these, and in every case, indeed, where the patron has been found entitled to receive or retain the stipend of a vacant parish, he has been held bound to apply it to pious uses; and consequently is now bound, in our view of the Act of Geo. III., to allow it to be applied to that supereminently pious use which has been thereby appointed to supersede and take the place of all other such uses.

"We cannot persuade ourselves that any doubt can be thrown upon this construction, from the circumstance of the Statute speaking only of cases of vacancy occasioned by 'the death, translation, resignation or deprivation of any existing incumbent, and granting specially to the Widows' Fund, 'any vacant stipend that may thereby arise.' The object of that clause, we think, was merely to specify all the possible ways in which a vacancy in a parish, full at the time, could possibly occur, or vacant stipend arise; as we certainly are not aware that this could ever happen, except by the death, translation, resignation or deprivation of the actual incumbent. But if there was any vacancy of which the fund was not to have the benefit in consequence of these (supposed) taxative words, it seems to us clear enough that the present case cannot fall within the supposed exception; since it is certain and fully admitted that the vacancy was occasioned, and the vacant stipend arose, in consequence of the death of Mr Stewart, the former incumbent, in August 1834. That this vacancy has been unduly prolonged by the illegal conduct of the church courts, is a consideration altogether apart from the proper construction of the words specifying the occasions on which it should arise, and is, in our opinion, irrelevant for the reasons already given. It appears to us impossible to suppose that the Statute intended to distinguish between one portion of the stipend, arising during a continued vacancy, and another: and as we hold it fixed that stipends falling due after the church courts have illegally refused to supply the vacancy, were applicable to pious uses, as well as those which fell due before, and that the Widows' Fund has now been surrogated in the place of all other pious uses, we cannot consistently recognise such a distinction as is here suggested by the pursuer, on a most strained, and, it appears to us, perverted construction of the words to which he refers.

"Something, however, is thrown out by the noble pursuer, though apparently with no great confidence, as to the present defender being barred by a personal exception; in respect that the interest which he represents is substantially an interest of the Church generally, and that the vacancy has been prolonged by the illegal proceedings of the church courts; in consequence of which, it is alleged, that to allow him to take the accruing stipend would be to allow the Church to profit by its own wrong. We cannot think that there is any real weight in this far-fetched and overstrained exception. Its radical fault is the want of any proper concursus, privity or identity of person, between the supposed wrong-doers and those whom it is now proposed to forfeit for their offence. The offenders are the Presbytery and the Superior Church Courts: But, in the first place, it is neither the church courts nor the Church as a body that has the beneficial interest in the fund in question, but only the existing widows of some of its deceased members, and such other widows as may hereafter be left by any of its other members who may happen to marry, and to predecease their wives. The burden of the fund indeed is laid on the Church by a compulsory assessment on all its members; but the benefit of it is confined to much less than a half of their number; and even as to them it is but derivative, secondary, and contingent—never vesting in their own persons, or emerging till after their decease:—to say nothing of the share even of that indirect benefit which belongs to professors in universities, who have no control over church proceedings, or any responsibility on account of them. In the second place, the illegal proceedings complained of in certain church courts were the proceedings of a majority only of their constituent members—and not of a very overwhelming majority,—while it is also to be considered that these courts are by no means composed of clergymen exclusively, but have always in their body a very considerable proportion of lay members, who have not the most remote interest to increase the provisions for the widows of ministers. In the third place, the only actual interest in the fund which could possibly be affected by prolonging a vacancy in the parish of Auchterarder, was obviously nothing more than that share of the accruing stipend which could be divided among the existing widows—whose husbands must almost all have died before any of the exceptionable proceedings of the church courts had begun—and of that small additional number who might be expected to become widows during the continuance of that vacancy, and of whom a still smaller number (probably not six or seven on a large calculation) were likely to be left by any of the contumacious ministers. In the fourth place, and finally, it is not alleged by the noble pursuer, and is known indeed not to be the fact, that any part of the illegal proceedings complained of were adopted with a view to obtain the trifling contingent advantage which is now in question. It is matter of notoriety that these proceedings originated in views of a very different description; and which, however erroneous or indefensible in other respects, were so far from partaking of a mercenary character, that they were (and are) maintained at the imminent hazard of far greater temporal benefits to those who embrace them.

"There appears, therefore, to be nothing in this case to which the maxim of preventing a party from profiting by his wrong can possibly be applied. If it were not altogether excluded by the consideration last mentioned, there might perhaps be some plausible (though we think quite untenable*) ground for giving effect to it, in so far as to debar the widows of any of these who actually concurred in illegally prolonging the vacancy, from any share of the stipend thence accruing; but beyond this, the proposition is not even intelligible. To say that the previously existing widows, or the future widows of those who were altogether unconnected with, or had strenuously resisted the illegality,

* "If a father murders a childless elder brother, and suffers death for it, the son will still succeed to the property thus brought to him by an atrocious crime: Because it is no wrong of his own by which he profits. But the widow of a contumacious minister is as little chargeable with his contumacy, as such a son would be with the guilt of his parent; and a father has at least as great an interest to secure a provision to an only child, almost sure to survive him, as a husband can have to add to the provision of a wife, who is as likely as not to die before him. Neither the common law of succession, however, nor the general provisions of a Statute, can possibly be affected by the consideration of such an interest."

should also be excluded, because this addition to the fund had been obtained by the improper proceedings of other persons, would be as absurd as to say that the claim of the fund generally should be excluded, because the two last incumbents had been murdered by private enemies, and vacant stipend thus created to a far greater extent than would have existed if there had been no violation of the law. That additional vacant stipends have been so created, is a mere matter of fact, which cannot be got rid of by any reprobation of the proceedings to which they may owe their existence. There they are, and they must necessarily be given to somebody. There is no inherent taint or vitiū reale upon them, to make their appropriation immoral or disgraceful. The noble pursuer at least cannot think so since he now claims them for himself. It may possibly be right to withhold them from the wrong-doers who were in any way instrumental in their production; and if the law is indeed so curiously vindictive, even from those whose claim is in any way derived from or through these wrong-doers: But the innocent parties whose right to them is established by law, and who are no way connected with any but the innocent, surely cannot be so precluded: And the innocent widows of ministers who died before the alleged delinquencies were heard of,—of lay professors who neither did or could participate in them,—or of ministers who strenuously contended against them, are clearly preferable to the (not more innocent) patron, from whom they have been taken away and transferred by the unequivocal Act of the Legislature.

"On the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that the collector of the fund must be preferred in the multipointing; and his defences, as against the claim of the patron, sustained."

Lord Moncreiff:

"I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Jeffrey, and do not think it necessary to add much to it. But I cannot see any legal or judicial ground for a different result.

"The Statute 54 Geo. III. c. 169, enacts, 'that when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, resignation, or deprivation of an incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice of such parish, and that vacant stipend thereby arises subsequent to the crop and year 1813, such vacant stipend, so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes, shall thenceforth and in all time to come be levied in manner hereinafter mentioned, and paid to the said general collector, who is hereby authorised to levy and discharge the same, by himself, his deputies or factors, and he is also hereby authorised and required to apply the produce thereof to the purposes of this Act, under the directions of the trustees appointed to manage the said fund, any law, statute or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"The last minister of the parish of Auchterarder died on the 31st August 1834. By his death the parish became vacant. The statement of the parties in this cause is, that that vacancy has not been supplied by the ordination and admission of another minister into the cure and benefice. It seems also to be agreed, or, at any rate, is altogether indisputable, that if the Act of the 54th Geo. III. had not been passed, the pursuer would have had right to the stipends accruing as long as the vacancy was not supplied, distinctly as vacant stipends falling by law to him as patron. And it appears to me to be very clear, that he could have had no right to them on any other footing, and that no heritor could have been bound to pay the sum of stipend localised on his lands to the pursuer otherwise than as vacant stipend. Farther, it can admit of no doubt whatever, in my apprehension, that by the Statutes, all sums so drawn by the pursuer must have been applied by him for pious uses, according to the previous law and practice, (1685, c. 18; 1690, c. 23, &c.); and it may not be undeserving of notice, that by the former Statutes establishing the 'Ministers' Widows' Fund,' every patron so entitled to draw vacant stipend, was bound to pay a fixed sum out of it to the collector of that fund.

"That the existence of vacant stipend, to which eo nomine the patron had right, to be employed as the Statutes directed, was not held to be altered or impeded by any consideration of the causes which might have prolonged the actual or legal state of vacancy of the benefice, I should have thought to be very clear upon the terms of the Acts 1592, c. 117, and 1690, c. 23, taken together. But I apprehend that that matter of law stands authoritatively determined by repeated judgments of the Court. In the case of Auchtermuchty, it was found, that 'if a presbytery refuse a presentation duly tendered to them in favour of a qualified minister, against which presentation or presentee there is no legal objection, and admit another person to be minister, the patron has right to retain the stipend AS IN THE CASE OF A VACANCY;' (Moncrieff v. Manton, 15th February 1735; M. 9909). The circumstances of the case, when examined, render the application of it still clearer than the above short report of the point decided. And the same was substantially determined in the case of Culross, (Cochrane v. Officers of State, 26th June 1751; M. 9951); and in that of Lanark (by the House of Lords), in which last case the remedy of the Statutes, for an illegal refusal of a presentation, was thus again defined:—'That the benefice should remain with the patron as vacant till the Presbytery admit his presentee; and which indeed is saying no more than what is implied in the nature of his right, and in erat de jure, without such express provision;' (Dick v. Carmichael, 29th July 1752, and 2d March 1753; M. 9954 and 9955, &c.). Yet, in that case, the legal state of vacancy of the benefice did in fact subsist during many years, and it might have continued much longer if Dr Dick had not been translated to Edinburgh. It was precisely an example of a prolonged vacancy arising from a conflict between the civil and the ecclesiastical courts, by what was finally decided to be an illegal refusal of the church courts to admit a qualified presentee. There is no case to the contrary. For, as to the case of the College of Glasgow, it was so manifestly absurd to maintain that a vacancy could be created by the personal violence of a mob to an existing incumbent, that I own I should never have expected such a case to be founded on at all.

"The Statute 54 Geo. III. appears to me to transfer at once to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, as to a defined pious use, all the vacant stipends which the patrons had previously a right to retain or receive to be applied as the Statutes had directed. I consider the collector of that fund as a third party, altogether distinct from any presbytery or other church court, with rights definitely vested in him by positive Statute, to which it is the duty of this Court, as a court of law, to give due effect. I can find no legal ground of distinction between this vacant stipend and any other vacant stipend. The parish became vacant by the death of the incumbent; and whether the continuance of the state of vacancy has been occasioned by the neglect of the patron to present a qualified presentee, or by the judgment of the church courts finding his presentee disqualified on trial, or by the delay of the Presbytery to use the jus devolutum when it has fallen to them, or by the refusal of the Presbytery, on grounds found by the civil court to be illegal, to receive and take on trial a presentee assumed to be duly qualified; the effect in all and each of these cases alike is nothing but a prolonged vacancy of the parish, and the stipend emerging nothing but vacant stipend. It does not appear to me, that in this present question of strict law upon the Statute, viz., to whom the heritors are bound to pay that vacant stipend, there is any relevancy in the particular nature and state of the dispute which has occasioned the prolonged vacancy. Popular arguments may indeed be suggested; and if it belonged to this Court as a court of law, by any judgment in this question of special civil right, to interpret the statutory rights with reference to any probable effect on the state of other questions heretofore discussed or still in agitation, I could understand the views pressed on the Court by the pursuer. I cannot adopt such a principle of judgment; and how the pursuer can, in point of law, be entitled, as patron, to demand from the heritors sums of vacant stipend, which are by express Statute declared to belong to the Collector of the Widows' Fund, I am unable to understand. If such a case was not foreseen, that will not alter the law of the Statute as it stands. But it is very plain to me, that though the precise case was of course not contemplated, it must be presumed to have been well understood, that that which had often happened before might happen again,—that in consequence of proceedings by the Presbytery or other church courts which were found to be illegal, a state of vacancy of a parish might be prolonged far beyond the ordinary course of such an occurrence. Yet no exception or qualification is provided.

"With regard to the plea of personal exception, it appears to me to be altogether untenable as a legal ground of judgment, for the reasons which are well explained by Lord Jeffrey. But I may observe, in the first place, that if it had more solidity than it has, it is not obvious how such a personal exception could confer any title on Lord Kinnoull to demand these stipends from the heritors, which, on the very hypothesis of personal exception, are held to be legally allotted to the Widows' Fund; and in the second place, that it would equally apply to the small sum payable to the Widows' Fund from every vacant stipend under the former Acts of Parliament,—a matter, however, which would require a separate discussion."

Lord Justice-Clerk :

"The original consultation among the Judges having taken place before my appointment, I did not return any opinion when the opinions of the other Judges were given in in the course of the winter.

"In obedience to the interlocutor of 9th June, I have now to state my opinion.

"Generally, I concur in the first branch of Lord Cuninghame's opinion, and particularly in the view of the case indicated in the opinion of Lord Murray. I have only to regret that that latter opinion does not explain the grounds upon which the important distinction adverted to in the commencement of the opinion rests: That distinction appears to me to afford the true and solid ground for judgment, and a fuller explanation by his Lordship, would have relieved me from the necessity of stating, much more imperfectly than he would have done, the grounds of my opinion.

"The case of the Collector of the Widows' Fund is founded, in my opinion, on the plea that the patron's right to the fruits of the benefice, provided by the Statute 1592, c. 117, as a remedy to meet the case of the wrong therein contemplated, is in no respect different from the patron's ordinary right to apply to pious purposes what is termed in other Statutes vacant stipend;—and hence, that the Statute 1592, c. 117, though not so expressed, but on the contrary worded in terms peculiar to itself, must yet be so interpreted and restrained in its operation and consequences, and that the subsequent Act giving to the Widow's Fund the vacant stipend to which the patron in other cases had right, must be held to include the patron's right in this special case.

"I hold this plea to be without warrant in the words of the Act 1592, c. 117—to be untenable in respect of the violence which it does to the terms therein employed—and to be wholly inconsistent with the general effect of the statutory provisions in regard to the right of patronage. I hold the provision, annexed by the Act 1592, c. 117, to the power of collation given to presbyteries by the preceding chapter, to be a special remedy introduced—1. To prevent, if possible, a gross violation of statutory duty; 2. To provide (as far as possible) full compensation against the consequences of the individual wrong in each case; and, 3. By giving to the patron, when the wrong is committed, the right to retain the whole fruits of the benefice, to enable him to fulfil and give effect to his valid grant of the benefice and all its fruits to the presentee, whom the Statute supposes to be unjustly deprived of the same, and whose gift from the patron is supposed to be set at nought by the refusal of the presbytery to proceed on the same.

"If, then, it shall appear that the right secured to the patron by the Act 1592, c. 117, is a special remedy or compensation intended to meet the case of a special wrong, and is not, either in origin or by the terms of the Statute, connected with the ordinary common-law right of patrons to vacant stipends, subsequently restricted in use to pious uses, it is plain that it is only a special grant of what was thus given for such an object to the patron, that can ever carry to the collector the patron's right under the Act 1592, c. 117.

"The view which I take of the effect of the enactment in the Statute 1592, c. 117, is this:—

"After the Reformation, and before any statutory provision for securing the appointment of proper persons, the operation and legal effect of a right of patronage of a parish was, that the patron's presentation at once instituted a person into the church and parish. Whether in the first years after the Reformation, ordination was considered to be ecclesiastically necessary by the reformers, has not been cleared up. But the ministers had no check or control over the qualifications of the person presented by the patron. And, attached to Popery as many of the individual patrons were, as well as the Court of the Queen, and both often alike indifferent as to the character of those presented, this state of things, adverse to the advancement of reformed truth, and to the interests of religion, became the subject of earnest complaint by the reformers. These complaints very probably appeared to be, and might in truth be directed against patronage itself. But the necessity of an adequate check upon its exercise could not be disputed or resisted, and with a view to obviate the objections of the Court, and to remove all doubt as to their professed, and all fear as to their true object, the following message and explanation was submitted to the Queen on the part of the clergy in 1565:—‘Our mind is not that her Majesty, or any other patron, should be deprived of their just patronage; but we mean, whensoever her Majesty, or any other patron, do present any person into a benefice, that the person presented should be tried and examined by the judgment of learned men of the Church, such as are the present superintendants, and as the presentation into the benefice appertains unto the patron, so the collation by law and reason belongs unto the Church; and the Church should not be defrauded of the collation no more than the patrons of their presentation; for otherwise, if it be lawful to the patrons to present whom they please, without trial or examination, what can abide in the Church of God but mere ignorance?’

“At the commencement of the next reign, the Act 1567, c. 7, was passed:—‘It is statute and ordained by our Sovereign Lord, with advice of his dearest Regent and Three Estates of this present Parliament, that the examination and admission of ministers within this realme, be only in the power of the kirk, now openlie and publicly professed within the samine. The presentation of laic patronages alwaies reserved to the just and auncient patrones.’

“These and other provisions had been proposed by the Regent Murray in 1560, and the Estates of Parliament, before Queen Mary came over from France, but had never received the sanction of the Queen, nor had they become any part of the law of the land.

“It is necessary to attend to the character of the right of patronage, on the exercise of which this check was imposed. The vacancy is in the church and parish, and the patron nominates and presents (as in the present case) the presentee to be minister of the said parish and church, disposing to him the whole profits and rights of the church, while he serves the cure. The nomination of the patron comprehends and covers the right to the benefice, and to the office of minister of the parish. There are not two distinct and separate rights or offices. The minister has right to the benefice, and no one can have right to the benefice who has not been appointed minister—neither can any one be legally minister who has not right to the benefice.

“The patron then NOMINATES the minister to his office as minister of the parish, as indeed both the terms of the Statutes and the nature of the right completely prove. The idea of a separation is inconsistent with every legal view of the mode of instituting ministers to parishes; and accordingly, in the cases in which the Court withheld the right to the stipend from clergymen whom the Church had chosen illegally to induct, it was distinctly on the ground that such clergymen had not been validly nominated, and not been validly inducted. The Court, as the judgment in the case of Auchtermuchty expressly bears, has a power to ‘cognosce and determine upon the legality of the admission of ministers,’ to the effect of trying whether the person admitted can legally claim the character. The Court have not held that a person could be legally admitted into the office of minister, and yet not have right to the benefice. The Court went exactly upon the opposite view, and denied the right to the benefice, because the party was not legally admitted to the office of minister, though inducted by the church court.

“Independently then of the provision made for securing a due examination of the persons presented, the patron’s presentation fills up the benefice—fills up the office of minister. He (the patron) has no other act to perform—his gift passes the full right to the church and parish during the lifetime or incumbency of the presentee. There remains nothing to be done by, or to emanate from, the patron in order to supply the vacancy. He nominates to the office of minister. No other person has any right of nomination. The right to the benefice is the consequence of his right of nomination. The vacancy then is supplied. And whatever provision may be made to try the qualification of the officer, the vacancy cannot in law subsist, so far as the exercise of the right of patronage is regarded, after the patron has completed and issued that gift from him, which nominates to the office, and is the sole foundation of the enjoyment of the office. On the contrary, the function of the patron is exhausted and fulfilled:—So far as he is concerned, and the right discharge of his duty is to be carried through, he has filled up the office, and discharged the duty which the nature of the right and law impose on him. That by special Statute the gifts and qualities of the presentee are to be tried by the presbytery, before he shall be allowed to enter on the duties, or personally draw the stipend of the office, or that the presentee’s title to obtain the benefits of the office may not be completed, does not bear on this point. That is a check on the patron’s due exercise of his right. The office is filled up by the nomination. And if the presentee is not rejected as disqualified on trial,—if the presbytery refuse to try,—even the due exercise of the patron’s right cannot be called in question.

“Now, attending to the first Statute 1567, c. 7, and to the subsequent Statute 1592, c. 116, and the later Statute of Queen Anne, what is truly in point of principle the effect of the introduction of these provisions as to the examination and admission of ministers on the patron’s act of nomination?

“The well-known words of the Statute 1592, c. 116 appear to me to place this matter beyond the reach of controversy. That Statute, after repeating previous provisions conceived nearly in similar terms respecting bishops, ‘ordains all presentations to Benefices to be direct to the particular Presbyteries in all time cumming, with full power to give collation thereupon, &c.,—providing the foresaid Presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit quhatsumever qualified minister presented be his Majesty or laick patrones.’

“It is thus manifest, that the power given by Statute to the Church, as a check on the exercise of the right of patronage, for the purpose of enabling the Church, by examination, to secure the selection of fit and qualified persons, was not bestowed on the Church as a means of restricting to any extent the legal effect of the act of nomination to the office of minister of the parish, but solely to secure a due trial of the fitness of the presentee,—not in the opinion of the patron alone, but in the opinion of the presbytery. But the power so bestowed on the Church was not created and given as any concurrent power in the nomination to the office of minister, but solely enabled and directed a particular body to try the qualities of the person previously and validly nominated to the office. This is a very special, and peculiar, and limited provision—most effectual, if righteously used for its purpose, but altogether unconnected with the act of nomination to the office; and so the Court and House of Lords held in the case of Gillon, to be afterwards noticed, although the presentee in that case might not have been admitted when he came to be tried. In the meantime the patron nominates to, and fills up the office and benefice. The presentee must pass certain trials, and may be rejected. But the theory and legal view of the case is, that the presentee is nominated to the office by the patron, if not rejected on these trials.

“But further—this power of examination bestowed by the Legislature is given, and is to be exercised, only under a distinct, peremptory, and emphatic statutory condition. No power simply of rejection is given. It is a power of examination. Accordingly the Act of 1592, c. 116, after bestowing the power, goes on—‘PROVIDING the presbyteries be bound and astricted to receive and admit’ every qualified minister presented.

“The import of this is—to provide, that if they claim the power, they must exercise it—they must take trial: If they do not—if they illegally, wrongfully, and in defiance of Statute, refuse to take trial, then the result is, that the direction and condition given as a means of checking abuse in the exercise of patronage, can no longer, under the Statute, take effect, so as to impair the full legal consequences of the patron's act of nomination. The want of examination and admission cannot be pleaded against the act of nomination, if the Presbytery illegally will not exercise its duty, and illegally refuse to try whether the presentee is qualified or not.

"It is very true that the presentee may not, by reason of the illegal refusal to try him, and to receive and admit him (if qualified), be able to perform the duties of the office. His title as the officer appointed may not be perfected so as to enable him (consistently with the provisions introduced as to the trial of his qualifications) at once to enter to or on the office, and to draw its emoluments. But that is a very different and distinct matter altogether from the effect of the patron's nomination in filling up the office, so that it can no longer be held in law to be vacant. A presbytery, by illegally refusing to enter on the trials of the qualities of the person nominated, commits wrong to him and wrong to the parish, by not enabling him to perform the duties if they should think him qualified. But the consequences of their illegal refusal to perform their duties cannot be pleaded against the full effect of the nomination to the office, merely because the wrong may be irremediable to the extent that the person injured cannot perform the duties or obtain the perquisites of the office. When the presbytery illegally refuses to try, I apprehend that the condition of their power of examination ceases, as any limitation on the act of nomination, or even on the selection of the individual—although it is true that he must suffer some injury, and may not be able to enter on the discharge of his duties. But there are many analogous cases where a person may be wronged to the extent of not being able to enter on the discharge of the duties of an office, though his nomination to it is complete, and is sustained by decree. There are many cases of similar wrong; e. g., after decree is pronounced in a declarator of marriage, the woman is to all legal effects the wife of the defender, but may not be received as such, or enabled to perform any of her duties.

"The case of the Duke of Gordon v. Gillon affords a good illustration of these principles—elementary indeed, but of late wholly lost sight of in many of these discussions. When an heritor brings a process of valuation or approbation, the benefice must be represented—else the proceedings are null, and may be subsequently reduced at the instance of the minister. If the parish is vacant, the moderator of the Presbytery, by established form, following on the plain meaning of the Act 1633, c. 19, must be called as a defender, in order to protect the interests of the modified stipend. In the case referred to, a presentation was issued by the patron before Lord Fife executed his summons of approbation, and he executed the summons against the presentee, whose presentation had been laid before the presbytery and sustained, exactly as Mr Young had been: But the presentee was not inducted for more than three months after the execution of the summons. In a subsequent challenge of the decree of approbation obtained in that process, it was contended—'2d, That although the presentation was prior to the date of execution, yet, as the induction was posterior to it, the church was therefore vacant, and the moderator of the presbytery ought to have been called, which was not done.'

"The answer made was—'2d, That the church was not vacant, because the presentation had been sustained prior to the execution, and therefore Mr Gillon was the proper party to be called.'—(See Shaw's Teind Cases.)

"The point was fully discussed in the Court of Teinds, and, as the late Lord President's papers bear, it was decided 'with a full bench.' The point was argued anxiously, and is noticed very fully in the late Lord President's note-book, in his summary of the case, as a prominent point in the cause. The case was again raised very fully on appeal. And both in this Court and in the House of Lords it was found, that there was no vacancy so as to require the moderator to be called, and that the presentee was the proper party to be cited, as having the true interest in the stipend of the benefice by the patron's nomination.

"The application of this case to the view I am now stating is direct and important. If the parish had been vacant the benefice would have been undefended, and the decree subsequently challenged would have been good for nothing. That is a clear point. In the challenge of the decree, this point then came to be a matter of the greatest importance to the minister, and it appears to me to have brought to trial the very question on which the present case must be decided. If the parish was vacant in the proper and legal sense of the term—if the legal vacancy continued till induction—if the nomination by the patron to the office of minister did not fill up the benefice,—then the presentee was not the proper party to defend the interest of the same:—Whereas the Duke of Gordon contended that the presentee was properly called as a defender in the character of minister of Speymouth.' The plea of the minister was stated in the words of Erskine (B. II. t. 10, § 35), 'that where an action of valuation is brought during a vacancy in a church, the proprietor must cite the moderator of a presbytery as a defender,' and a very anxious and elaborate argument is maintained in the printed pleadings both in this Court and in the House of Lords, to prove that the parish was vacant 'legally and virtually,' notwithstanding the patron's presentation, and that any other view was quite contrary to 'our ecclesiastical constitution.' The pleadings are in fact very full and most anxiously stated on the point.

"On the issue thus raised—directly I think on the very point on which this case must depend—judgment was given to the effect that the parish was not vacant, and that the proper party against whom to execute the summons and to make the defender, as in right of, and entitled and sufficient to protect the interests of, the benefice, was—not the moderator of the presbytery (undoubtedly the proper defender in the case of a vacancy) but—the presentee, although he might never have been inducted, but might have been legally and validly rejected after trial as disqualified.

"This decision is a judgment on the effect of the patron's act of nomination under the operation of the Statutes giving to the Church the power of examination and admission.

"Foreseeing the risk—at least in individual cases—that presbyteries, being composed of men liable to err and to commit injustice, might refuse to perform their duty, and refuse to receive and admit those whom they could not pronounce unqualified, the next Statute of the same year, 1592, c. 117, enacted, 'Providing always, in case the presbytery refuses to admit any qualified minister presented to them by the patron, it shall be lawful for the patron to retain the hail fruits of the said benefice in his own hands.' Acts, I., p. 611.

"There is not one word in this enactment which implies that the Legislature held the benefice to be still vacant in the event of the wrong being done against which this remedy is given. I think the enactment manifestly proceeds on the view above stated, that the patron has nominated to the benefice, and that it is not vacant—though the presentee has not been allowed to enter on the performance of its duties.

"In order to secure the benefit arising from the Church's province and duty of examination, and of admission, it necessarily followed that the presentee could not himself receive the right directly to draw the fruits of the benefice. The patron might concur with the Presbytery in thinking the person legally rejected: Plainly there were many reasons why there could not be bestowed on the presentee the right to draw the fruits of the benefice, however gross the wrong done by the presbytery in refusing to do its duty. In order, therefore, to secure the full effect of the patron's grant to him of the whole fruits of the benefice, it became necessary to provide that the patron should have right to retain them—not for pious purposes but in his own hands—so that he might be able to give effect to his own grant to the presentee, and thereby prevent as far as possible the injury done to the latter.

"It appears to me that this provision has no sort of analogy whatever to the ordinary common-law right of patrons to draw vacant stipend, under certain obligations by subsequent Statutes as to its use. The provision is worded in terms quite different from any of the provisions applicable to vacant stipends. It is introduced as a remedy against wrong in favour of the party who has done his duty,—whose right is illegally invaded, and to whose nomination effect has been illegally refused. It is introduced, I think, to remove the obstacle to the rights to the stipend and to other emoluments of the minister, which the non-serving of the cure might have created,—and, in respect of the illegal conduct of the presbytery, to give the patron power to keep the whole fruits of the benefice entire and secure from the Church or any one settled by them.

"I think this remedy cannot be assimilated to the common-law right to vacant stipend. If the parish was vacant, then, in 1592, the patron had by common law the right to the vacant stipend, and the Statute was useless. But to admit the parish to be vacant would have been inconsistent with the view taken of the patron's right of nomination, and with the duty imposed on the presbytery. Accordingly, there is not one expression in either Statute, the c. 116, or c. 117 of 1592, which implies the notion of the parish remaining legally vacant.

"Again, the patron is expressly empowered, as a compensation, to retain the whole fruits of the benefice in his own hands. Now these being the express words of the enactment, giving that right as a special compensation against a special wrong, I am of opinion that subsequent Statutes, directing the use of vacant stipends to pious purposes (which Statutes may be fully satisfied by application to other cases of frequent occurrence), cannot be reasonably construed to take away by implication this remedy against special wrong. I think, that in order to authorise such a construction, the Act 1592, c. 117, must be specially referred to, before its repeal is to be presumed. The deduction in Lord Medwyn's opinion plainly shows that the subsequent Acts could not refer to the Act 1592, c. 117: And I venture to draw an opposite conclusion from that which he states as to these Statutes.

"The first of the subsequent Acts, 1661, c. 52, proceeds on the narrative, that prior Statutes had described vacant stipends to be employed to pious purposes. Probably it is only the rescinded Act that is referred to. But at all events this Statute professes only to apply to Statutes which expressly directed the use for pious purposes. Then it plainly does not refer to the Act 1592, c. 117, which imposes no such obligation.

"But taking the rescinded Act 1644, c. 20, as the model of these enactments, and attending to the terms of the whole of them, it appears to me to be plain that they are Statutes regulating the common-law right of patrons to vacant stipends. The cases which they enumerate are all cases of proper vacancies—cases in which the patron had at common law the right to the vacant stipend. They do not profess to bestow any right, but only to regulate an acknowledged right. Their terms appear to me to be wholly inapplicable to the special remedy given to the patron by 1592, c. 117. The Statutes as to pious uses mention and describe the occurrences by which vacant stipend can arise; and none of these occurrences or events can by any force of language include the illegal refusal of the Presbytery to receive the presentee. The examination of these Statutes, and the comparison of their terms with the enactment 1592, c. 117, convince my mind that the Statutes directing the use of vacant stipend to pious purposes, do not include the case specially provided for by the Act 1592, c. 117.

"I am of opinion that there is no analogy whatever between this special provision and the common-law right of patrons in other cases, to retain vacant stipends to which a certain proper and reasonable condition was annexed, of applying them to pious purposes. I do not see in the Statute the slightest vestige of authority for the proposition, that the remedy given to the patrons by 1592, c. 117, was given under the obligation, and limited to the object of securing the application of the stipend to pious purposes.

"Other Statutes provide expressly for vacant stipends going to pious purposes. There are many cases in which there is vacant stipend. The Act 1592, c. 117, does not, directly or indirectly, imply that the benefice is vacant: it does not call the stipend vacant: It is not limited to stipend, which it does not mention. It applies to the whole fruits of the benefice, —manse, glebe, and all other fruits (which at that time might not be limited to a stipend, for there were no modified stipends;) and then it expressly gives the patron right to retain these in his own hands. Contrast these terms with the other Statutes referred to, and the marked peculiarity of phraseology is such as to my mind plainly excludes the notion, that application to pious purposes was intended by 1592, c. 117.

"The argument, therefore, on the effect of the Statutes as to the Widows' Fund, founded on its application to cases of ordinary vacant stipend, and on the substitution of that fund for pious purposes, makes no impression on my mind. It proceeds on a misapprehension of the nature of the enactment in the Statute 1592, c. 117. It proceeds on an assumption, for which I see no authority, that we must read the provision in that Statute, not in the way and to the effect calculated to prevent the wrong and advance the remedy, but must introduce and interpolate an obligation on the patron as to the use of the fruits of the benefice, which will render the provision ineffectual in order to prevent, and worthless in order to compensate, wrong. Such an interpolation seems to me to be altogether unwarrantable. The Statute had bestowed a great check on the exercise of the patron's right: But it also directed and prescribed the duty of those in whose hands the check was placed. To prevent the wrong that might result from perverse and illegal abuse of that trust—to take away one great temptation to commit the wrong, and to secure to the party injured all the benefits which could be secured to him,—another provision was made, giving to the patron, when the wrong was committed, right to retain in his own hands the whole fruits of the benefice.

"The Statute gives no warrant for attaching to that remedy the obligation and limitation for which the collector contends. Such a construction is adverse to every sound principle of interpretation—overlooks the reason for the statutory declaration in question—disregards the special terms in which it is provided; and above all, rests on an interpolation and addition to the terms of the statutory enactment, attended with this remarkable peculiarity, that it renders unavailing the remedy, and denies effect to the compensation actually and directly given by the words of the Statute.

"When the Court, in one of the cases in the early part of last century, found that the stipend might be retained in the case of similar wrong, as in the case of a vacancy, I regard the terms of that interlocutor as denoting (when they came to act for the first time, probably, on an ancient enactment), that they intended to mark that the retention was to be as complete as if there was a vacancy,—that (there being no question before them as to reducing the induction of the person illegally settled) he could not have right any more than if there was a vacancy; and that, quoad him and the presbytery, the fruits of the benefice were to remain with the patron as completely as if he had not been settled, and as if the parish were vacant. But no question then occurred as to what the patron was to do with the fruits. The minister illegally settled by the presbytery wished to get the stipend, and the Court found, as with him, that the patron was entitled to RETAIN the stipend as in a vacancy. That was a judgment only as to the retention, viz., that it was to be complete and absolute against him. But the terms of the interlocutor implied nothing at all as to any obligation on the patron in respect to the use of the fruits so retained.

"But any reasoning on this incidental expression in the terms of this interlocutor, or any speculation as to the sense in which the Court used (obiter certainly) this expression, is of little avail, if the words of the Statute do not authorise any such limitation on the patron's right. The Court is bound to give full effect to the express remedy and compensation provided against a special wrong: And that remedy declares that the patron is to retain the whole fruits of the benefice in his own hands. I cannot read this to mean that he is not to be entitled so to retain them in his own hands, but must apply them for pious purposes. If so, then that is no compensation for the wrong done—none whatever.

"I observe it is stated in an opinion, signed by some of the Judges, that in the cases of Auchtermuchty, Culross and Lanark; and other cases, the patron 'has been held bound to apply the stipend to pious purposes.' I am not aware to what judgments, or to what opinions of the Court this statement refers, and there must, I think, be some misapprehension. In all these cases the question was with a person illegally settled by the presbytery, who claimed the stipend in virtue of his alleged character as minister of the parish. His claim was rejected, and the patron preferred. But I am not aware that the question was ever discussed as to what the patron was bound to do with the vacant stipend, or that any opinion was ever expressed on the point—decided it could not be, for there were no parties with whom it could arise. The tradition is, that the presentee of the Crown received the stipend in the case of Lanark; and the statements in regard to the Zetland case seemed fully to prove not only that Lord Dundas's presentee occupied the manse and glebe, but had received from him the stipend.

"Such being the general view I take of the patron's right and act of nomination, and of the various Statutes which the Legislature has passed—dealing with the question, as the collector admits we must do, as a question of law and of statutory enactment—What are the facts in the present case?

"I must shortly recapitulate them, for they are decisive, in my opinion, of the point at issue under the general view above stated.

"This Court and the House of Lords found,

"1. That the Earl of Kinnoull has legally, validly, and effectually exercised his right as patron of the church and parish of Auchterarder, by presenting the pursuer, the said Robert Young, to the said church and parish.

"2. That the Presbytery of Auchterarder did REFUSE, and CONTINUE to REFUSE, to take trial of the qualifications of the said Robert Young, and have rejected him as presentee to the said church and parish, on the sole ground (as they admit on the record) that a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the said parish, have dissented without any reason assigned, from his admission as minister.

"3. That the said Presbytery in so doing have acted to the HURT AND PREJUDICE of the said pursuers, ILLEGALLY, and in violation of their duty, and contrary to the provisions of the Statute of 10 Anne, c. 12, intituled 'An Act to restore patrons to the ancient rights of presenting ministers to the churches vacant in that part of Great Britain called Scotland.'

"No remarks can add to the force of these emphatic findings.

"By a subsequent and final interlocutor, quoted in the pursuer's case, the Lord Ordinary found, as the legal results from these facts—

"1. That the Presbytery are still bound and astricted to make trial of the qualifications of the pursuer, the Reverend Robert Young, as presentee to the church and parish of Auchterarder.'

"2. And if in their judgment, after trial and examination in common form, he is found qualified, to receive and admit him as minister of the said church and parish, according to law.'

"These various findings ascertain the facts of the case.

"The result is, according to the view which I have stated, that,

"1. The patron has nominated to the office.

"2. That the Presbytery has (according to the contingency contemplated and guarded against) refused to perform the duty and discharge the obligation which was made the condition of entrusting the presbyteries with the power of examination and admission, and has committed the wrong against which, by way of remedy and prevention, a compensation was given by Statute.

"Consistently with the above findings—if my view of the nature of the patron's right of nomination be correct, and if it is supported, as it plainly is, by the above decision—How can it be maintained that the parish and church of Auchterarder is now vacant?

"I apply to that notion all the ordinary tests by which a vacancy is characterised.

"Is Lord Kinnoull bound to present another?—which, if there was a vacancy, he would be bound to do. That cannot be pretended. The judgment excludes the notion.

"Is he entitled to present another? The judgment fixes that point.

"How is the parish vacant? By what occurrence? or from what date? By the death, or from the death of the late incumbent? That cannot be maintained, for the judgment expressly finds that the patron has effectually and validly nominated to the office.

"Is the Presbytery to call on the patron for another presentee? That cannot be maintained under the judgments.

"Is the Presbytery entitled to hold that the parish is vacant and to present, tantum jure devoluto, in virtue of the Statute made and provided against the patron's default to provide a proper person? That cannot be contended.

"Again—Is there delay merely between the presentation and the trials of the presentee—a case in which the law holds no wrong to be done? On the contrary, the judgment finds that the Presbytery have refused to act: The judgment no longer leaves matters as if the Presbytery were proceeding to do what is to institute the presentee into the cure and charge of the parish, and so remove, as it were, the continuance of the vacancy. It ascertains a wrong. And the matter is now to be considered in reference to the patron's valid act of nomination, sustained by decree, where effect is illegally denied to that nomination. Delay then is not the case; and if the rejection of the presentee was illegal, as the judgment finds, the parish is not vacant, but validly filled up.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

"Try the case by any conceivable test, and in what way can it be held that the church and parish is vacant. True the presentee has not been admitted to serve the cure. But that is the wrong done. The patron was bound to present a person to the church and parish who was to serve the cure. He has done so. The Presbytery exclude him. But that wrong does not make a vacancy. Serving the cure is not a test of the parish and church being vacant.

"After effectual nomination to the office there can be no vacancy. It is true that the presentee cannot enter on the discharge of his duties (assuming that ordination is necessary);—But why? The judgments of the House of Lords and of the Court answer that inquiry—by reason of the Presbytery's illegal refusal to take trial of his qualities, and wrongful refusal to perform a clear statutory duty.

"Does that wrong destroy the effect of the patron's nomination—in itself complete and perfect—and in this case declared to be effectual by solemn decree? I apprehend not. As the Presbytery will not—and wrongfully and illegally will not—ascertain whether the presentee is qualified, the result is, that the non-performance of their duty being a wrong, cannot be pleaded against the patron's nomination to any effect whatever, or be allowed in any degree to deny effect to it—though it is true that the individual may not be able, by reason of that wrong, to serve the cure. He is presented in order to serve. He is ready and able, and must be presumed to be competent to serve the cure. That is the duty of which the patron must afford the performance. He has provided the person, by presenting to the church and parish. But on what legal ground can the exclusion—the wrongful exclusion—of that presentee from serving the cure, cause or continue a vacancy in the church and parish to which he is legally and effectually nominated? It is plain that in the collector's argument there is a confusion both of terms and of things.

"No difficulty is encountered in consequence of the rules, —some statutory, some equitable—introduced as to vacant stipend, as it is termed, in order to cover and provide for the interval which may elapse—greater or less—between the issuing of the presentation and the date of admission. Delay, more or less, must often occur. The law does not inquire curiously into the causes of such delay. It presumes the church courts are in the course of going through necessary forms, and that there is no illegal wrong—and hence the patron is not supposed to be injured—and the stipend, though in the hands of the patron, was appropriated in such cases to pious uses, and after a certain term, to the Widows' Fund by Dr Nicoll's Act. But in this case it has been found that wrong has been done by an illegal act: It has been found—not that there has been wrong from delay, even wilful delay, but that effect has altogether been denied to the act of nomination, by a wilful and illegal wrong by the Presbytery—a wrong intended and devised in order to deny effect to the nomination, and to keep out the presentee from serving the cure.

"Although, therefore, in the common case, the stipend, in the event of delay, was not to be retained by the patron (for the time necessary to settle was taken to be no improper delay), but to be applied to pious purposes, such obligation had no application to such a case as that established by the judgments pronounced in this cause. The case has occurred for which a compensation was provided by the terms of the provision in 1592, c. 117. I see no warrant for denying effect to that compensation, by converting it into an obligation which destroys it as any compensation.

"Attending to the facts above stated, I am of opinion that the fruits of the benefice, which, by the Statute 1592, c. 117, the patron (in whose right alone the collector can claim) is entitled to.

VOL. XIV.—No. XXXIX.

titled to retain, cannot be brought within the description of vacant stipend arising from any of the causes and in any of the predicaments mentioned in the recent Statute on which the claim of the collector rests.

"I do not think that it is seriously contended, that under the words of the Act 1592, c. 117, there was an obligation to apply the fruits of the benefice to pious purposes. Now it is necessary to settle, in the first instance, what was the import of that enactment. If it did not impose the obligation of applying them to pious purposes, and if the right to retain in his own hands was given as a compensation, then what is the reasonable construction to apply to the subsequent Statutes directing the patrons to apply vacant stipend to pious purposes? If there could be no vacant stipend in any case unless by holding the case specially provided for by the Act 1592, c. 117, to be vacant stipend, then necessity might require the later Statutes to apply to that prior one. But they may all receive effect and their terms be fully satisfied without any such application. Accordingly, these acts refer to kirks that are vacant and not already disposed of, or which shall vaik by decease, deposition, suspension, translation, or any otherwise. Now, if the church is not in this case vacant by any of these causes, these Acts as to vacant stipends do not apply. And the very same remark applies to the Widows' Fund Act, which takes effect 'when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, resignation or deprivation of an incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice of such parish, and that vacant stipend thereby arises.' But, secondly, if the Statute 1592, c. 117, of itself contained no obligation to apply the fruits of the benefice to pious purposes, and if it was a direct compensation given for a special wrong, general Statutes not providing for the special case of wrong at all, but dealing with an ordinary and fair case in which a patron had really no justifiable claim to use and employ the fruits of the benefice, cannot be taken to deprive him of the remedy and compensation given him by a previous Statute as a means of preventing a statutory wrong? The subsequent Acts do not mention 1592, c. 117. They do not extend to it by implication. They do not cover it by the reason, and purpose, and intentment of the provision which they introduce. They relate to cases where there was no wrong and no injury. The Act 1592, c. 117, contemplated a wrong and an injury. It provided a preventive, and it gave a compensation. To hold that the subsequent Acts, not applicable to the case of wrong, must take away the compensation and impair the preventive, although that Statute is not mentioned or referred to, seems to me to be inconsistent with sound principles of construction, and adverse to the policy manifest upon the face of all the Statutes.

"I am of opinion that it required a special and express enactment in a subsequent Statute to deprive patrons of the remedy and compensation given to them—1592, c. 119; and that when another party claims from the patron the fruits of the benefice, and claims it, too, as in his right under that very Statute, he must show an express gift, taking the benefit away from the patron, and giving it to him.

"Observe the great peculiarity of this case. No question is raised as to the subsistence and validity of the Statute 1592, c. 117, against the Church, in the event of the wrong being done thereby provided against. It is not said that the remedy is not to take effect, or that the provision is not a remedy introduced to provide compensation for great and flagrant wrong. Dr Gordon joins with Lord Kinnoull in holding the wrong to be flagrant—in contending for the statutory remedy, and for the statutory compensation against the wrong done by the Presbytery. But he says that the compensation has been given to him for the Widows' Fund, and given (he says) by form of a transference to him of vacant stipends, generally speaking, which the patron had no right to enjoy, but could only apply to pious purposes. Can Dr Gordon claim this, which was a patrimonial and direct compensation to patrons, without showing an express and special gift of it in express terms? The reason and object of the Widows' Fund Act does not reach the case. The vacant stipends, specially described as to the cause of their becoming vacant—(transferred to Dr Gordon)—could not be applied individually by the patron for the benefit of himself or any individual. He had them in trust for pious purposes. They really were of no use to him;—if not an heritor in the parish, really of no use whatever;—and if an heritor, the relief from any parochial burden, by their application, was too inconsiderable to amount to any personal interest. Hence the transference of them to the Widows' Fund, also a pious and benevolent purpose, in truth only relieved the patrons from a troublesome trust, leading often to disputes. But the Act 1592, c. 117, gave the fruits of the benefice to the patrons as a compensation for injury. The reason of Dr Nicoll's Act does not extend to such a case; and I am of opinion that the collector cannot take away from the patron this compensation or patrimonial benefit given to repair individual wrong, without showing express gift of the fruits of benefice when such wrong is done, by special transference to him of the benefit of the Statute.

"In short, Dr Gordon only claims as in right of the patron under this particular Statute, and he must show express gift to the fund of compensation thereby provided in order to redress individual injury.

"Holding, as the collector does, that the refusal of the Presbytery is an illegal act, he contends that the patrons must have contemplated and intended to give up this remedy and check against such wrong.

"Indeed, when he claims, as in right of the patron, under the Statute 1592, c. 117, he must contend that such was the intention with which Dr Nicoll's Act was framed. That view of the intention with which Dr Nicoll's Act was framed and assented to by the patrons, might of itself afford rather a formidable obstacle to the plea of the collector.

"I am of opinion that the defences of the collector in the one process, and his claim in the other, ought to be repelled."

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In conformity with the opinions of the majority of the whole Court—Repel the defences stated for the Rev. Dr Robert Gordon, as Collector of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, and discern and declare in favour of the pursuer, the Earl of Kinnoull, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and allow this decree to go out and be extracted ad interim: Find the defender, the said Robert Gordon, as collector foresaid, liable to the said Earl in expenses," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Murray.—Act. Whigham; Storie and Baillie, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Grant; Inglis and Wedderburn, W.S., Agents.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

19th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 268.—The HERITORS and KIRK-SESSION of the PARISH of CRIEFF, Advocators, v. The HERITORS and KIRK-SESSION of the PARISH of LITTLE DUNKELD and MONZIEVAIRD, Respondents.

Poor.—Settlement.—Statutes, 1579, c. 74; 1672, c. 18.—Aliment.—Bastard.—In a question between several parishes as to which was bound to support a pauper lunatic, it was proved or admitted, as to one of them, that the lunatic had come within the bounds fourteen days after Martinmas 1823, and resided there till Martinmas 1826, being three solar years, less fourteen days—Held (1.) That this did not constitute a settlement in law, so as to subject that particular parish in support of the pauper: (2.) That the parish in which the mother of a bastard had acquired a settlement, was liable in the aliment and support of the bastard, in a question between that parish and the parish of the birth of the child.

Process.—Reclaiming Note.—Competency.—Special circumstances in which a party not expressly comprehended in the prayer of a reclaiming note, was nevertheless held to be so, and was accordingly bound to discuss with the reclaiming the question on the merits, involved in the reclaiming note.

Margaret Duff, a pauper lunatic, committed an assault in the parish church of Monzievaired on the person of one of the parishioners, at the dismissal of the congregation after divine service, in consequence of which she was apprehended in September 1833, and lodged in jail, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Perthshire, and thereafter consigned to Murray's Royal Asylum for lunatics by orders of Court. The kirk-session and heritors of the parish of Monzievaird having advanced and borne the expense attendant on the apprehension and confinement of the lunatic, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire against the heritors and respective kirk-sessions of the parishes of Little Dunkeld and Fowlis-Wester, subsuming,

"That by the laws of this kingdom, the parish where paupers and lunatics requiring to be maintained at the public expense had their last legal settlement are bound to support such paupers and lunatics, and to free and relieve other parishes of that burden: That while it is doubtful whether it is quite certain that she had settlement in one or other of those parishes, the said Margaret Duff had her last legal settlement in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, or in that of Little Dunkeld, but the kirk-session and heritors of those respective parishes have hitherto refused not only to make payment to the pursuers of the sums of money hitherto advanced by them for behoof of the said Margaret Duff, with interest as aftermentioned, but also to free and relieve them of the burden of supporting her in time to come, though repeatedly desired and required so to do: Therefore, the said defenders, the members of the kirk-sessions and heritors of the said parishes of Fowlis-Wester and Little Dunkeld, or the members of the kirk-session and heritors of such of the said parishes as shall be found to be legally liable to have supported and maintained, and to support and maintain the said Margaret Duff, ought and should be decreed and ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the said sum of £38. 10s. 8d. Sterling, advanced by them at sundry times, for and on account of the said Margaret Duff, together with the legal interest of the said sum from the date at which the advances thereof were made, and in time coming during the non-payment, and to free and relieve the pursuers of the expense of maintaining and supporting the said Margaret Duff in time coming, by taking the same upon themselves; and farther, the members of the said kirk-session and heritors of the said respective parishes of Fowlis-Wester and Little Dunkeld, or the members of the kirk-session and heritors of such of the said parishes as shall be found to be legally liable to have supported and maintained, and to support and maintain the said Margaret Duff, ought and should be decreed and ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the expenses of process, and of extracting the decree," &c.

In the condescendence for the pursuers it was stated, "1. That Catherine Duff, the lunatic, was born at Tomnagrew, in the parish of Little Dunkeld, where her father occupied a small farm, on the 9th of September 1804. Her father died before she was born, and her mother removed from Tomnagrew at the following Whitsunday (1805), carrying her child, the said Catherine Duff, with her to Dullater, in the parish of Fowlis-Wester. 2. In the year 1818, she was a servant to James Duff, smith in Chapelhill of Logiealmond, in the parish of Monzie, where she remained till Martinmas that year. 3. From Martinmas 1818 till spring 1819, she resided with an aunt in the parish of Crieff, where she engaged in the service of John Scott of Tulchan, in the parish of Fowlis-Wester. 4. In 1820, Duff was a servant to James, Peddie at Condloch, in the same parish; and in 1821, she was living as a servant to widow Steel at Laggan Allachie, in the parish of Little Dunkeld; and in 1822, she was engaged in the service of a farmer at Grandtully. 5. In 1823, the said Catherine Duff was again in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, a servant to M'Ara at Connachan, whose service she left ten days after the term of Martinmas that year, and went to reside in family with her aunt in Crieff, where she continued till the 5th day of April 1824, when she entered to the service of a Mr M'Culloch, in the neighbourhood and parish of Crieff, and continued there till Martinmas 1824. 6. At the term of Martinmas 1824, she then entered to the service of Mr Kay, Callander, parish of Crieff, and continued therein till Whitsunday 1825, when she went to Mr Clerk at Ferntower, Crieff, where she resided till Martinmas 1825. 7. At Martinmas 1825, she entered to the service of Mr Caw of Millnab, in the parish of Crieff, where she continued till Martinmas 1826. 8. At the term of Martinmas 1826, the said Catherine Duff went into the service of Mr Gardiner at Trowan, in the parish of Monzievaird, where she continued till Martinmas 1827, when she entered to the service of Mungo M'Ewan at Drummondernoch, in the same parish, and continued therein till March 1829. 9. In March 1829, she entered to the service of Mr Barclay at Dachirla, in the parish of Muthil, where she continued till Martinmas that year, when she entered the service of Mr M'Leish at Cultycheldoch, in the parish of Muthil, and continued therein till September 1831, when she became a confirmed lunatic, and took to roaming the country at large, without selecting any fixed residence."

The kirk-session of Fowlis-Wester having investigated the matter, as advised by the Sheriff, admitted the history of the residence of the pauper as given by the pursuers, with the exception of the exact time at which she left the service of M'Ara at Connachan, or the exact period when she left the service of Caw at Millnab, and entered that at Trowan; and they pleaded that they were not liable, as the pauper had never resided for three years in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, nor acquired any legal settlement there.

The kirk-session of Little Dunkeld, who also investigated the history of the lunatic, admitted the statement of the pursuers, with the following addition and exceptions:—"1. With the addition to article first, that from the year 1805, when the lunatic went to Dullater in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, to the year 1818, when she became a servant to James Duff, as stated in article second, she and her mother continued to live in Dullater foresaid, in the parish of Fowlis-Wester. 2. With the exception of that part of article fifth, as to the exact time that the lunatic left the service of M'Ara at Connachan. This allegation the defenders deny, and aver that the lunatic left M'Ara's service before the term of Martinmas 1823. 3. With the exception also of that part of articles seventh and eighth, as to the exact period of her leaving Mr Caw's service and entering Mr Gardiner's;"—and they pleaded, 1. That the parish in which a person requiring to be supported from the poors' funds had last an industrial residence of three years, is the parish bound to support that pauper. 2. Little Dunkeld parish not being the original parish of the pauper lunatic, or if so, she having obtained an industrial residence in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, or some other parish, such parish was liable for her board.

Thereafter a proof was allowed and adduced by the parties, when, in consequence of certain circumstances which came out in it, the Sheriff suggested that a supplementary action should be directed against the parish of Crieff, which was accordingly done: But that parish averred that the lunatic never had acquired an industrial residence in the parish of Crieff; that so far from that being the case, it was shown by the proof led by the parties to the original process, that she did not enter the parish of Crieff till at least fourteen days after the old term of Martinmas 1823; that she left it within three years thereafter; and that Duff's industrial residence in the parish of Crieff did not even commence fourteen days after the old term of Martinmas 1823; for it was established by the evidence of Margaret Peddie, her aunt, that she lived with her till the month of April following, when she found employment in the parish, and from the latter date only could her industrial residence, therefore, be said to have commenced;—and they accordingly pleaded, 1. That the lunatic not having had three years' industrial residence in the parish, no claim could lie against the parish for her aliment: 2. That the lunatic having been born in the parish of Little Dunkeld, and having lived nearly twenty years with her mother in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, and it not appearing that she ever had three years industrial residence in any other parish, Little Dunkeld, as the parish of her birth, or Fowlis-Wester, as that of her acquired residence, was the parish bound to support her.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutors:

"Perth, 12th June 1840.—Having advised the closed record, finds under the admitted and proved circumstances, in regard to the residence of the pauper lunatic, that the claim for her support rests upon the parish of Crieff: Therefore decerns against that parish, in terms of the conclusions of the supplementary summons; and, under the whole circumstances, finds no expenses due, with the exception of the expense of extract, for which decerns, and assoliszes the parishes called under the original action."

(Signed) "HUGH BARCLAY."

"Note.—The parish of parentage and of birth can only be had recourse to failing the pauper having obtained any settlement for herself by the necessary industrial residence. There is no evidence that the father of Margaret Duff had acquired any legal settlement in the parish of Little Dunkeld, and so there is nothing, save the birth, to fix the liability on that parish. The connection between that parish and the child ceased immediately after the birth. The revival of it, by residence in 1820, was too brief to affect the claim.

"Residence during pupillarity cannot be held an industrial residence; and, after the period at which Margaret Duff entered on service in 1818, she does not appear at any one time to have been longer resident in the parish of Fowlis-Wester than one year, or one year and six months; or in all, was she resident in that parish, as a servant, for a period longer than two years, or two years and a-half.

"The last settlement of the pauper, of course, relieves all former parishes where prior settlements may have been obtained. Now, it is admitted that, from Martinmas 1823, or within ten days thereafter, until Martinmas 1826, the now pauper was continually in service within the parish of Crieff. The only objections to this period being reckoned as complete, are, first, the discount of the ten days said to have occurred after the term of Martinmas 1823, before she went to reside with her aunt at Crieff. But this space is so very trivial, in relation to the term of three years, that it cannot be permitted to destroy the legal effect of such residence, any more than the absence for a like number of days would destroy the settlement of any person, occurring such absence during the currency of the term. Duff's industrial connection with the previous parish clearly ceased with the term of her engagement of service. It is next said, that her residence with her aunt in Crieff ought not to count. There is no evidence or admission as to how she was occupied during that period; but the clear presumption, in the absence of proof, is, that she supported herself. There is also a previous period of several months in 1818–19, when Duff also resided with her aunt in Crieff, which, reckoned with the other space, renders her residence upwards of three years in the same parish.

"Thus it appears that Duff, after being able to support herself, resided for the longest space of time, either as a whole or taken continuously, in the parish of Crieff, and that shortly before her becoming unable longer to earn her sustenance she was three years at least, all but ten days, resident continuously in that parish, and therefore little doubt remains that on that parish rests the burden of her future support."

"Perth, 29th January 1841.—Having resumed consideration of the process, with reclaiming petition on the merits and answers thereto, as also petitions for expenses, refuses the prayers of the said petitions; adheres to the judgment reclaimed against, and decerns." (Signed) "HUGH BARCLAY."

"Note.—The question is not without difficulty, but further deliberation has only confirmed the Sheriff-substitute in his first opinion. The parish of Crieff cannot arrogate to itself the benefit of alone being in the condition of those struggling to avoid loss. In this all the other parishes in the field are in precise equality, and in whichever way the decision may ultimately be given, to none of them can it bring gain.

"It is now fixed law, that the parish of the pauper's birth is only liable for his support in default of his having obtained for himself a settlement in some other parish. The liability, therefore, rests between the parishes of Fowlis-Wester and Crieff.

"With regard to Fowlis-Wester, there is a legal doubt whether a child's settlement follows that of the widowed mother, and another doubt exists as to a pupil being capacitated to obtain a settlement. The residence in Crieff parish being posterior to that in the parish of Fowlis-Wester, if sustained, cancels any claim which might have otherwise existed against the last-named parish.

"It is not disputed, that if the three years' residence, between 1823 and 1826 in the parish of Crieff be held complete, then the claim against that parish is clear. The escape from liability is founded on the discount of ten or fourteen days at the commencement of that period. The proof is not very clear as to the number of days, or indeed if there were any. And it rather appears that the residence at Fowlis-Wester ceased on the very term day; and there is no proof as to where the servant resided if it were not with her aunt, where she was found immediately after. Indeed, the ten or fourteen days may be accounted for by a discrepancy in reckoning the term day according to the different styles, still too much in observance in rural districts. But supposing that the omission of these few days are proved as wanting to complete the precise and full space of three times 365 days, the question remains, whether in law, the omission is sufficient to destroy the qualification of a three years' residence? There is not an exact analogy between the Statutes introducing prescription into our law, and those on which is founded legal settlement. In the first place, the lapse of time is alone sufficient to let in the force of the prescriptive Statutes—time admits of no construction or modification, but is absolute and unbending in its character; whereas, what constitutes residence and domicile are questions admitting of much latitude of construction and qualification. But, in the second place, the law of prescription is designed to limit rights and to deprive creditors of important privileges otherwise in accordance with the principles of justice, and so must receive the strictest possible construction, and narrowest application. Whereas the law of settlement is one of privilege, founded on the law of benevolence, and is therefore entitled to a free construction and a liberal application.

"The parish of Crieff does not dispute that, had the interval of days occurred during the currency of the three years' residence, it would have had no effect whatever in preventing that residence being held complete. Now it is not easy to perceive how the same number of days at the beginning, after the connection was loosed with another parish, or at the termination before any bond was created with a new parish, should have the effect totally to destroy the otherwise entire term of residence. In common language, and to all purposes, the person and the public were entitled to say, that his residence had been for three years in such parish. The parish of Crieff ask if ten or fourteen days destroy not the period of settlement as completed, may not a month, or any other larger portion of time, be disregarded with equal propriety? But the question may have its answer by propounding the opposite question, whether a day short of the legal space, or an hour, nay, even so many minutes, may not, on the same principle, be reckoned as destructive of the full and unyielding requirements of the law?

"But, supposing it possible that the parish of Crieff should be held correct on the first point, the Sheriff-substitute is confirmed in his opinion that they are bound to complete the four months' residence in 1818-19, notwithstanding it occurred more than three years before the principal residence in 1823. It is admitted, that a pauper may be away many months from a parish and yet keep up his settlement therein, unless he meantime acquires a settlement in another. Any single furnishing, if within three years from its precursor, keeps up the continuity of a merchant's account, and prevents the application of prescription, and so carries it on for time indefinite. Something like this may have place in the law of settlement. Suppose a person who, from the nature of his avocations (like that of the party in the case of Dalmellington), goes from parish to parish, and remains in none at any time more than a few months, it is thought that, in the event of the party descending into the ranks of pauperism, his settlement would be ascertained by finding where the reckoning of the fractions of residence gives the last period of three years, however dislocated and long may have been the intervals between them. The law does not require, but disclaims continuity. It uses the words, 'common resort,' and 'most haunted during the last three years.' Assuredly the unfortunate lunatic, from the time she was able to support herself, haunted most the parish of Crieff.

"The question was one of difficulty. All the parties are on a par as to interest, and are in the management of public moneys. The case has all along been conducted much in the spirit of an amicable suit, so that the Sheriff-substitute scarcely thinks those parishes who are so fortunate as to escape, are serious in asking their costs."

These judgments having been affirmed by the Sheriff, an advocacy was brought, in which the Lord Ordinary, upon an offer made by the parish of Crieff to prove that the pauper was in the parish of Fowlis-Wester for fourteen days after Martinmas 1823 (old style), allowed the parish to lead additional proof, which was accordingly adduced.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause; recalls the interlocutors complained of: Finds that the proof establishes that Fowlis-Wester is the parish of the settlement of the pauper in question: Therefore, on this ground, partly of fact and partly of law, finds that this is the parish that is liable for her maintenance, and decerns accordingly: Finds this parish liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—There are some points of difficulty here, as to which the Lord Ordinary has so little confidence in the view he has taken, that he ventures upon a judgment chiefly as the easiest mode of bringing the case under the notice of the Court.

"He is of opinion that Crieff is not liable, simply because the full period of three years' residence is not made out. It is proved (and, indeed, almost admitted) that about fourteen days are wanting. It is argued, and the Sheriff decided, that the residence (that is, the statutory haunting and resorting) for three years need not be so unbroken as that the want of a fortnight will destroy it. The Lord Ordinary agrees in this, if it be applied to any period during the currency of the three years; for, though the residence must be continuous, it need not be constant; but, before it can be deemed either the one or the other, it must have begun. Here the defective fortnight was at the commencement of the three years. In other words, giving the pauper credit for all occasional absences during the three years, she was only two years eleven months and a fortnight in the parish. If this is to be counted as three years, the Court will next be asked to disregard the want of three weeks, or of four, or of three or four months. The Lord Ordinary is for adhering firmly to the rule, inasmuch that his decision would have been the same though it had been but a single day that was wanting. It is true that, during this fortnight, the pauper was preparing and intended to go to Crieff; but she did not actually go till the fortnight was done; and, if the want of any portion of the full time is to be overlooked in consideration of the reasons why it was not completed, then a new element of confusion may be introduced into every case.

"If the Lord Ordinary be incorrect in this view, his interlocutor is wrong, and Crieff is clearly the parish that is liable.

"If Crieff be discarded, the competition for escaping the burden is between Fowlis-Wester and Little Dunkeld.

"Dunkeld was the parish of the birth, and this single fact fixes the liability on this parish, provided this liability was not taken off by a subsequent settlement acquired in Fowlis-Wester. The Lord Ordinary rather thinks that such a settlement was acquired.

"But he thinks so solely in consequence of the residence of the pauper's mother in that parish. The facts here are, that the father died in Little Dunkeld when the pauper was an infant, and it is said indeed, but not proved, before she was born, in September 1804: That the widowed mother went to Fowlis-Wester about Whitsunday 1805, taking the child with her; and that she lived there industriously till Martinmas, or at least till Whitsunday 1818.

"If a widowed mother can in law acquire a settlement for her children, this unbroken residence of about thirteen years gave the pauper a settlement in Fowlis-Wester.

"But it is denied that a lawful mother can acquire a settlement for her child; and, if this be law, the Lord Ordinary is wrong again, and the pauper must recur to the parish of her birth. But he does not hold this to be the law. There are decisions which are apparently contradictory, and the most important case is reported different ways. (See case of Coldinghame, as reported by Tait, in Vol. V., p. 539 of Brown's Supplement, and in Morrison, p. 10,582.) But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the weight of authority, and still more of principle, is, that the surviving mother, whose fortunes the children follow, and whose industry benefits the parish she resorts to, procures a settlement not only for herself but for her young offspring. If it do not, then a mother, who had maintained herself and a bed-ridden child by her own industry in one parish for fifty years, would not have a settlement there for her helpless child at her death, but it must have recourse on the parish where it was born, but from which it removed half a century before—a result against which principle seems to revolt. If the residence of the mother cannot confer a settlement in Fowlis-Wester on the daughter, the Lord Ordinary does not think that a settlement was acquired in that parish by the daughter herself, because, putting all her detached hauntings and resortings there together, they do not amount to three years of sufficient continuity. But here another point arises: A pupil cannot acquire a settlement by residence, that is, the years of pupillarity must be deducted. But do these years end in a female at fourteen or at twelve? There is no authority, quoad hoc, either way. The Lord Ordinary sees no reason for not adhering to the ordinary period of twelve; and if this be the legal rule, this pauper ceased to be a pupil in September 1816, and a considerable addition is made to the period of her industrial residence in this parish. But even with this help, the three years are not easily made out. If fourteen is to be held the period, these years are certainly not made out."

The parish of Fowlis-Wester reclaimed, praying the Court

"to recal the said interlocutor, to adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff complained of, and to find the advocates liable in expenses to the respondents; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

At advising the reclaimers argued—

That if the lapse of the fourteen days had occurred during the running of the three years, or at the end, it would not have signified, as in the case of Dalmellington, and consequently that it was of no consequence that the lapse was at the commencement; because in either case, it was clear that that parish, where the residence of the three years occurred, less the fourteen days, formed the common haunt and resort of the pauper during that time. All that was wanted was to make out the common haunt and resort for a period corresponding as nearly as possible to the three years. The Statutes 1579, c. 74, 1672, c. 18, Act of Privy Council, 29th August 1693, connected with this branch of the law, were extremely vague and even contradictory as to the amount and quality of residence; and though custom had apparently fixed a settlement after a period of three years' residence, that period did not require to run de momento in momentum; for it was sufficient, if continuous, though there might be considerable intervals in the course of it. The principle of settlement was, that that parish was liable where the three years occurred, because it had, more than any other parish, benefited by the residence of the party. Such was the principle of all the authorities.—See Dunlop on Poor-laws. And farther, that that period afforded evidence of the common haunt and resort. In this case these elements conspired; and accordingly, as lapses need not be taken into account where they occurred at the end or during the period, it did not affect the principle that the lapse was at the beginning. The case which was relied on by the respondents (parish of Hatton, M. 10,574), was quite a peculiar one, and not at all applicable, as the lapse was, besides, far greater. Analogies might be taken from prescription.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The analogous case is not prescription. It should rather be any case of cessation, as in working a coal field.

Lord Moncreiff.—But the analogous case here would be one which had had a beginning.

Rutherford.—In regard to what was said, that the period had not commenced, the circumstances disclosed in the proof should be taken into account, as showing that this party, though in Perth immediately before going to Crieff for these fourteen days, must be understood as being in Perth merely for a temporary purpose, and that she intended going to Crieff after selling her furniture.

Lord Moncreiff.—Have you any other evidence that she intended going to Crieff, than the fact that she did go?

Dundas.—We say that the proof shows that.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The difficulty which the Court feels is, that supposing she had not sold her furniture in Perth, quomodo constat that she would not have remained in Perth?

Dundas.—Had she been unable to sell the furniture then, she might have remained; but having sold it, and then leaving Perth, that shows that she was only there for a temporary purpose, and it was very natural for her to go, and to have intended to have gone, to her aunt's at Crieff, as she had no other place properly to go to.

The Court gave their opinions without calling on the counsel for the respondents.

Lord Medwyn could not take the alleged intention of going to Crieff into account; for the parish of Crieff was entitled to ask—Did she come there? Now the fact was she had not done so in such a way as to complete the three years. Lapses might not be taken into view during the currency of the years of settlement, where the commencement of the time is first settled, but here the commencement of the three years was wanting. As to intention, it is just as natural to suppose that she did not intend to go to Crieff as that she did. His Lordship concurred with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I do not see what else we can do than adhere to the interlocutor. There is here no doubt of the facts. They are admitted; and it is clear that fourteen days are wanting of the years of settlement in the parish of Crieff. Then we see how she was engaged in Perth selling her furniture, and it was said she was there with the intention of going to Crieff. But intention is nothing; and we have nothing to go on for her intention. Prescription was talked of as affording an analogy,—but that affords none to my mind. Domicile is more nearly analogous, and yet scarcely so; for in a question of domicile you always have some fixed point to start from as commencing the domicile; and it is after that that questions arise as to the domicile being changed or not, from moving about. Here we have no proper beginning to found on, so as to suit the claimer; and the facts indisputably show that there are not the three years requisite to constitute a settlement in the parish of Crieff. I concur with the Lord Ordinary as to Crieff not being liable.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with your Lordships. There is here no dispute as to the facts, nor as to the rule that three years are required to constitute a settlement. If that be the rule, which is admitted, then if we relax it, we are altering the law, which we cannot do; and the necessary period has not run to fix the liability on Crieff. Intention cannot be taken into view, for we have not sufficient facts to go on; and it is irrelevant, besides, to plead, as against the parish of Crieff, that the intention of the lunatic was to go there at the beginning of November instead of the end of it,—while the fact in evidence is the reverse. The reclaimers are bound to make out the three years in the parish of Crieff. I give no opinion as to what effect might follow if the fourteen days' lapse had occurred at the end of the three years, and not at the beginning.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The reclaimers then proposed to open their case as against the parish of Little Dunkeld, and to render them liable, now that the parish of Crieff had been assolized. But it was objected to by

Dean of Faculty, for Little Dunkeld, who contended that the reclaiming note of the parish of Fowlis-Wester was not so worded as to bring them into the discussion. There was no express craving in it as against the parish of Little Dunkeld.

Rutherford and Dundas explained, that the two parishes joined issue with the claimer, and were heard before the Lord Ordinary on their respective cases; but his Lordship had separated the discussion into one, and heard parties as to the liability of Crieff. Thereafter he found Fowlis-Wester liable. There was, however, no intention of dropping the question of liability as against Little Dunkeld; and they maintained, that the words in the reclaiming note, "or to do otherwise," sufficiently brought that parish now into the discussion.

Dean of Faculty objected to that, and argued, that there should have been a special craving against them, if it had been intended still to insist against them.

The Court stated that they felt very considerable difficulty on the point. Lord Medwyn was of opinion that the parish of Little Dunkeld was not brought into the discussion by the expression "or to do otherwise," in the reclaiming note; while Lord Moncreiff rather thought, in the circumstances, that it was enough. The Lord Justice-Clerk considered it was a point of difficulty, and that it had better stand over till the authorities were consulted.

Lord Moncreiff.—If it be found that the parish of Little Dunkeld is not here, the decision will be a very extraordinary one.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—But it will appear, in that case, that it was owing to the nature of the reclaiming note for Crieff which had failed to bring the parish of Little Dunkeld into the discussion.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

Of this date, 6th July,

Rutherford, for Fowlis-Wester, argued—

That the parish of Little Dunkeld was sufficiently brought into the discussion by the first part of the reclaiming note, in which the reclaimers prayed their Lordships to recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; because if that were recalled, which would satisfy Fowlis-Wester in this part of the case, it would open the discussion as against Little Dunkeld. He admitted that they could not bring them into the discussion by the words "or to do otherwise" alone.

Neaves, for Little Dunkeld, maintained—

That the argument now used for the other party was not sound, as if so, a reclaiming note merely praying for the recal of an interlocutor would be sufficient. But that was not enough; and it was necessary that, besides praying for recal, there should be an express craving of some special sort, else there would be no means of practically applying the recal. It was clear from the case of Grainger, 31st May 1833, that his clients could not be brought into the discussion through the words "or to do otherwise," in the reclaiming note.

Lord Medwyn.—The expression "or to do otherwise" is not sufficient. It is in the first part of the prayer the point must lie.

Lord Justice-Clerk assented to this.

Lord Moncreiff.—May you not connect the expression "recall" with "do otherwise," since the other parish is out of Court?

After some further discussion, the Court appeared desirous of hearing what the parish of Monzievaird had to say; but on an intimation from the bar that the parish of Little Dunkeld had no interest now to bring that parish into the field, their Lordships proceeded to dispose of the case.

Lord Justice-Clerk said, I cannot now hold that the expression "or to do otherwise" is sufficient for the question. I had been inclined originally to think differently. But the question, as it now strikes me, is, whether the first part of the reclaiming note is sufficient for the purpose?—viz, the words "to recal the said interlocutor;" and whether the reclaimers have at all limited themselves in the after part of the prayer by any thing they have said in it? It is no doubt said "to adhere," but we have not the words "in so far as," or the word "and" preceding the expression "adhere." Had these expressions occurred, then undoubtedly the reclaimers would have limited themselves in the way and mode as to which they wished the recal to be applied. But these limiting expressions do not occur in the primary and substantive part of the reclaiming note. Now, in this view, I do not think we can hold that the discussion as to Little Dunkeld is to be stopped; because, since Crieff is out of the question, the liability of Little Dunkeld remains to be disposed of as between it and Fowlis-Wester—if you attend to the interlocutor of the Sheriff. It was said that a reclaiming note merely to recal a judgment would not be competent, as wanting a practical application; but I am not sure of that. I do not know that it would not do. For supposing such a reclaiming note were to occur, might the claimer not then say, that if the recal were sustained, he intended to move for the practical application, such as should comport with the shape of the case? I see no precedent at present against that, and I give no opinion. In this case I think it is very difficult to say that the discussion as to Little Dunkeld shall be shut out. I felt the difficulty yesterday as to allowing it to proceed under the terms "or to do otherwise," but since then it occurred to me there were no expressions limiting the first part of the prayer; and I am therefore for hearing what little Dunkeld has to say.

Lord Medwyn was afraid that this would lead to loose practice.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I do not think so.

Lord Moncreiff.—I always thought the discussion open under this reclaiming note; and I am not convinced that, in the special circumstances of the case, the expression "or to do otherwise" would not open up the discussion. But then when they are connected with the first part of the reclaiming note, I am clear the discussion is open. I am satisfied it will lead to no loose practice; and we are not deciding, as it appears to me, any general principle of law or form; for this is a very special case.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It is on the special circumstances of the case that I go.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The case was argued to-day (16th July) on the merits, between Fowlis-Wester and Little Dunkeld.

The mother had had a settlement in the former parish; but it was argued that an illegitimate child did not follow the settlement of its mother, but that of its father, and that the parish of the father must be liable: Dunlop's Poors' Law. Ersk., Ivory's Edit., p. 212, Note. No case had been decided by which it was held that the settlement of the mother of a bastard ruled that of the child. The case of Coldinghame was not in point, and no distinction was there drawn between the children of the first and second marriage. See case of Coldinghame, M. 10,582. Tait, voce Poor, Brown's Supp. It was maintained, that in many of the cases of settlement, no distinction was drawn as to whether the child, when held to have a settlement, drew it from the settlement of the father or of the mother. It might happen, that when a settlement was fixed as apparently derived from the mother, it was in reality attributable to that of the father, who had deceased.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It was of no consequence how the mother came to have a settlement, if such was the case. If she derived it by marriage from the husband, still it was a settlement, and available for all purposes.

Argued for Little Dunkeld.—That this was a shut point since the case of Coldinghame, in which the question was raised and fully decided. The session papers in the case were founded on as proving this, and that the distinction had been drawn between the children of the first marriage, and the children of the second.

At advising of this date,

Lord Justice-Clerk said, he concurred with the Lord Ordinary as to this point. He held it to be proved, from looking into the session papers, that the present question was raised and decided in the case of Coldinghame. The distinction was taken between the children of the one marriage and of the other, and the papers were drawn by the ablest men of the day; so that it was not likely it had escaped observation. But, even had the point not been settled in the case of Coldinghame, his Lordship could not see how the connection between an illegitimate child and its mother was less strong than the connection of legitimate children and their father. It was a right arising to the child in both cases from the settlement of the parents. In the case of the mother, where she had had an industrial residence, it might have been a very valuable and beneficial one to the parish, and she might have been a contributor to the poor's rates; and in that case it would seem clear, that the child had a right through the mother. And how could it be said, in these circumstances, that the child should go back to the parish of the birth? That might be a most difficult thing for the child, in many cases, to ascertain, and in some cases impossible. Witness the case decided last year, as to whether a certain muir was in one parish or another, which gave rise to a great deal of difficulty;—and just consider the difficulty there might be on the pauper ascertaining the point. This was an illustration of the hardship; and his Lordship stated his concurrence with the views of the Lord Ordinary on this part of the case.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am inclined to hold the same opinion, but chiefly so from the case of Coldinghame, where the point does appear to have been raised and settled. I can scarcely say I hold there is the same reason for cases of settlement between illegitimate and legitimate children. It may be a very expedient rule that there should be no distinction, and that the settlement of both should be ruled in the same way; but according to law, a bastard child has no father; and therefore the principle will not hold in law, however expedient it might be otherwise. I am inclined to think this a very nice question; and had it not been for the case of Coldinghame, I would have required more time for consideration; but I think that that case must rule the present.

Lord Medwyn.—I have long considered this point, which is attended with difficulty; but I hold the residence and settlement of the mother to be sufficient. It is therefore unnecessary to say more.

Dean of Faculty craved absolutor for Little Dunkeld, and also additional expenses.

This was opposed, so far as expenses were concerned, on the ground that each parish, being litigants de damno evitando, should bear its own expenses.

Lord Moncreiff.—If we have traced this point to principle long ago decided, the question should not have been raised, and in that case, Little Dunkeld would have been saved the process. But it has been sought to render that parish liable; and the unsuccessful party ought certainly to pay expenses.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I believe the rule is, that the unsuccessful parish always pays expenses.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court

"Adhere to the findings in the interlocutor complained of: Absolve the heritors of Crieff and of Little Dunkeld from the conclusions of the original action, and decern: Of new find the heritors of Fowlis-Wester liable in the expenses incurred by the heritors of the two other parishes, both in the Inferior Court and in this Court; allow the accounts," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For Fowlis-Wester, Rutherford, G. Dundas; Dundas and Wilson, W.S., Agents.—For Little Dunkeld, Dean of Faculty (Wood), Neaves; A. McNeill, W.S., Agent.—For Crieff, Solicitor-General (McNeill), Patton; Murray and Logan, W.S., Agents.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

19th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 269.—DAVID CREIGHTON, Advocator, v. JAMES M'INTOSH, Respondent.

Proof.—Oath in Reference—Construction—Process.—It is not competent, in construing an oath on reference, to look beyond its contents for the true import of the oath.

The respondent had brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire against Creighton, for payment of certain work on, and furnishings to, a house he had executed for the latter according to contract, and also for certain extra work on the building. The case resulted in a judgment, by which the Sheriff,

"In respect that the defender, by his said minute, declines any inspection by the inspectors formerly named by the parties and the Court, and states that he will not allow them to enter his premises for such a purpose, decerns against the defender as concluded for; finds him liable in expenses, of which allows an account to be lodged and taxed."

(Signed) "HUGH BARCLAY."

The Lord Ordinary (in an advocacy) pronounced the following interlocutor, from which the circumstances of the case are sufficiently apparent:

"3d December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, and having since considered the closed record and whole proceedings in the Court below, with the additional notes of pleas respectively lodged for the parties in this Court, primo, In so far as objection has been taken to the competency or regularity of the proceedings in respect of their supposed incompatibility with the terms of the original summons, Finds that the advocator is barred, personali exceptione, from insisting therein, inasmuch as the course of procedure that has been actually followed was from the first consented to by himself, and he has accordingly been a concurring party throughout to every step in the cause, against the regularity and competency of which the said objection is now directed, and which it would have a tendency to upset, were it to be sustained: Finds, moreover, that in the circumstances of the case, the proceedings to which the advocator was thus a consenting party, are, as regards the matter of said objection, substantially equivalent to an amendment of the libel, and that the modification thereby effected on the shape of the action, and on the course of procedure to be followed therein, having received the sanction as well of the Sheriff as of the parties before the closing of the record, and the said record itself having been accordingly framed on this footing, without any reference to said objection, it would still be open, were that necessary in point of form, to allow the amendment which has thus been adopted and given effect to de facto, to be set forth and engrafted on the record: But, separatim, finds that the summons, so far at least as the original contract between the parties is concerned, and so far also as regards the execution of a considerable quantity of extra or additional work, as constituting generally a ground of claim, is expressly libelled upon the said contract itself, and upon the fact that said extra or additional work had actually been executed, and this without reference, prima instantia, to any after award, the said award being introduced merely as regulating the amount of allowance which fell to be made in respect of the said additional work, and not as substantively, still less as exclusively, constituting the defender's obligation to pay for the work really done; so that in fair construction, upon the face of the summons itself, there is substantially, notwithstanding trivial inaccuracies of expression, enough, independently of the award, to support the conclusions for payment, more especially where the parties expressly agreed upon the record, as they did here, that the allowance in respect of the additional work performed, with any relative deduction in respect of work not performed, should be regulated by judicial remit in the process to three persons of skill, two to be mutually named by themselves, and one by the Sheriff, instead of by the award mentioned in the summons, which both expressly agreed to abandon: Therefore, upon the whole matter, repels the said objection. Secundo, Upon the merits, finds that by the terms of the original contract, as the same was entered into between the parties under the written missives of 13th April 1825, the respondent, on the one hand, became bound to furnish the carpenter work of the advocator's house agreeably to a certain plan and specifications therein referred to, and the advocator, on the other, to pay therefor the lump sum of £70 Sterling, there being no bargain between the parties as to a particular rate of charge for all or any of the individual items composing the work, which was thus to be paid for in cumulo: Finds, that by said contract, in case of any change on the original plan before the respondent's portion of the work came to be executed, it was agreed that whatever additions shall be made shall be paid in proportion, and reductions the same: but that in regard to this stipulation also, in the absence of all specification of any particular price or rate of charge for the different items composing the work contracted for in cumulo, the only element for estimating the respective additions and reductions in question, was a general comparison of the total amount of work as originally contracted for, with the total amount of work as it was eventually executed, having regard to the original specifications, in so far as these, in connection with the lump price agreed to be paid for the work as at first contracted for, were calculated to throw light on the matter: Finds, that before the respondent came to execute the work contracted for, the advocator had directed, or at all events had sanctioned such changes on the original plan as materially to alter the house to be erected in the whole of its dimensions, and more especially as regards the respondent's department of the work, to alter in a great measure the dimensions of every department, the carpenter work of which he had contracted to execute: Finds, with reference to this state of matters, that after the respondent had completed the said carpenter work, and after the advocator had entered into possession of the finished house, without, so far as appears, having taken any objection to the manner in which the respondent had performed his task, a difference arose between the parties as to the amount of the balance which was due to the respondent, and various attempts, as well extrajudicial as judicial, having been ineffectually made to settle these differences, it was at last mutually agreed upon between them, in the course of this process, that a judicial remit should be made to certain persons of skill to inspect the work done by the pursuer (respondent) for the defender (advocator), and to report whether the same has been executed in terms of contract, and if not so, the deficiencies, and what should be deducted on that account; also, to consider and report the extra work performed by the pursuer, and what would be a fair and proper allowance to him for the same: Finds, accordingly, that the advocate named William M'Laggan, wright in Perth, as inspector on his part, and the respondent, David Wilson, wright in Blairgowrie, as inspector on his, and that there having been added to these John Bell, junior, architect in Perth, as inspector named by the Court, a judicial remit to the above effect was regularly made by interlocutor of Court, of date 11th December 1833: Finds it admitted by the advocate upon the record (answer to statement 7), 'that the defender (advocator) acquiesced in this appointment, and made no objections to the inspectors nominated, and is thereby barred from any further proof in the matter at issue.' Finds that the inspectors did accordingly visit and inspect the premises in the month of March 1834: And finds it averred by the respondent, and not specially denied by the advocate (statement 8), that upon this occasion 'the inspectors were attended by the defender (advocator) in person, when they made their inspection, and heard him fully on all his averments: Finds that in this state of matters, certain difficulties having been raised by the advocate as to the authenticity of the plan and specifications applicable to the work, as originally contracted for, which, along with the process itself, appear to have been laid before the inspectors, considerable delay was occasioned by an attempt to recover the original documents in the hands of certain arbiters, to whom the parties had at one time referred their differences, but it turning out, on their examination as havers, that the originals, though traced to their custody, had been lost in their hands, it became necessary to proceed upon the documents in process, such as they were, and the diligence having accordingly been reported, the remit to the inspectors was renewed by interlocutor of date 21st November 1834: Finds that the inspectors having thereafter resumed consideration of the matters remitted to them, prepared and gave in their final report, of date 5th March 1835, wherein they report that 'having this day met, and carefully measured and examined the plans and specifications of the carpenter work of the house of Burndales, contracted for and executed by James M'Intosh; also the notes of measurement taken by us in the month of March last year; also the extra work charged by the said James M'Intosh in the account produced,—in our opinion the whole is completed in a workmanlike manner, and that the contractor is entitled to the full amount of his account for extra work, amounting to the sum of £38. 10s. Sterling, over and above any balance that may be due him on his first contract of £70 Sterling: Finds, that in so far as this report states the amount of the respondent's account for extra work as being £38. 10s., 'over and above any balance that may be due him on his first contract of £70 Sterling,' the same is not correct, the fact being that the said sum of £38. 10s. includes the balance referred to; but finds that this, as afterwards explained, proceeded from a mere casual slip of the inspectors in extending the said report, as is indeed apparent from the respondent's account therein referred to itself (No. 66 of process), which expressly sets forth, as one of the items composing the foresaid balance of £36. 10s., the 'balance of original estimate £9. 6s.,' so that the general authority of the report is in this respect not open to any real ground of impeachment: Finds, that neither is there any ground for impeaching the authority of the said report, in so far as it proceeds on the specifications in process, inasmuch as the advocate expressly admits upon the record (cond. art. 4, and answers to respondent's statement, art. 3) 'that the specifications for the carpenter work of said house, produced in process,' (though not themselves the originals) 'are the same as the original specifications drawn by Mr Whyte, also referred to in the pursuer's offer, and on which the work was allowed to proceed: Finds, in like manner,—in so far as the report proceeds upon the plan in process, which the advocate alleges not to be the original plan mentioned in the contract,—that although the advocate has not, in the absence of the alleged original, made the same admission as to the accuracy of the process plan, still there seems to be no reasonable ground for doubting its accuracy; and at all events, the advocate is distinctly proved to have had access, whether through his possession of the original plan itself, or of a copy of it, or otherwise, to all necessary information in regard to the measurements of said original plan, so as to be able to compare the same with the measurements of the work actually executed; inasmuch as he has at different times lodged various statements in process,—see particularly No. 68, and compare therewith No. 28 to 30, inclusive, and also Nos. 33 and 34. See also observations for the advocate, No. 16 of process, p. 4),—in which he gives the whole detail of the 'measurements of original plans of Mr Creighton's house on Burndales,' and contrasts the same, item by item, with a corresponding 'measurement of present house on Burndales;' so that if he did not lay before the inspectors all proper and requisite explanations on this head, the fault was entirely his own: Finds, finally, as regards the said report, that no good objection lies thereto, in respect of its not specifying the several measurements and prices or rates of charge applicable to every separate article of which the work consisted (as has been attempted by the advocate in articles 7 and 9 of his condescendence), inasmuch as the original contract (as has already been shown) was itself not a detailed, but a slump contract, and so neither required nor admitted of being split down into such particulars: Finds, however, that all this notwithstanding, the advocate persisted in objecting to the report upon this and other grounds not more substantial, and that after considerable discussion he was in consequence ultimately allowed to examine the inspectors upon oath, in verification of the said report: Finds, accordingly, that on 16th December 1836, the two inspectors who had been respectively named by the advocate and respondent were so examined, but that Mr Bell, the inspector named by the Sheriff, having by this time left the country and gone abroad, no deposition was obtained from him: Finds that though repeated statements were judicially made by the advocate, to the effect that this inspector was to be found in London, and though repeated delays were granted to him for the express purpose of enabling him to get his deposition taken in that city, the advocate at last declined to proceed with his examination, stating that he 'has not thought of taking measures for examining Mr Bell in London, as the examination could not proceed there with any satisfaction to the parties, and would necessarily be attended with very heavy expense: Finds that in this situation, and looking to the whole circumstances under which the report of the inspectors was prepared and given in, as well as to the additional explanations elicited in the depositions of those two of their number who were examined, as said is, there was good and sufficient ground for at once approving of their report, and for decerning in accordance therewith against the advocate in terms of the libel: Finds, nevertheless, that in respect of certain supposed irregularities and defects in the report, and in the proceedings of the inspectors, as to part of which, at least, the Sheriff appears to have laboured under important misapprehension, the advocate eventually succeeded in having the original report rejected; but finds that even according to the view which the Sheriff took, and in this respect rightly took of the matter, there was nothing in the previous proceedings, of such a nature as to disqualify the original inspectors from having the matter again remitted back for their reconsideration; and accordingly, that it was of new remitted 'to Messrs Wilson and M'Laggan, with the addition of Mr James Ballingall, wright and builder in Perth, named by the Court in room of Mr Bell (who is said to have left this country), with instructions immediately, but after intimation of six days to parties' procurators, to visit and inspect the subjects, and to hear parties or their procurators on all points of difference; and, if absolutely necessary from any change of circumstances, to examine witnesses orally on the ground, and thereon to report specially on the various points of difference embraced within the closed record; and instructs them farther to submit to the parties the draft of their report, and, if desired, to hear them further thereon: Finds that although the renewed proceeding which was thus directed was greatly more favourable for the advocate, and went further than in the circumstances and according to the justice of the case, and with a due regard to his whole conduct throughout the litigation, he was in any view entitled to, the advocate nevertheless rejected the indulgence which had thus been shown to him, and insisted on being allowed a proof at large upon the whole facts of the case, or at least that the Sheriff should 'recall the re-appointment of Messrs Wilson and M'Laggan as inspectors or referees in this cause, and allow the parties to name others in their place; and finally, when both these demands were refused, gave in a minute into process, in which he positively declined any inspection of these parties, which never can produce any satisfactory result, and stated further, that he will not allow them to enter his premises for such a purpose.' Finds that in these circumstances, the Sheriff had no alternative but to pronounce the judgment now submitted to review; whereby he, 'in respect that the defender (advocator) by his said minute declines any inspection by the inspectors formerly named by the parties and Court, and states that he will not allow them to enter his premises for such a purpose, decerns against the defender as concluded for, and finds him liable in expenses.' And therefore, on the whole matter, and more especially in respect that the advocator still persists in opposing any remit which shall include the former inspectors, Repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits the cause simpliciter to the Sheriff: Finds the advocator liable in expenses before this Court, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the auditor to tax and report."

The advocator reclaimed, but the Court (11th June last) adhered. Thereafter he gave in a minute referring the whole cause to the oath of the respondent. When the oath was reported, the advocator, at the advising, proposed to construe the oath by reference to the claim and charges originally made by the respondent, and to show that the oath was not borne out by the claim.

The Court, however, interfered to prevent this.

Lord Medwyn.—We can look only at the oath. We have referred the whole matter to the oath of the respondent, and we cannot go beyond it.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—If you think the oath is inconsistent with the claim, I am afraid your only remedy is to indict the respondent for perjury, but we cannot look at the previous claims, or go beyond the oath. We now doubt very much if we were right in allowing the reference at all. It was so clear a case of contumacy.

The Court, without hearing the respondent, held the oath negative of the reference, and found the advocator liable in additional expenses.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Penney; James Burness, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Patton; Isaac Anderson, S.S.C., Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 270.—MISS EUPHEMIA WADDELL, Pursuer, v. JAMES WADDELL AND CURATORS, Defenders.

Trust.—Testament.—Succession.—Parent and Child.—Revocation.—Circumstances in which held, that a deed of apportionment of a succession by a father, was not recalled by a subsequent deed, in which he, as a trustee, conveyed the same succession, without reference to the deed of apportionment.

By trust-disposition and settlement, of date 13th February 1830, Alexander Waddell of Stonefield conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, 1st, for payment of his lawful debts and obligations; 2d, in fulfilment of his marriage-contract; 3d, to make over the whole residue to his nephew, James Waddell, in liferent, for his liferent alimentary use only, and his children nati or nascituri in fee, in such proportions as the said James Waddell should appoint by a writing under his hand, or failing thereof, equally among them. In 1837, during the subsistence of the trust, James Waddell executed a deed, in which, on a narrative of the provisions of his uncle's settlement, "and considering also, that the residue of the trust-estate will, apparently, amount to between £26,000 and £28,000 Sterling in money, now vested partly in heritable bonds, and partly on personal obligations, besides the heritable properties in Bridgegate and King Street of Glasgow, which I consider worth about £7500 Sterling, exclusive of the entailed estate of Stonefield, to which my son succeeds, in the event of his survivance, which I consider worth upwards of £20,000, and having likewise in view the amount and value of the heritable and moveable estates now belonging to my wife and myself, and the advanced period of our lives, I have resolved on the apportionment of the residue of the said trust-estate in manner underwritten, which I consider to be, under all circumstances, a fair, reasonable and judicious exercise of the power and faculty committed to me by my uncle's said deed of settlement: Therefore, in the first place, I do hereby, without prejudice to the said entail of Stonefield, apportion and assign to my son James Waddell, and any other lawful child or children to be hereafter procreated of my body, if any be, equally among them, share and share alike, and to the survivor of them, burdened with my own liferent thereof, the following parts and portions of the residue of the said trust-estate, viz., first, The heritable subjects situated in Bridgegate and King Street; and secondly, The sum of £5500 of the said money residue, consisting of, and comprehending, first, the £2500 lent on the properties of Mrs Allan Wilson; secondly, The sum of £1500 lent to the Yoker Turnpike Road Trustees; and thirdly, The like sum of £1500 lent to the feuars of Gorbals: And I hereby direct and appoint the trustees of the said Alexander Waddell to convey and make over the said heritable properties situated in Bridgegate and King Street, and the said sum of £5500, consisting and comprehending, as aforesaid, to myself in liferent, and to the said James Waddell, my son, and any other lawful child or children to be hereafter procreated of my body, if any be, equally among them, share and share alike, in fee, in full of the share of the residue of the trust-estate of the said Alexander Waddell, demandable by, or payable to my said son, and any other child or children to be hereafter procreated of my body, if any be: And in the second place, I do hereby apportion, allot and assign to my daughter, Euphemia Waddell, the whole of the said residue of the said trust-estate of the said Alexander Waddell, my uncle, in so far as the same is not herein above allotted and assigned by me to my said son James and my future children, if any be, as her proportion and share of the said trust-estate, and that freed and disburdened, the said proportion or share so hereby allotted and assigned by me to my daughter, of my liferent thereof, which liferent interest of that proportion or share I hereby convey and make over from me to her, and accordingly renounce and hereby resign, upgive, overgive and discharge the same in her favour, and I accordingly hereby desire and require the said trustees of the said Alexander Waddell to convey and make over to my said daughter, freed and disburdened of my liferent thereof, the whole of the residue of the said trust-estate, excepting the proportion or share thereof aforesaid, herein above allotted and assigned by me to my said son James and future children, if any be, all in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement of the said deceased Alexander Waddell."

In 1841, Alexander Waddell's trustees (now reduced to two, of whom James Waddell himself was one), on the narrative that the purposes of the trust were fulfilled, with the exception of the provision as to the residue, and that they had been called upon to denude with a view to their exoneration, executed a disposition and assignation, conveying the residue to James Waddell, with procuratory of resignation and instrument of sasine, precisely in terms of his uncle's settlement, but without reference to the deed of apportionment of 1837. On this conveyance, and in the same terms, infestment was taken by James Waddell in all the subjects requiring it. Previously to the conveyance by the trustees, but subsequently to the deed of 1837, several of the bonds due to the trust-estate had been paid up,—in particular, the bond of £1500 due by the Yoker Road Trustees, which, by the deed of 1837, had been apportioned by James Waddell to his son.

On James Waddell's death, questions having arisen as to the effect of the conveyance by the trustees, viewed in connection with the deed of 1837, Euphemia Waddell brought a declarator against her brother, James Waddell (second), and his curators, concluding to have it found and declared, "that the foresaid infestments in favour of the said deceased James Waddell, in liferent, for his liferent alimentary use only, and the child or children procreated of his body, in fee, as aforesaid, following on the foresaid disposition and assignation by the said trustees of the said deceased Alexander Waddell, are mere liferent infestments in favour of the said deceased James Waddell in the various subjects therein contained, and not infestments either of a fee or of a fiduciary fee in favour either of him, or his child or children: That the procuratories of resignation and precept of seisin contained in the said disposition and assignation by the said trustees of the said deceased James Waddell still remain unexecuted: And the same being so found and declared, it further ought and should be found and declared that the said Euphemia Waddell, pursuer, is now entitled absolutely to the fee of the several subjects, and debts, and sums of money, and others contained in the foresaid disposition and assignation, executed by the trustees of the said deceased Alexander Waddell, under exception as aforesaid, and which several subjects, and debts, and sums of money, and others, which it should be found and declared that the said Euphemia Waddell is entitled absolutely to the fee of, are described in the said disposition and assignation as follows, viz.:—(Here follows the description of the several subjects and others, for the absolute fee to which Miss Euphemia Waddell seeks decree of declarator.) And that the pursuer, Euphemia Waddell, is entitled to be entered and infest on the said disposition and assignation in the several subjects specially before described, requiring infestment, and to execute the procuratories of resignation and precept of seisin therein contained, and also to exercise and enjoy every right and benefit under the said disposition and assignation, in so far as regards the whole of said subjects, and debts, and sums of money, and others before described, in the same way and manner as if the said disposition and assignation had been originally granted to her nominatim: And further, it ought and should be found and declared that the decree to follow hereon shall, along with the said disposition and assignation, be a good and valid warrant to authorise the pursuer to be infest on the said disposition and assignation, in so far as regards the subjects specially before described, requiring infestment, and to execute the procuratories of resignation and precept of seisin contained in said disposition and assignation; and also a good and sufficient warrant to the superiors of said subjects requiring infestment, to grant charters of resignation, and to a notary-public to pass infestment in favour of the pursuer on the said disposition and assignation, in so far as regards the said subjects specially before described, requiring infestment."

The defenders pleaded—1. The deed of the late James Waddell, of March 1837, was a mere inchoate distribution and apportionment of the residue of Alexander Waddell's trust-estate, which was subsequently deviated from and abandoned, and which cannot now be held to be the rule for apportioning the said residue betwixt the pursuer and the defender, James Waddell. 2. The said residue, in the circumstances above set forth, falls to be divided equally betwixt the pursuer and the defender, James Waddell, as on a failure by the late James Waddell, their father, to apportion the same by any writing under his hand. 3. Assuming the distribution of the residue in the said deed of 1837 to be valid and effectual, the apportionment of money to the defender, James Waddell, ought to be held to be of the nature of a general legacy to him, payable from the whole of the residue, and not of a special bequest of certain specific and individual sums.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"6th July 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, productions and whole process, and made avizandum—Finds, 1mo, That the deed of apportionment executed by the deceased James Waddell (the father of the parties) in March 1837, placed by him upon record, and left uncanceled and unaltered by him at his decease, was a valid and effectual exercise of the powers conferred on him by the trust-deed of his uncle Alexander Waddell, and must now regulate the interests of the said parties in the said trust-estate respectively; but finds, 2do, That in the circumstances of this case, the legacy or apportionment made in favour of the son in the said deed of 1837, of the following parts and portions of the residue of the trust-estate, viz., the heritable subjects situated in Bridgegate and King Street, and 2d, the sum of £5500, consisting of, and comprehending—1st, the £2500 lent on the property of Mrs Wilson: 2d, The sum or £1500 lent to the Yoker Road Trustees; and, 3d, the like sum of £1500 lent to the feuars of Gorbals; and I hereby direct the trustees of the said Alexander Waddell to convey and make over the said heritable properties and the said sum of £5500, consisting of, and comprehending as aforesaid, must be construed both as to the heritable subjects and the sum of £5500 as a legacy of the special subjects therein enumerated and described, and as such liable to be defeated or annulled, in whole or in part, by the testator subsequently alienating or otherwise disposing of any of these subjects; and therefore finds that the said testator, having afterwards himself called up and discharged the bond for £1500, due in 1837 by the Yoker Trustees, the legacy or share of the son must suffer that defalcation, and that he is now entitled under the said deed only to the heritable subjects and the two remaining bonds therein specified: And before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may explain what farther findings or decernitures may be necessary to bring the litigation to a close, but finds no expenses hitherto incurred due by or to either of the parties.

"Note.—The first finding requires no explanation, but the second has been made with hesitation, and involves a question of nicety. The Lord Ordinary, indeed, would have had great doubt about it if this had been a separate legacy to a stranger; but considering that it is a partition by a father between his two children, there are several circumstances which seem materially to strengthen the presumption that he only intended the son to get such part of the £5500 originally provided for him as he (the father) might not in the meantime have uplifted from the investments, of which it is expressly said then to consist. The most important of these circumstances is, that the whole bulk of his personal estate appears to have suffered a proportional diminution between the date of his deed in 1837 and of his uplifting the Yoker bond in 1840, so that there was as large a rateable defalcation from the sister's residue as from the brother's bonds. Another is, that this last was occasioned by the deliberate act and choice of the father himself, who having at the time twelve or fifteen other bonds due to him, to the amount of at least £16,000, chose to supply his necessities by calling up one of these in the son's allotment, rather than any of those which formed the residue of the daughter; and another is, that though he survived this operation for near two years, he never thought of replacing what he had so taken from the son's share, or in any way making compensation. The Lord Ordinary, in short, considers this as a questio voluntatis on a family settlement; and in such a question, he thinks that the construction which best preserves the original proportion between the shares of the provided children, where there is a change only in the condition of the property, and none in the probable intention of the testator, is always in dubio to be preferred, the basis of the whole being, that there is a radical ratio dubitandi from the form of expression which has been employed, which is thought to be eminently the case here."

* * * This is inaccurately quoted. The words 'of the said money residue' are omitted."

The defender reclaimed. The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, except in so far as relates to the question between the parties relative to the sum of £1500, as to which question supersede farther consideration; and under reservation of that question, as between the defender and pursuer, allow the decree of the Lord Ordinary to go out and be extracted as an interim decree."

Lord Ordinary, Jeffrey.—Act. H. Maxwell; A. and C. Douglas, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, A. Cook; Thomas Sprot, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

20th July 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 271.—MESSRS HORNE and ROSE, Objectors, v. DR and MRS BREMNER, Respondents.

Ranking and Sale.—Catholic Creditor.—Where a daughter's provision was heritably secured on two subjects, and her husband afterwards became the purchaser of one of them—Held, in a ranking and sale of the other subject, that if the provision were ranked wholly on it, the creditors in that subject were entitled to an assignation of the security held over that which the husband had purchased.

Mr Traill Urquhart acquired by disposition from his mother the property of Elsness, and also a dwelling-house situated in the burgh of Kirkwall. The disposition was burdened with several family provisions, among others, a sum of £600 to the disposer's daughter, Miss Sybella Traill Urquhart, who was afterwards married to Dr Bremner. A ranking and sale having been brought of Mr Traill Urquhart's estates, the above dwelling-house, which was at first included, was ordered to be struck out, as having been purchased several years before by Dr Bremner. In the state of interests afterwards prepared by the common agent, Mrs Bremner, and her husband for his interest, claimed to rank on Elsness for the full amount of her provision of £600. Messrs Horne and Rose, as creditors of Traill Urquhart, objected, that as the dwelling-house in Kirkwall was included in the disposition by Mr Traill Urquhart's mother, and consequently burdened like Elsness with the provision, Dr and Mrs Bremner were bound, in the event of being permitted to draw full payment from Elsness, to convey their claim on the dwelling-house for relief of such of the other heritable creditors as might not draw full payment.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties on the objections by Messrs Horne and Rose, to the state of interests prepared by the common agent, finds that Dr and Mrs Bremner must either rank rateably both on Elsness and over the house in Kirkwall; or that if they rank solely on Elsness, they must assign the security which they hold over the house in favour of Messrs Horne and Rose, and the other postponed creditors who have securities over Elsness alone: Finds Messrs Horne and Rose entitled to the expenses of discussing these objections, and appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The house, though struck out of the ranking as being the property of Dr Bremner, was only his, subject to its legal burdens; one of which was a debt due to Miss Sybella Urquhart. This debt was also secured over Elsness. Dr Bremner has an interest in getting the creditor to rank solely on the estate, and thus to save the house; and having married Miss Urquhart, he has the power of stating her claim as he pleases. But his laying it entirely on Elsness plainly injures the creditors who have postponed securities over that estate alone; and the question is, whether the creditor, with the prior security over both properties, is not bound in equity to abstain from injuring the secondary creditors, by throwing all the debt on the single subject over which they are secured. The Lord Ordinary thinks that she is so bound, and for this there is no want either of principle or of precedent. The case of Moray, 4th June 1836, seems nearly identical with the present."

Dr and Mrs Bremner reclaimed. The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—For Objectors, Neaves; Party Agent.—For Respondents, Robertson; Cuninghams and Bell, W.S., Agents.—N. Clerk.—[H.B.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 272.—ANN JAFFRAY or M'GOWAN, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM JAFFRAY, Defender.

Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Testament—Clause—Construction.—Circumstances in which held, in reference to the whole clauses of a marriage-contract, that the deed formed a general conveyance of the whole heritage of the husband for the purpose of division among the children in a certain way, and was not to be construed as limited to a conveyance merely of certain special heritable subjects which happened to be separately enumerated in one of the clauses.

Obiter by the Lord Ordinary, that the meaning to be put by law on a marriage-contract, cannot be affected by any statement as to its meaning or import by one of the spouses in a subsequent testamentary deed, nor could a declaration, even by them both, impair or alter the previously fixed rights of the children.

By antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 12th June 1818, between the late William Jaffray and Margaret Rob, the former, in contemplation of the marriage, conveyed to his promised spouse, in case of surviving him, a liferent, for her liferent use alienarily, of

"all and whole the upper flat of that house at the top of the close situated about the middle of the Baker's Wynd of Stirling, on the north side, and the fourth part of the lower division of the garden which bounds the said house on the north end thereof, being part of a tenement which the said William Jaffray purchased from the heirs of Dr Gillespie, physician in Stirling, as the said house was formerly possessed by Alexander Smith and Steven, and now occupied by the said Alexander Smith, and bounded as in the rights and infeftments of the same."

William Jaffray also obliged himself to make payment to his promised spouse of an annuity of £11 Sterling, exempted from all burdens, at two terms in the year; and for her further security he bound himself to infest and seise her, in case she should survive him, in

"all and whole the said free liferent annuity of £11 Sterling, to be uplifted and taken at the said two terms in the year."

"fourth of all and whole the upper flat of the said house, and fourth part of the gardens situated within the close, about the middle of the Baker's Wynd, particularly above described, and here held as repeated? As also, fourth of all and whole the two eastmost rooms and kitchen, and a room and garret-room on the north end of the uppermost flat of that tenement which faces the street about the middle of the Baker's Wynd; which flat is part of a lot of subjects which the said William Jaffray purchased from the heirs of the said Dr Gillespie, and which two eastmost rooms and kitchen are presently possessed by Robert Dick, plasterer, and the room and garret-room by Walter Mackillop, weaver, as more particularly described by the rights and infeftments of the same."

The deed then, after setting forth that Jaffray was not infest in the subjects above described, contained an obligation to make up a title in favour of his promised spouse, to the effect of securing her in the liferent and annuity, and it then conveyed

"his whole subjects, heritable and moveable, generally and particularly before described, pertaining, or that shall pertain or be addebt to him at the time of his death, to and in favour of Janet, Isobel, and Ann and John Jaffray, his present children of a former marriage, and the child or children to be procreated and existing at his death of his marriage with the said Margaret Rob, equally among them, share and share alike, under the burden always of the liferent provisions before conceived in favour of the said Margaret Rob; and all of which are reserved entire to her."

In consideration of these provisions there was a conveyance by Margaret Rob, by which she assigned, conveyed, and made over her moveable goods and gear, debts, and sums of money then belonging to her, to her promised husband. And she farther

"assigns, conveys and disposes to and in favour of the said William Jaffray and herself, and the longest liver of them in conjunct fee and liferent, for their liferent use alienarily, and to the said Janet, Isobel, Ann and John Jaffray, and any children to be procreated of her marriage with the said William Jaffray, and existing at the death of the longest liver of them two, equally among them, share and share alike, in fee, heritably and irredeemably, all and sundry heritable subjects which now pertain to her, or shall pertain to her at her death; and particularly, without prejudice to the said generality, all and whole these two northmost enclosures of the lands of Swanhill of Plean, and reinds thereof."

A provision was likewise made, that in the event of the husband predeceasing his wife, a certain portion of the rents of the property conveyed to the children was to be allowed to her for the purpose of clothing and alimentering them, in the following terms:

"And for which purpose she shall be, and is hereby authorised to uplift and receive as much of the rents and interest of the subjects, heritable and moveable, pertaining to them, as will defray the expenses of their maintenance and clothing and education, to the extent of £10 Sterling for each child; but in case the said Margaret Rob shall enter into a second marriage after the said William Jaffray's decease, she shall then cease to have any charge of the said Janet, Isobel and Ann, and John Jaffrays."

The husband died in 1833, survived by his widow, as also by two children of a prior marriage, viz., the pursuer Ann, and Janet Jaffray, and by the defender, the only child of the last marriage. He left a testament, said to have been executed on deathbed, which contained the narrative that the spouses had previously "settled their whole heritable and moveable estate which might be belonging to them at the time of their death by the said antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between them, of date the 12th day of June 1818, which antenuptial contract provides and secures, under the exception and burden therein mentioned, the whole heritable and moveable estates which might pertain and belong to them at the time of their death, to Janet, Ann, Isobel and John Jaffrays, children of him the said deceased William Jaffray by a former marriage, and to the children of the present marriage equally betwixt them, share and share alike."

By this latter deed he left all the moveable property that might belong to him at the time of his death to Janet and Ann Jaffray, the children of his former marriage, and William Jaffray Rob, "agreeably to the destination of the said antenuptial contract of marriage;" and he appointed the pursuer, Ann, to be his sole executrix and administratrix, and intromitter with the whole moveable and personal estates that should belong to him at the time of his death; and after paying all his lawful debts and funeral expenses, together with the expenses to be laid out in confirming and recovering his effects, and the residue of his means and estate, he ordained the same to be distributed among Janet, Ann, and William Jaffray, agreeably to their respective rights, as ascertained by the said antenuptial contract of marriage, declaring, that

"the said antenuptial contract of marriage shall form the rule of succession and distribution of the whole heritable property which may belong to him or the said Margaret Rob at the time of their death, among the said Janet, Ann and William Jaffray, his children," &c.

Janet having died, a question then arose as to the rights of the two surviving children under the marriage-contract. The defender, as heir-at-law, claimed the whole of his father's heritage exclusively, so far as not settled by the marriage-contract,—that is to say, all the heritage, with the exception of the subjects described in the deed, on the plea that the contract contained no general conveyance of the father's heritage to be divided among the children share and share alike, but only those portions "generally and particularly before described" in the deed, viz., the subjects over which the liferent was constituted.

On the other hand, the pursuer, who raised this action of declarator to have it found that by the death of her sister she was entitled to two-thirds of the heritage of the father, maintained, that on a sound construction of the deed, the father's whole heritage, and not simply the subjects specially enumerated in the contract for a particular object, was conveyed to the children, share and share alike; and in support of this she pleaded, that it was competent to refer to the testament, as showing the nature of the obligation in the marriage-contract, and that the testator believed that the whole heritage was conveyed in terms of the prior deed. She also founded on certain acts of the defender (making up titles), as inferring homologation on his part of the rights as contended for by her, as arising out of the contract, but this plea was not anxiously insisted in, as it appeared that the defender was at the time a minor of only fourteen years of age.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"1st March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties and considered the process, repels the defences, and finds, declares, adjudges and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds no expenses due to either party.

"Note.—In construing the marriage-contract on which this question depends, the Lord Ordinary leaves the separate testamentary settlement and the alleged homologation by the defender, or rather his alleged acquiescence in the construction put on the marriage-contract by the pursuer, entirely out of view. The meaning to be put by law on a marriage-contract, which is a mutual and onerous deed conferring irrevocable rights on third parties, cannot be affected by any statement as to his or her understanding of its import, made by one of the spouses in a subsequent testamentary settlement. A declaration even by them both could not impair or alter the previously fixed rights of the children. Here the interest of the heir is attempted to be impaired, not merely by a will by one of them, but by a will made on deathbed. The homologation or acquiescence is disposed of by the fact, that the acts on which it is founded occurred while the defender was a minor, and by its not being averred that he was aware of the nature of his legal rights.

"The marriage-contract is so awkwardly expressed that it clearly requires construction. And considering the whole deed, the Lord Ordinary prefers the interpretation of the pursuer, simply because he thinks that the defender's makes the deed very nearly absurd.

"It was clearly the object of the contracting parties to mass their whole properties into one stock, which was to be divisible, after their deaths, among all the children of this or of the former marriage equally. The wife's property, accordingly, is clearly all tied up for this purpose, and she is farther bound, in the event of her survival, to educate and maintain the children, for which purpose she is empowered to take £10 yearly from the share of each. But, after thus fixing the wife, observe the result of the defender's construction quoad the husband.

"In the contract he makes mention of only two parts, and these very insignificant parts, of his real property, and he makes no mention of personal property whatever. After this he comes to make an arrangement on his part in favour of the children, corresponding to the arrangement made by the wife. He therefore disposes to them equally 'his whole subjects, heritable and moveable, generally and particularly before described, pertaining, or that shall pertain or be addbeited to him at the time of his death.' The defender's plea is, that this is a conveyance only of what was generally and particularly before described, that is, of the two fragments, and of nothing else; the result of which is, that he, as a donee, first takes his share of these, and then, as heir, all the rest.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot put this construction on the words, because—1st, It implies that moveables had been previously described, which is not the fact. 2d, It lays the burden of maintaining the children on the surviving wife, while, by giving the children only the two fragments, it prevents her relieving herself out of their property to the extent of £10 yearly, for these properties are not worth this sum. 3d, It is inconsistent with the whole plan and scope of the arrangement. 4th, It is possible to exhaust all the words more rationally. The meaning is, that he disposes his whole subjects, heritable and moveable—his whole subjects generally and particularly before described—his whole subjects pertaining or that shall pertain to him at his death. There is no necessity (as the defender's construction assumes) for tying the words 'generally and particularly before described,' to the immediately preceding words 'heritable and moveable.' Each may form, and in fair construction ought to form, a separate and independent description of property.

"No expenses are given, because the obscurity of the deed made the action and the defence unavoidable."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn considered, that looking to the whole clauses of the contract, there could be no doubt that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded.

Lord Moncreiff was of the same opinion, and that the right way to construe the deed was—not to take an isolated clause on which the defender's whole argument rested, but the whole; and then, in that case, there was no doubt. His Lordship agreed in the views of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Justice-Clerk concurred. The contract was a general settlement, and fell to be construed as liberally as possible against the father, and was not limited in the way contended for by the defender. The only doubt his Lordship had as to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor regarded the finding as to expenses. His Lordship thought that the pursuer was entitled to some expenses, though no doubt the deed was obscure and raised a doubt.

Lord Medwyn thought the pursuer should be found entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Moncreiff concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the said reclaiming notes, and repel the defences; and of new, find, declare, adjudge and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses incurred by them since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed against; appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. A. Anderson, Penney; T. S. Paton, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Christison; Renny and Webster, W.S., Agents.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 273.—THOMAS COREY and MANDATORY, Advocators, v. WILLIAM ANDERSON, Respondent.

Process—Advocation—Competency—A. S., 1825 and 1828—

A party wishing to review the interlocutor of a Sheriff allowing a proof, lodged his note of advocation in the hands of a clerk of the Court of Session; but the Court having held the procedure incompetent, on the ground that the note ought, in the first instance, to have been presented in the Bill-Chamber, a note of advocation was thereafter presented to the Lord Ordinary on the bills. This note was then objected to as incompetent, in respect the fifteen days allowed to advocate by the Act of Sederunt, 1825, had elapsed before presenting the note;—but the Court found the note competent, in respect the subsequent Act of Sederunt, 1828, did not provide that advocations should be presented within a period of fifteen days, as prescribed by the previous Act of Sederunt 1825.

See supra, p. 582. The advocators—after the decision of the Court, by which it was found that their note of advocation ought not to have been presented to a clerk of the Court of Session, in the first instance, but to the Lord Ordinary on the bills—now presented a note of advocation in that latter way; but an objection was taken, that the time allowed for so doing by the Act of Sederunt, 1825 (viz., fifteen days after the interlocutor ordering the proof), had now expired, and that the note was consequently incompetent. Answered—That the Act of Sederunt, 1828, did not contain the same imperative requirement as to the time allowed for presenting the advocation as the Act of Sederunt 1825.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I confess, after looking into the two Acts of Sederunt, I have no doubt as to the competency. The Act of Sederunt, 1825, required that the bill should be presented within fifteen days, and that if it was presented after that period, it fell. But the Act of Sederunt, 1828, does not, to my mind, contain the same sanction; and I think that the period for presenting the bill is not limited by it to the fifteen days required in the other, and that there is nothing in the Act of Sederunt, 1828, to preclude the present advocation. Even had I thought the note not competent, I could not have held that the regulation as to bills of advocation was applicable to notes—which is another reason for thinking the present note competent. But, however, it is not necessary to decide that point here.

Lord Medwyn.—I am of the same opinion, after looking into the two Acts of Sederunt.

Lord Moncreiff.—I agree with your Lordships, and that there is a very material difference between the Act of Sederunt, 1825, and the Act of Sederunt, 1828, and that there is nothing in the latter to preclude the present advocation. I need say no more on the point; and that being a sufficient reason, I think it is unnecessary to go on any other ground.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly remitted to the Lord Ordinary to receive the note of advocation.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. P. Robertson; Greig and Morton, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Rutherford, Cowan; W. Millar, S.S.C., Agent.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 274.—RALPH ERSKINE SCOTT, Advocate, v. The EDINBURGH, LEITH, and NEWHAVEN RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.

Contract—Arbitration—Submission—Railway Statute 6 and 7 Gul. IV.—Construction—A proprietor of land through which the Edinburgh, Leith, and Newhaven Railway Company passed.

entered into an agreement and submission with the company, by which they were allowed to take possession of the ground for the purposes of the railway prior to the ascertainment of the value and compensation for the land to be taken, and it also provided, that that point should be ascertained by arbiters, who also had power to name the time from which interest was to run on the price and damage when fixed. The company entered to possession under the agreement, but the submission fell as to the other point from failure to prorogate. A jury having been summoned under the Statute to fix the value and damage, assessed the value or price of the land at a greater sum than what was contained in the company's offer, both for value and damage, but the jury found nothing for damage. By the Statute, where the company's offer falls short of the sum in the verdict, they have to defray the expense of summoning the jury and the costs of witnesses.—Found that the claims of the parties fell to be regulated, not by the Statute, which it was pleaded excluded the claim for interest, but by the agreement, which was not superseded by the trial under the Statute, and in respect the company had entered to possession at Martinmas 1837, that they were bound in payment of interest on the sum in the verdict, not from its date, but from the period of actual entry, viz., Martinmas 1837.

By the 6th and 7th Will. IV., a company was incorporated to make and maintain a railway from Edinburgh to Newhaven, passing, inter alia, through the lands of Trinity, belonging to Alexander Scot, W.S., and for this purpose they were empowered to enter upon the lands and appropriate such parts as they saw fit for the purposes of the railway. The Statute provided that the value or price of the ground so to be taken, as well as the damages, should be assessed by a jury before the Sheriff of Edinburgh prior to the company entering to possession. According to the averments in the summons, a minute of sale and submission was entered into between Scot and the company, whereby, to facilitate the latter, Scot consented to allow them to enter to possession of his lands prior to the ascertainment of the value and damage, and for that purpose it was agreed that their entry should be at Whitsunday 1837,—Scot becoming bound to free and relieve the company of all public burdens prior thereto falling on the subjects, and the company were to have right to the rents and crops of 1838, and thereafter, and that the price and damage should be settled by arbitration. The submission was limited to 1st January 1838. The arbiters had thereby power to fix the date from which interest should run on the price and damage, and likewise to find either party liable to the other in the expenses of the submission. The company entered to possession of part of the ground in June 1837, and to the remainder in September thereafter. It appeared that various steps of procedure took place in the submission, but nothing definitive was concluded, and it fell in consequence of a failure to prorogate. Thereafter the pursuer, who is Scot's trustee, stated his willingness to treat with the company for the price and damage, in terms of the 25th section of the Act, in consequence of which the company made an offer of £3500 both for price and compensation. But as the offer was refused, a summary application was presented by the company to the Sheriff to summon a jury for the purpose of assessing the amount. The petition of the company was conjoined with a supplementary application at the instance of the pursuer; and a jury having viewed the lands, assessed the price (August 1838) at £4250, less £355 previously paid to account, but nothing was found for damage. As the sum found by the jury was greater than the company's offer, the Sheriff, in decerning for the price, decerned also against the company for expenses, in terms of the Statute.

Scot's trustee brought this action against the company, concluding for payment of interest on the price found by the jury, as from Whitsunday 1837, the period when the company entered to possession under the agreement, and till payment, and also for the expenses connected with the submission,—the expense of collecting and preparing evidence,—and the expense of counsel and agents at the trial, as well as the costs incurred to witnesses before the jury, but under deduction of whatever sums should be paid by the company in name of expenses under their summary application, in terms of the Statute. The claim for expenses amounted to upwards of £1200.

This claim was resisted. Scot, as explained by the company, was the originator of the scheme, and procured from the company, by pressing solicitation, an advance of £355, long before they entered to the lands. It was a fact, they alleged, beyond dispute, that they only entered to possession in the autumn of 1837; in evidence of which the date (September 1837) of the agreement libelled on was adduced, as proving this conclusively; and it was maintained, that even supposing that the term of Whitsunday 1837 was to be taken, legally speaking, as the entry, contrary to what took place, the advance of £355 more than covered any loss from the company's prior possession. It had been alleged that the submission fell from the fault of the company in refusing to prorogate; but this was denied; and even if it were so, it was argued, that it could not affect the question, because the submission having fallen, the whole subject-matter which was to have been disposed of in that way, fell also; and it was no longer competent to refer to any thing that took place prior to the jury trial, as arising from the agreement after the petition to the Sheriff. The matter came to be under the Statute, so that the validity of the present claim must be considered in reference to the Statute alone, and not to the agreement. The whole question of damage and value was put to the jury, and they found a sum for the price merely, but assessed nothing for damage—nominally so speaking. Virtually they did, it was argued: For as they gave so large a sum as £4250 for four acres of ground, previously renting only £6 per acre, it was clear damage was therein included of every kind;—the more especially so, as the case, as put for the pursuer, was one of prospective damage. It was the pursuer's fault if nothing was given for previous damage arising from the previous entry of the company; and yet the fact of prior possession was before the jury. Then, as nothing was specially assessed for that, the jury must have considered that nothing was due; therefore, to ask interest on the sum assessed by the jury from Whitsunday 1837, was to ask damage for prior possession; but that was what the jury did not give; and consequently, and as the Statute was silent on such matters, the Sheriff had no power to entertain the question. Besides, the advance of £355 more than covered the claim. As to the claim for expenses, it was equally incompetent as including charges not assessable under the Statute. This claim was not to be judged of as arising, at common law, under the agreement, but as under the Statute, from the submission having fallen; and accordingly, the only charges claimable from the company was the mere expense of summoning the jury, and the costs of witnesses. The words of the Act were quite precise as to this, and the enactment was intended to prevent any extravagant mode of conducting such trials. The Statute provided,

"That in every such case in which the verdict of a jury shall be given for the same, or a greater sum than shall have been previously offered by the said company, for the purchase of any lands, grounds, and heritages, to be used or taken by them for the purposes of this Act, or as compensation or satisfaction for any damage or loss which may happen or arise in the execution of any of the powers hereby granted, all the costs of summoning such jury, and the expenses of witnesses, shall be defrayed by the said company, and such costs, charges, and expenses, shall be settled by the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute."

It was plain that the Sheriff could only give expenses under the summary application taken under the Statute. It was there the cause of action originated; and it was only in the cause where the matter of dispute occurred that expenses could be given,—that is to say, under the summary application. Accordingly, the claim now made, as insisted in in a different process, was utterly incompetent.

Scot's trustee answered—That it was incompetent to argue the claim as arising simply under the Statute. It was true that the submission had fallen, and that under the Act, the price had been assessed by a jury; but still the agreement under which the company entered to prior possession remained in full force. The company possessed, or were entitled to possess, in virtue of the agreement from Whitsunday 1837; and though the price was not fixed till some time afterwards, interest was nevertheless due on the price, when ascertained, from the period of entry, as part of the condition under which Scot consented to the agreement, and under, and in faith of which it must be held the company were allowed to possess, as much so as the payment of the price itself must be held to have been a condition of the agreement. It was impossible to disconnect the case before the jury from the agreement, as but for it the company would not have been in possession at the trial. The agreement under which possession was had, and was maintained, remained; and though the submission lapsed, and the price was not fixed by arbitration, nevertheless the verdict of the jury came in place of that method of fixing it, and must be held as having performed the office in that particular of the submission. It was quite settled, that from the time when a party cedes the possession and rents of his lands, the surrogate, namely, the interest, should begin to run. When parties agree on a term of entry, they, by necessary implication, agree on the term from which interest is to run; and by leaving this last point to arbiters, they plainly leave them no alternative but either to decide in that way, or to enlarge the price beyond the mere value for the time, so as substantially to make an allowance for interest. As to the sum of £355, it was given, not as an equivalent for prior possession, but merely as an indulgence to Mr Scot for the corresponding indulgence the company obtained of earlier possession than they could have otherwise had. In reference to the claim for expenses, supposing that the Statute limited the costs exigible under it to the costs of witnesses, and of summoning the jury, it did not take away the right existing at common law, in reference to a valid claim, to apply for the separate and extra expenses which were always unavoidably incurred by way of an ordinary action. By the 25th section of the Statute, either party, in the event of their being unable to agree as to a price, was empowered to apply to the Sheriff. That was a mere power; and any third party having a legal claim of any kind against the company, remained entitled to appeal to the ordinary courts of law. That was the case even with regard to that class of claims to which the statutory proceeding was applicable, and still more so, of course, in regard to claims of any other sort. In the present instance, the company originally acquired a right to the subjects under a special contract, and not in virtue of the powers of taking possession conferred on them by their Statute. Afterwards, no doubt, the statutory proceeding was had recourse to by the company, but only to the special effect of ascertaining the value of the lands as at the date of the verdict. The case before the jury had no reference to the prior possession, or to the agreement. The present claim was in reference entirely to it. It could not have been stated to the jury, as not falling under the Statute or the summary application; and it was incompetent to say that the pursuer's right to claim expenses, connected with a previous state of circumstances not before the jury, and not contained in the summary application, could be taken away by the Statute. It was a valid claim at common law, not arising under the Statute at all, but under a totally different and separate state of circumstances.—(The expenses would appear, from the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, to have been settled in the summary application in the Sheriff Court).

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"14th May 1839.—The Sheriff-substitute having considered the closed record, finds, 1st, That the pursuer has no claim for interest on the sum of money awarded to him by the jury as the value of his lands at Trinity, taken by the defenders under the Statutes 6 and 7 Will. IV. ch. 31, previous to the date of the verdict, either in name of damages, over those which were estimated by the jury, or as compensation for occupation of the ground which he had ceded to the defenders under a private agreement, previous to the jury trial: Finds, 2dly, That it is incompetent in this action to entertain the pursuer's claim for the expenses of the jury trial, or any other expenses incurred by him in the summary process referred to in the libel; and in respect thereof sustains the defences and dismisses the action, reserving to the pursuer his claim for interest on the sum awarded to him by the jury, from and after the date of the verdict until payment; and also his claim for the whole or any part of the expenses incurred by him in the jury trial, or in the summary process above referred to, to be recovered by him under the decree in that process, and to the defenders their defences as accords: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, allows an account to be given in for taxation, and decerns." (Signed) "ADAM URQUHART."

"Note.—The Sheriff-substitute is not prepared to find the action altogether incompetent as to the demand for interest on the sum awarded by the jury; but he is decidedly of opinion that that claim is ill founded on the merits. The pursuer, or his constituent, ought to have stipulated expressly for interest on the sum to be ultimately found due, before he allowed the railway company to take possession of the land, if he meant to insist on such a claim, or else he should have stated the previous occupancy as an element for the consideration of the jury, in estimating the value to be given for the land at the trial.

"As to the demand for the expenses preparatory to the trial, a question may certainly be raised, whether the clause in the Statute about costs is to be so strictly (and indeed harshly) interpreted as is contended for by the defenders, or whether the expenses of summoning the jury must not be held to include all the expenses necessarily incident to the trial, and in preparation thereof; but it appears to the Sheriff-substitute that it is not competent to try that question in this process. It may be raised under the decree in the summary application, in the shape of objections to the auditor's report, or to the taxing of the accounts."

An appeal was dismissed by the Sheriff, who appended the following note to his interlocutor:

"As to the first point of this cause, the Sheriff is of opinion, that the submission having been allowed to expire, the pursuer's claim falls to be regulated by the verdict of the jury. It must now be held that the jury have awarded to the pursuer what to them appeared a sufficient sum, not merely for the lands, but also as a recompense to be given for the damages sustained by the pursuer, in terms of the 25th clause of the Statute.

"The Sheriff has no power, either directly or indirectly, to add to the sum awarded by the jury, which must be held to include every claim which the pursuer could have brought forward against the defender.

"As to the second point, the expenses can only be determined in the application at the instance of the defenders, when the pursuer's account of his expenses in that action is brought forward in that process for taxation."

In an advocacy, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this judgment:

"31st May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the record, documents produced, and whole process, In respect, 1st, That the Act of Parliament under which the respondents acted, expressly precluded them from entering on Mr Scot's lands till they had settled with him for the price and damages of the portion proposed to be occupied; 2d, That Mr Scot, by a special minute of agreement, dated 7th September 1837, entered into with the respondents, agreed to dispense with the said statutory provision, and to allow them to take possession of the land then required by them, on condition that the term of Whitsunday 1837 should be fixed as their term of entry, and that the value of the lands and the damages should be ascertained by arbiters mutually chosen; 3d, That the said submission lapsed apparently from no fault imputable to Mr Scot, but solely from want of a valid prorogation; 4th, That the subsequent remit to and verdict of the jury must be held merely as a proceeding necessary to supply the want of the valuation by arbiters; 5th, That the sum awarded by the jury consisted of price, and not of damages: Finds that the price awarded by the jury must, in the circumstances of this case, be held to be payable, and to carry interest from the actual and declared term of entry previously fixed by the special agreement of the parties: Therefore advocates the cause, alters the interlocutors of the Sheriff complained of, and decerns, in terms of the libel, against the defenders for payment of interest on the said price from Whitsunday 1837, as libelled: Farther, with respect to the conclusions in this action for the costs of the trial, in respect it is admitted that these have been discussed and settled in the other process or proceeding before the Sheriff under which the jury was summoned, finds it unnecessary now to give any judgment or decree as to these costs: Finds no expenses due to either party, so far as the same were incurred in the Inferior Court in reference to both conclusions of the libel; but finds the advocator entitled to expenses in this Court, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns."

The company reclaimed, praying the Court

"to alter the interlocutor submitted to review, and find that the advocator, the original pursuer, is only entitled to interest upon the sum awarded by the jury to the late Mr Scot, as the price of that portion of the lands of Trinity occupied by the railway, from and after the date of the trial by which the price of the lands was fixed on the 2d August 1838; or at all events,

SCOTTISH JURIST.

to alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, in so far as it finds the advocator entitled to the whole expenses incurred by him in this Court, in respect that the interlocutor of the Sheriff assailing the respondents from those conclusions of the libel which were applicable to the expenses of the trial, has been adhered to; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

The Court

"Recal the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find that possession was obtained at Whitsunday 1837, in respect of an agreement and submission in which the referees had power to ascertain from what period, embracing said term of entry, the price to be fixed should bear interest, and on the faith of that reference being acted upon: Find that the possession and the claims of parties must be regulated by said agreement: Find that the trial did not supersede the fulfilment of the agreement, so far as regards the possession obtained under said agreement, and not by virtue of the Act of Parliament: Find that it is competent for the Court to declare whether interest shall be paid for the possession so obtained under this agreement before the statutory proceedings for fixing the price: Find that the fair interest to be paid should be the interest of the sum found by the jury as the price of the lands; and in respect of the term of actual entry, find and declare that interest shall be paid from the term of Martinmas 1837: Find the advocator entitled to the expenses incurred in this Court to the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but to no further expenses."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Rutherford, Monro; J. R. Stoddart, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Sandford; Renny and Webster, W.S., Agents.—Russell, Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 275.—The EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW UNION CANAL COMPANY, Petitioners, v. SIR J. G. CARMICHAEL, Bart., Respondent.

Process—Expenses—Petition to Apply Judgment—Appeal—The expense of an application to the Court to apply a judgment of the House of Lords reversing an interlocutor of the Court of Session, allowed to the petitioner.

Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael, Bart., raised an action against the petitioners, in terms of an agreement libelled on, for payment of such a sum of money as should be ascertained to be the value of the rock on his estate which was covered by the canal. The Lord Ordinary, and subsequently the Court, sustained the claim generally, and the Lord Ordinary thereafter ordered consignment of £3930 to account of the pursuer's claims. Afterwards he brought a supplementary action, concluding for bygone legal interest on the above sum, and the Lord Ordinary and the Court sustained also that claim. The petitioners thereupon granted bond of caution for the amount of bygone interest found due, and then appealed to the House of Lords against the various judgments in the cause, in so far as they had been found liable in bygone interest. The House of Lords reversed the findings of the Court of Session, in so far as appealed against.

The petitioners now presented a petition to the Court to apply the judgment of the House of Lords, and to find them entitled to expenses, including the expense of the present application.

The respondent objected to the Court finding the petitioners entitled to the expenses of the application, as unusual.

The petitioners answered, that they were entitled to these expenses, as the respondent had never afforded them any facilities to get up their bond of caution; and as a precedent, they referred to the case of Brodie v. Sinclair, 3d December 1831, 10 S. and D., p. 99. See also Shaw's New Digest, voce Appeal.

VOL. XIV.—No. XL.

The Court were unanimously of opinion that the case of Brodie was a precedent, and that the petitioners were entitled to the expense of the application; and their Lordships accordingly, in the following interlocutor applying the judgment of the House of Lords, decerned for payment of the expense of the application:

"Alter the interlocutors appealed from, in so far as the same find the petitioners liable in payment of interest upon the ascertained value of the stone under the canal; assoilzie the petitioners from the whole conclusions of the supplementary summons: Find them entitled to expenses in the proceedings consequent thereupon in this Court, including the expenses of the present application and procedure thereon, and remit the account of expenses, when lodged, to the auditor for taxation: And further, order repetition of the said sum of £2589. 13. 11. paid by the petitioners, with the legal interest thereof since paid: Grant warrant to the clerk of Court to transmit the bond of caution above mentioned to the Register of Deeds, that an extract thereof may be delivered to the petitioners; and authorise all legal execution to proceed thereon at their instance against Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael, Bart., and the cautioner in the said bond, for repetition of the said sum, and the legal interest thereof: Allow the decree for said sum and interest to be extracted ad interim, but supersede the same till the first day of September next, and decern."

Act. J. S. More; W., A. G., and R. Ellis, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood); Gibson-Craigs, Dalziel and Brodie, W.S., Agents.—P. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 276.—JAMES BEAUMONT NEILSON and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. The HOUSEHILL COAL and IRON COMPANY, Defenders.

Jury Cause—Damages—Patent, Infringement of—Bill of Exceptions—Jury question, in an action of damages, as to the infringement of a patent for an improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required—Verdict for pursuers, and thereafter sustained on a bill of exceptions by the Court.

Process—Record—Proof—Evidence—Witness—Statute 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 83—Patent, Infringement of—Jury Cause—Circumstances in which, in an action of damages brought for the infringement of a patent, where the defender proposed to call witnesses to prove that the principle of the patent had been in public use prior thereto in Scotland—Held that the proposed line of evidence was inadmissible, as no sufficient notice of such course had been given to the pursuer on the record;—and opinion, (1.) That in regard to an allegation of prior use of the principle of a patent, it is not enough to aver so, generally, but it is necessary that the prior use at particular places, and by particular persons, shall be set forth in such a way that the pursuer may be able distinctly to meet such averment; and, (2.) That the Statute 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 83, § 5, in regard to a defender in such an action giving certain notice of what he intended to found on at the trial, did not extend to Scotland, but merely referred to the mode of pleading to be adopted in English actions brought for the infringement of patents.

See supra, p. 174. A warrant for letters-patent was issued on 19th July 1828 in favour of Neilson, for the purpose of securing to him the invention to which he laid claim, and now to be alluded to, for the term of fourteen years thereafter. The warrant for the letters-patent commences in name of the Sovereign, and sets forth that Neilson had application, he hath invented and found out 'an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required,' which invention the petitioner believes will be of public utility: That he is the first and true inventor thereof, and that the same has not been heretofore used or practised by any other person or persons whomsoever, to his knowledge or belief."

"humbly represented unto his Majesty, that after considerable

It narrated that the applicant requested that letters-patent should be issued in his favour, and it then proceeded:

"And his Majesty being willing to give encouragement to all arts and inventions which may be for the public good and benefit, therefore his Majesty, of his special grace," &c., "gives and grants to the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, his special leave, license, and full power, sole privilege and authority, that he, the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, by themselves, or such other person as he or they shall appoint or agree with, and no others, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, during the term herein expressed, shall and lawfully may make, use, exercise, and vend the said invention within that part of his Majesty's United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Scotland, in such manner as to the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, or any of them, in their discretion, shall seem meet, and that he and they shall and may have and enjoy the whole profits, benefits, and advantages from time to time accruing and arising by reason of the said invention." "His Majesty does, by these presents, for himself, his heirs and successors, require and strictly command all and every person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, within the said part of his Majesty's United Kingdom called Scotland, that neither they, nor any of them during the continuance of the said term of fourteen years hereby granted, either directly or indirectly, do make, use, or put in practice the said invention, or any part thereof, so attained unto by the said James Beaumont Neilson as aforesaid, nor in anywise counterfeit, imitate, or resemble the same, nor shall make, or cause to be made, any addition thereto, or subtraction from the same, whereby to pretend himself or themselves the inventor or inventors, deviser or devisors thereof, without the license, consent, or agreement of the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in writing under their hands, first had and obtained in that behalf, upon such pains and penalties as can or may be justly inflicted on the said offenders, for the contempt of his Majesty's royal command, to be answerable to the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, according to law, for their or either of their damages thereby occasioned." "Provided always, likewise it is expressly provided and declared, that if, at any time during the said term hereby granted, it shall be made appear to his Majesty, his heirs or successors, or to any six or more of his or their Privy Council, that this grant is contrary to law, or prejudicial or inconvenient to his Majesty's subjects in general, or that the said invention is not a new invention, as to the public use and exercise thereof, in that part of his Majesty's said United Kingdom called Scotland, or not invented by the said James Beaumont Neilson as aforesaid; then, upon signification thereof to be made by his Majesty, his heirs or successors, under his or their signet or privy seal, or by the Lords and others of his or their Privy Council, or any six or more of them, under their hands and seals, these letters-patent shall forthwith cease, determine, and be utterly void, to all intents and purposes, any thing herein-before contained to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided also, that these, his Majesty's letters-patent, or any thing herein contained, shall not extend, or be construed to extend, to give privilege to the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, or either of them, to use, imitate, or make any invention or work whatsoever, which hath hitherto been found out and invented by any other of his Majesty's subjects whatsoever, publicly used and exercised in that part of his Majesty's said United Kingdom called Scotland, unto whom like letters-patent have been already granted, for the sole use, benefit, and exercise thereof,—it being his Majesty's will and pleasure that the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and all and every other person or persons unto whom like letters-patent or privileges have been already granted as aforesaid, shall distinctly use and practise their several inventions, by them invented, according to the true intent and meaning of the same respective letters-patent, and of these presents." "And lastly, his Majesty, by these presents, for himself, his heirs and successors, grants unto the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that these letters-patent, under the seal aforesaid, shall be, in and by all things, good, firm, valid, sufficient, and effectual in law, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and shall be taken, construed, and adjudged in the most favourable and beneficial sense, for the best advantage of the said James Beaumont Neilson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, as well in all his Majesty's Courts as elsewhere, and by all and singular the officers and ministers whatsoever of his Majesty, his heirs and successors, in that part of his said United Kingdom called Scotland, and amongst all and every the subjects of his Majesty, his heirs and successors whatsoever and wheresoever; provided the said James Beaumont Neilson, within the space of four calendar months, to be computed from the date of the said intended letters-patent, do cause a particular description of the nature of his said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, by writing under his hand and seal, to be enrolled in his Majesty Court of Chancery in that part of his Majesty's said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Scotland, otherwise the said letters-patent to be void. And his Majesty does farther will and command that this charter do pass the Great Seal, per saltum, without passing any other Seal. For doing whereof," &c.

After the issue of the letters-patent, 27th January 1829, Neilson lodged his specification, which, after setting forth the purport of the patent, proceeded as follows:

"In which letters-patent there is contained a proviso, obliging me the said James Beaumont Neilson, by an instrument in writing under my hand and seal, particularly to describe and ascertain the nature of my said invention." "Now, know ye, that in compliance with the said proviso, I, the said James Beaumont Neilson, do hereby declare, that my invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, consists in introducing into, and applying to the fires, forges, and furnaces, atmospheric air, in the following manner:—A blast or current of air must be produced by bellows, or other blowing apparatus now in use in the ordinary way, to which mode of producing the blast or current of air this patent is not intended to extend. The blast or current of air so produced, is to be passed from the bellows or blowing apparatus into an air vessel or receptacle, made sufficiently strong to endure the blast, and through and from that vessel or receptacle, by means of a tube pipe, or aperture, into the fire, forge, or furnace. The air vessel or receptacle must be air-tight, or nearly so, except the apertures for the admission or emission of the air; and at the commencement, and during the continuance of the blast, it must be kept artificially heated in a considerable temperature. It is better that the temperature be kept to a red heat, or nearly so, but so high a temperature is not absolutely necessary to produce a beneficial effect. The air vessel or receptacle may be conveniently made of iron; but as the effect does not depend upon the nature of the material, other metals or convenient materials may be used. The size of the air vessel must depend upon the blast, and on the heat necessary to be produced. For an ordinary smith's fire or forge, an air vessel or receptacle capable of containing 1200 cubic inches will be of proper dimensions; and for a cupola of the usual size for cast-iron foundries, an air-vessel capable of containing 10,000 cubic inches will be of a proper size. For fires, forges, or furnaces upon a greater scale, such as blast-furnaces for smelting iron, large cast-iron foundries' cupolas, air vessels of proportionably increased dimensions and numbers will be required. The form or shape of the air vessel or receptacle is immaterial to the effect, and may be adapted to the local circumstances and situation. The air vessel may be in general conveniently heated by a fire distinct from the fire to be affected by the blast or current of air; and, generally, it will be better that the fire and the air vessel should be enclosed in brick-work or masonry, through which the pipes or tubes connected with the air vessel should pass. The manner of applying the heat to the air vessel is, however, immaterial to the effect, if it be kept at a proper temperature."

The patentee, and other parties to whom he had assigned the benefit of the patent, brought this action against the defenders for an alleged infringement of it, and therefore to recover reparation by way of damages. The defenders admitted the use of the hot-blast, but they averred that they employed it in a manner substantially different from the mode prescribed by the patent and specification. The mode which they adopted was described as follows:

"A steam-engine is used of from 60 to 70 horses power, and which power is so applied by means of a blowing cylinder, valve, and communicating pipes, as to be capable of impelling above 2000 cubic feet of air per minute into the smelting furnace, under a pressure of from 2 to 3 pounds on each square inch. An air receptacle is next used. This is a large air-tight space or opening, formed by excavating rock and other minerals, and having a sectional area of about 24 square feet, and having a communication with what are called the main conducting air-pipes, of upwards of 5 feet of sectional area, by a mine which is driven through various minerals, and having a sectional area of about 20 square feet, this, with the main conducting air-pipes and receiver-connections, contains about 18 times the quantity of air contained in the blowing cylinder. This receiver is made to communicate directly with the blowing cylinder by means of two large air-ducts, having each a sectional area of about 11 feet, and a pipe having a sectional area of about nine feet, so as to keep up the continuity or uniformity of the stream of air, with a pressure varying from 1 to 3½ lbs. per inch in all the communicating pipes. The main conducting air-pipes, after leaving the air mine, is prolonged to near the heating furnaces, which are again placed near the smelting furnace, and from thence the blast is conducted to each heating furnace by a branch pipe of about 75 square inches of sectional area.

"The heating furnace is an erection which comprehends an arrangement or apparatus, by which the current of air is heated on its way to the smelting furnace. For this purpose the current of air is divided, and made to pass through a series of pipes intensely heated in the furnace in the following manner:—The conducting air-pipe is continued horizontally into the lower part of the brick-work of the heating furnace, and forms what is called a lying pipe. After entering this lying pipe, the current of air is diverted by a partition or stop, and divides into several smaller streams which enter into small branched pipes placed across the fire in the form of the letter A with a circular top, and re-unite in a second lying pipe placed parallel with the first on the opposite side of the fire. The joint areas of the transverse sections of these small pipes, taken together, are of about the same extent as that of the conducting air-pipe as it enters the heating furnace, of which, indeed, they are the continuation, as they transmit the current of air with nearly the same velocity as in the conducting air-pipe, only exposing a much more extensive heating surface to the action of the fire. The current of air being now partially heated, is stopped by a partition in the second lying pipe, and returns back in a similar series of curved branches to a second portion of the first lying pipe, and the current of air is in this way successively diverted by partitions in the lying pipes, and divided into small streams, and made to cross and recross the fire alternately in opposite directions three times in all, and passing each time in several transverse pipes to the extent of 16 in all, until it is again united for the last time near the termination of one of the lying pipes, from which it passes off in a single pipe, forming a continuation of the conducting air-pipe, and leading off from the heating furnace towards the smelting furnace, into which the stream of air is discharged from this hot air-pipe at a temperature of about the heat of melting lead.

" In carrying these arrangements into effect, several important provisions are made for the purpose of rendering the heating apparatus effectual and durable.

" (1.) The form of cross section of the transverse pipes is such as at once to receive a great proportion of radiated heat from the fire, and to expose extensive surface for conducting heat to the enclosed air, so much so that there is only about one cubic inch of air under heat for each superficial inch of heated pipe. For this purpose these pipes are flattened out in an elliptical form, and sufficient space is left to allow the hot air and flame to circulate freely around them.

" (2.) In the next place, these pipes, as they pass from the one lying pipe to the other, are of such a form as to avoid injury from the expansion produced by the heat which is apt to crack them, and so destroy the apparatus. They are therefore made to rise up and form an arch of about ten feet in height, crossing over in the arch of a circle similar to the letter A, with a circular top as already described, and again descending on the opposite side to the second lying pipe. These pipes are about an inch and a quarter in thickness, and about 13 square inches area of internal section. They are fixed into the sockets, where they join the lying pipes, with a luting of burned fire-clay covered by a layer of rust cement. The lying pipes themselves, and the sockets into which the transverse pipes are inserted, are surrounded by fire brick-work to protect them from the destructive action of the intenser portion of the heat: and the heat is also distributed more uniformly over the surface of these heating pipes by flues or openings leading through various parts of the furnace, and the whole pipes are surrounded by an exterior brick building, leaving a space of some inches round the pipes in which the flame and hot gases still continue to play upon the pipes, which again give out the heat to the enclosed air. The products of combustion are finally led off into a chimney by flues. The furnace bars are placed about 1 or 1½ feet below the lying pipes over an ash pit of the usual construction. From the heating furnace the hot air-pipe is continued towards the smelting furnace, and is carefully surrounded by non-conducting materials to prevent the loss of heat; the air, on leaving this pipe is again divided into two smaller streams passing through two pipes of a less diameter, and terminating in a conical orifice varying from two to four inches in least diameter, from which the hot air is at once discharged into the smelting furnace through apertures in the hearth or lower part of the furnace. At the apertures where the hot blast is discharged into the smelting furnace, there is placed a very essential and important portion of the hot-blast apparatus, called the water-twyre. Without this apparatus it is impossible to prevent the discharge pipe of the hot blast from being immediately destroyed by the joint action of the hot air, which it discharges into the smelting furnace, and of the intense heat of the furnace itself. The water-twyre effectually prevents this evil, and allows the furnace mouth to be perfectly closed around it, and to retain all the heat and air of the furnace. The water-twyre is a short conical tube, varying from 4 to 4½ inches of internal diameter at the narrower end, 16 inches long, with from 1½ to 2 inches of taper on each side. This is placed in the blowing orifice of the furnace pointing inwards on the hearth, and into it is inserted the taper point of the hot-blast pipe, so as to be protected from the heat to which the twyre is itself exposed.

" The following is the manner in which the twyre is constructed, so as to resist the destructive action of the intense heat to which it is exposed. It is composed not of solid iron, but is formed by a hollow malleable iron pipe which forms the circle of the narrower end of the twyre nearest the fire, and then continues to wind backward in a conical spiral through 1½ to 2½ turns round the blast-pipe. Around these coils of pipe which are from half an inch to three-fourths of an inch of internal diameter, and about one-fourth of an inch in thickness, is then cast the conical tube of iron which forms the external surface of the twyre, and it is by causing a stream of cold water brought in a pipe from a reservoir at a considerable height above the twyre to flow constantly through the spiral pipe in the twyre, entering first at one side of the twyre at the point nearest the fire, and passing out of the twyre at the other side, after receding back to a less intense heat, that the twyre is kept cool and preserved. The water in this short circuit is heated to about 80° to 100° of Fahrenheit, and passed so rapidly as not to rise above this temperature which is regulated by giving the reservoir which supplies the twyre a sufficient elevation. The height of the reservoir at Househill Iron Works above the twyre, is about 36 or 38 feet. The pipes, especially those parts in the heating furnaces, are kept at all points, and especially at all their joints and connections, as perfectly air-tight as possible. They are all made of cast-iron about 1½ to 1¾ inch thick where exposed to the action of the heating furnaces, and about three-fourths of an inch to one inch thick in other parts.

" These improvements included in what is generally called the hot-blast process, and hereinbefore described as now in use at the Househill Iron Works, do not consist in blowing a furnace by means of a steam-engine, and an arrangement of conducting pipes with air at the ordinary temperature, but only in the following improved process and apparatus for carrying the same into effect, viz., the introduction of the pipe or pipes that convey the cold air coming from the blowing engine and the air receiver in manner aforesaid, into a heating furnace or oven, where the current of air is divided into numerous smaller streams, and is exposed to a more extensive heating surface, formed by a series of transverse pipes; and which divided stream of air, after acquiring a temperature about the heat of melting lead, is again united and transmitted in a single pipe, and impelled into the smelting furnace through a pipe or pipes surrounded by the water-twyre as aforesaid.

" Although the peculiar forms of the hot-blast apparatus employed at the Househill Iron Works for carrying the process into effect, vary in some respects from those used at other works, yet the principle is the same in all of them, namely, that of separating the stream of air into a number of smaller streams passing through a heating furnace, in such a manner as to expose a large heating surface to its action, and reuniting these in one hot stream, which, on approaching the furnace, is again divided into several streams, and each passed through a water-twyre into the smelting furnace, and of using two or three of such sets of heating apparatus and their water-twyres, to blow simultaneously air of the temperature of melting lead into the smelting furnace, all as before described."

And they averred that the patent was invalid,

" 1st, Because the title of the patent, and the relative specification, are altogether inconsistent with each other; the former being merely for an improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, does not comprehend the process claimed under the specification, which is an alleged improvement, not in the application of air to produce heat, but in the preparation of air, or, in other words, the specification discloses something altogether different from what is set forth in the title of the patent.

" 2d, Because the specification is defective, inasmuch as it does not state explicitly whether Mr Neilson claims, as his invention, the application of heated air generally, or only the particular mode or application of it by means of an air vessel or receptacle.

" 3d, Because the introduction and application of heated air into fires, forges, and furnaces, to produce a more intense heat and combustion for various purposes, was known and publicly practised prior to the date of Mr Neilson's patent. More particularly, heated air was introduced into the process of creating combustion, and consuming smoke, by the invention of Mr George Chapman of Whitby, in 1825, as well as in other processes. See the Glasgow Mechanics Magazine of that period, to which the pursuer, Mr Neilson, was a contributor, and he was also a reader of it.

" 4th, Because the application of atmospheric air, heated beyond its ordinary temperature, to promote combustion in smelting furnaces, fires or forges, or in the smelting of ores and metals, which, without any limitation, is the invention now claimed by Mr Neilson as his, was known and practised prior to the date of his patent, both in England and Scotland. In particular, it was, among others, practised by the late Mr Dawson of the Low Moor Iron Works in Yorkshire, by Mr Wilkinson of the Bradley Iron Works in Staffordshire, and also at the Horsely Iron Works in that county. See also Nicholson's Journal of Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, and the Arts, for April 1798, in which there is published a Treatise by Mr James Sadler, chemist to the Admiralty, entitled, 'Description of an Apparatus for disengaging Oxygen Gas, and applying it to the best advantage; to which are added, 'Observations on the Blow-pipe by William Nicholson.' Also the patent obtained by the Rev. Robert Stirling, one of the ministers of Kilmarnock, in December 1816, for his invention 'for diminishing the consumption of fuel,' &c., and relative specifications; and the patent obtained on 6th May 1828, by Mr Botfield of Hopton Court, in the county of Salop, for his invention 'for certain improvements in making of iron, or in the method or methods of smelting or making of iron,' and relative specification. Further, in 1825, or about that time, Mr Jeffries, of the Grove Foundry, Southwark, invented a mode or modes of applying heated air in its transit in pipes (two or more) placed in a charcoal fire, for the purpose of producing a more intense degree of heat in the smelting of iron-ores or other minerals, and he practised, and has continued to practise his said invention, and improvements thereon, either by himself or the company carrying on business at the Grove Foundry in Southwark, of which he was a partner.

"5th, Because even if Mr Neilson had discovered the advantage of applying heated air to furnaces for smelting iron ore, the particular mode of applying heated air by means of an air vessel or receptacle, which is vaguely described in his specification, is substantially the mode or apparatus for which Mr Botfield had previously obtained his patent.

"6th, Because the specification, in so far as it can be understood as descriptive of a particular apparatus for forming and applying heated air, describes an apparatus which does not answer the purpose; and as a patent can only be validly obtained for a discovery or improvement which is practically useful, Mr Neilson's patent is on this ground also invalid.

"7th, The specification supposes that there is to be only one air vessel or receptacle which is to be applied on the same principle to the smelting of iron in a blast furnace, as it is to be applied in a common blacksmith's shop,—the air vessel being proportionally increased in size. But the specification does not contemplate more than one vessel, or the air being transmitted from one vessel to another; all that it contemplates, is a single vessel or receptacle in which the air is to be heated, and then conducted from the air vessel in which it has been heated into the blast furnace by means of a tube. The specification expressly excludes the tube or tubes conducting the air to and from the receptacle as any portion of the vessel in which the air is to be heated. Further, it excludes the tubular form or vessel in which the air is to be heated altogether. Whereas it was not till after great labour, and many experiments, that the tubular form of heating air was discovered and found to be practically useful, while the air vessel or receptacle described by Mr Neilson was abandoned as useless.

"8th, Because, by proportionally increasing the air vessel in the ratio pointed out by the specification, in order to produce heat in the vessel in which the air is contained, instead of producing an increased heat, the effect, by following the patentee's description, would be the very reverse; and instead of being practically useful, it would be the very opposite.

"9th, Because the statement in the specification, that the form, size, or shape of the air vessel is immaterial to the effect, is an incorrect and untrue statement, and violates the specification and patent.

"10th, Because the introduction into smelting furnaces, of atmospheric air heated to the temperature now used of 600°, would be utterly impracticable without the application of the water-twyre, which was not in use at smelting furnaces at the date of Mr Neilson's patent, and the application of which is no part of his invention, or of the process described in his specification. Without the application of cold water round the twyre, no pipe passing air, heated to the temperature of 600°, would last many minutes, and consequently the work could not be carried on without it.

"And even if Mr Neilson had discovered the application, or an improved application of atmospheric air to produce heat in furnaces, the highest temperature in which it can be used in the smelting process, requiring for its success the use of the water-twyre, the combination of the water-twyre, with the apparatus described in the alleged invention (even had it been new), constitutes as substantial an improvement on the application of heated air to produce combustion in smelting furnaces, as the alleged improvement of Mr Neilson was upon the principle and modes of producing combustion by means of heated air previously known and in use.

"11th, Mr Neilson's patent is invalid on account of the general vagueness of the specification, which was not accompanied by any drawings or models, and is of itself insufficient to describe the alleged invention, or to enable workmen of competent skill to construct the necessary apparatus and conduct the process; and when the apparatus was constructed so far as it could be according to the description given of it in the specification, at the sight and under the direction of Mr Neilson himself, and of the deceased Colin Dunlop, and the pursuer John Wilson, it was, after repeated trials by them and others, in various parts of Scotland, found to be altogether useless, and the attempt to use the alleged invention was utterly abandoned.

"12th A specification which is calculated to mislead, and which casts upon the public the expense of labour and experiments, is bad, and invalidates the patent, and that is the case with this specification, which has thrown upon the public the labour and expense of making experiments for years, in order to ascertain, if possible, what it was that the specification was meant to disclose, or what kind of machine could be employed so as to be practically useful in heating the blast furnace."

Before the record was closed, the defenders, by a paper separate from it, intimated to the pursuers, that "besides denying that they have infringed the alleged letters-patent, the defenders intend, at the trial of the issues in this case, to rely on the following objections: That the said James B. Neilson is not the first and true inventor of the said supposed invention: That the said supposed invention was publicly used and put in practice, both in Scotland and England, before the granting of the said letters-patent: That before the date of the said letters-patent, the said invention had been publicly disclosed in divers philosophical and other printed books, and, amongst others, in a treatise or paper published by Mr James Sadler, in Nicholson's Journal of Natural Philosophy for the month of April 1798: That the introduction and application of heated air into furnaces for the purpose of producing a more intense heat, was in 1825, or before the date of the letters-patent, made known by the invention of Mr George Chapman of Whitby's process for creating combustion and consuming smoke: That the application of atmospheric air beyond the ordinary degree of temperature, to promote or facilitate the smelting of iron and other ores, is claimed generally by Mr Neilson's patent; whereas, such application of atmospheric air beyond the ordinary degree of temperature, was known and publicly practised both in Scotland and England prior to the date of the said letters-patent, and in various instances by a process or apparatus similar to, and substantially the same with that described in the said letters-patent, and relative specification: That in particular, the said application of atmospheric air, beyond the ordinary degree of temperature, was known and publicly practised before the date of the said letters-patent at Irvine, Greenock, Glasgow, and at various other places in the counties of Ayr, Renfrew and Lanark, and also at various places in the county of Mid-Lothian; as also at Liverpool, and in or near London, and at the Bradley and the Horsely Iron Works in Staffordshire, and at the Low Moor Iron Work in Yorkshire, by various iron masters and iron-founders, anchor smiths, and other persons engaged in the smelting and manufacturing of iron; and prior to the date of the said letters-patent, the principle of the application of heated atmospheric air to fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, had been disclosed in two several patents."

A discussion ensued as to the form of the issues before the Lord Ordinary (see supra, p. 174), and the following, after an advising in the Second Division, were approved of by the Court on 21st January last:

"It being admitted that, on the 1st day of October 1828, the pursuer James Beaumont Neilson, obtained letters-patent under the Great Seal used in Scotland, in place of the Great Seal thereof, and duly enrolled a specification in terms of the proviso contained in said letters-patent, being Nos. 21 and 22 of process:

"It being also admitted that the pursuers, other than the said James Beaumont Neilson, have acquired, by assignment from him, a joint interest with him in the said patent:

"Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, in or at their iron-works at Househill, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use machinery or apparatus substantially the same with the machinery or apparatus described in said specification, and to the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers? Or,

"1. Whether the invention, as described in the said letters-patent and specification, is not the original invention of the pursuer, the said James Beaumont Neilson?

"2. Whether the description contained in the said specification, is not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make machinery or apparatus capable of producing the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification?

"3. Whether machinery or apparatus, constructed according to the description in the said letters-patent and specification, is not practically useful for the purposes set forth in the said letters-patent?

"The damages are laid as under:—

"Profits claimed, as at the date of the action,	£10,000
"Other damages, as at the same date,	2,000
	<hr/> £12,000"

The case was tried by the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on the 1st, 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th of April last, when the evidence led for the pursuers was in support of the patent, and generally to this effect:—Experiments had been tried in several places with the view of improving the blast, and for smelting iron, but unsuccessfully; and papers had been published prior to the patent on analogous subjects, such as that by Botfield, Chapman, Sadler and Stirling, but none of them were in the least in anticipation of Neilson's improvement. Some of them referred to totally different objects, and others again were unintelligible, and none of them had any principle in common with the one disclosed by Neilson. According to practice prior to the patent, derived from general impression of its utility, it had been thought that the colder the blast which was applied to furnaces, the effect in smelting iron was the greater and more beneficial; and accordingly, in some case, ice had been applied to the blast; but the reverse of this had been proved by Neilson, according to whose patent principle the temperature of the air now thrown into the furnace was raised to about 600° of Fahrenheit, or a heat sufficient to melt lead, and equally good, if not better metal was thereby obtained than by the cold blast. It had this extraordinary benefit, that it enabled manufacturers to turn out a much greater quantity of material from the furnaces, by from three to four or five times than could be produced formerly by any contrivance known or practised, with the additional benefit of a great saving of fuel and flux; and further, it had the merit of enabling anthracite coal to be brought into use for smelting iron, which could never previously be used beneficially for that purpose. The improvement or principle in the patent consisted in interposing an air receptacle between the blast and the furnace, to which fire was applied so as to raise the temperature within to the required heat, and in that state the heated air was then transmitted to the furnace. The air vessel generally used was a series of arched pipes with lying ones, to which fire was applied so as to heat the air inside to the required degree, but no particular form of pipe was essentially necessary under the specification, and any form might be used, provided it was of a size adapted to the blast, the strength of the materials of the apparatus, the size of furnace, and the work to be executed. There was no difficulty whatever of understanding from the specification what the patentee described. Workmen of ordinary capacity understood it, and could make apparatus to effect the object of the patentee, without any model being submitted to them, simply from the specification; and in several instances such had been done. It was in evidence that the apparatus used by the defenders was substantially the same as what was described in the specification; and evidence was also led to show the benefit derived by the defenders from the use of it—the quantity of iron used by them for a certain period having been recovered under a diligence. The sum in the verdict corresponded, or very nearly so, with the amount, in evidence, of the benefit supposed to have accrued to the defenders.

The defenders adduced evidence in support of the pleas in defence set up by them, and to the effect above alluded to. In the first place, several witnesses were adduced to prove that Neilson's principle was known and in use in England, at Thorneycroft Smelting Iron-works, so far back as 1800. The proprietor there was wont to employ small model furnaces which were served by a blowing apparatus, the cylinder of which was heated, and the air thence sent by the blast into the forge. The cylinder was first heated by coals, and afterwards by a flue of brick work. The effect, it was said, was to make the iron thereby smelted too rich or too grey, and was in consequence not readily workable, and sold at a smaller price than iron otherwise manufactured. This apparatus was also applied at the same works to fineries, but in both cases the plan was given up as useless—parties being satisfied it would not do. The defenders then proceeded to lead evidence that a contrivance of the same description as Neilson's had been in use at Irvine twenty years ago; but the Judge, on objection by the pursuer, ruled that the line of evidence was inadmissible, on the grounds stated below. The defender then brought evidence to show that the specification was worthless, as not explaining the advantage of increasing the heat of the air, and that it was otherwise so vague and indefinite that it was unintelligible. It had been taken by some at first as an improvement to dry air, by expelling the moisture, and thereby to improve the quality of iron in furnaces, but not as connected with improving or supporting the combustion in the furnace: That no workman of ordinary skill could construct apparatus from it: That the series of pipes now used by the patentee was not within the specification, as not answering the description of an air vessel; and that no person could fall on that contrivance except by accident, and certainly not from reading the specification.

In the course of the defenders' evidence the following point occurred, which forms the ground of the first exception in the bill of exceptions which was tendered:—

The pursuers, in their evidence, had examined a witness, George Paterson, Neilson's brother-in-law, who spoke to the experiments Neilson and he made in Glasgow on the subject of improving the blast of furnaces prior to obtaining the patent; and these experiments the witness described. Another witness (Sutherland) was also examined as to the same experiments; and in the course of describing them, he stated that the experimental apparatus had been tried with a smith's forge. The defenders proposed, in conducting their case, to show that there had been a use of the same principle in the town of Irvine, about twenty years previously, at an anchors' smith's forge, where a pipe was interposed between a pair of hand bellows and the forge, and which was heated with the view of raising the temperature of the air of the blast, to be transmitted in that state to the forge. But this was objected to by the pursuers; and the presiding Judge ruled that the line of evidence was inadmissible on these grounds, which were the reasons urged by the pursuers:

Lord Justice-Clerk. 1. Ruled, that a paper of objections lodged in process, No. 24, with notice thereof before the record was closed, cannot supply defects in the averments in the record, on which parties agreed to close the record, in terms of the Statute, on the 22d February, supposing that in such paper of objections there had been any such averment as in this case would be necessary in the record: 2. On the ground that no proper notice is given on the record of the proposed line of inquiry generally, and no notice whatever of prior use of the invention at a smith's at Irvine, by the application of hot blast to a smith's fire: and, 3. On the ground, that on an inquiry as to the anticipation and prior use of an invention, by instances of the practices of individuals, going back to twenty years, it is essentially necessary for the interests of the patentees, and ends of justice, that the record should contain such information as shall enable the patentee to be able to meet by inquiry these cases, and to investigate the character, purposes and objects of the practices to be proved against him, in which the prior use of his discovery and invention is said to be found.

Same objection held to apply to any other evidence of same character.

The defenders excepted to this rule of his Lordship generally, because there was sufficient notice on the record itself of what they were to prove, and consequently that there could be no surprise. But besides, it was argued that the note of objection which they had served on the pursuers before the record was closed, was enough, and was a compliance with the Act 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 83, in regard to patents, which required notice to be sent to the pursuers of the objections which the defenders were to rely on at the trial. The record itself was pleaded as being sufficient; but even supposing it were not so, it was said that this Act extended to Scotland, and must be held to support the line of evidence proposed by the defenders.

The following is the charge delivered to the jury:

Lord Justice-Clerk.—You are now to enter upon the discharge of your duty of deliberating and deciding on this case. It is, as you see, of great importance to the parties, and of great interest in all parts of the kingdom, both from the direct interests which are here involved, and probably in consequence of rights or expectations which I need not explain to you, arising under a recent Statute, but which may make the subject of the trial matter of the deepest importance to both the parties in the present issues, and to many others. It has already occupied a great deal of your time, and must have made a very great demand on your other avocations; but you have bestowed much attention on the case, and you bring to the decision of it, the intelligence, the ability, the good sense, and the knowledge of life, and the peculiar qualifications for judging of evidence, on account of which the law has selected you for this important duty.

But, gentlemen, while it will lie peculiarly with you to deliberate upon, and to decide this case, I am sure you know, and will probably see more fully afterwards, the great importance of the assistance and of the directions which you may in such a case receive from the Court in point of law. The responsibility of such directions is the greater, because the more I have considered it, the more I am satisfied that, according to the views, in point of law, which I may state to you as matter of direction, your opinion on the questions which you are to decide, will be much more affected than at first sight might appear. For instance, if I should hold, in point of law, that the patent is defective unless it sets forth and claims one particular mode and construction of apparatus for heating air—I say, if you should be directed, in point of law, to take that view of this patent, you will see how easy, comparatively, and how short would be the view of the issues you have to try; and how necessary it therefore is, that you should attend to the legal bearings of this case, as laid down by the Court. If, on the other hand, you should be directed that it is not necessary that this patent should contain any one particular description, or claim any particular apparatus for heating air to be introduced into a blast-furnace, and that it is a good patent in point of law, although it comprehends every and all modes of applying the blast, provided it is the air, under the influence of the blast, that is to be heated, then you will see, on the other hand, how directly and materially that view, in point of law, must influence the light in which you are to consider the bearings of the evidence, and the questions that are truly involved in those issues.

I feel therefore, and I feel deeply, on account of the responsibility of those directions—that is, in the directions which you are to receive in point of law, and which it is my duty to give for your assistance, and, as far as possible, for your guidance,—it is on those directions that you must find the light under which you are to understand the patent and consider the case. That you should err in such a case is hardly possible, except from misdirection on the part of the Judge; but any such misdirection the parties will afterwards have an opportunity of discussing; and my object will be to put everything that I consider to be material in law so fully before you and them, that whoever is dissatisfied with the charge, or discovers any point of law that may be afterwards raised, will have an opportunity of doing so, as I am anxious that this trial should have all the results that the parties are entitled to expect, and not prove in any respect abortive.

I may state that I have put my views into writing, and therefore the parties may afterwards have the same, and take time for deliberation, excepting if they wish to the charge generally. Some points are doubtful as to whether they are matters of law or of fact; some there also are which I consider matters of fact, but which the parties may consider matters of law; and as to which I would wish the particular attention of the counsel, and their assistance before the jury retire.

You will observe that there are two sets of issues in this case—one set is alternative, as to which the onus is wholly on the defenders. As to the issue for the pursuers, a prima facie case is sufficient. They have chosen, in the conduct of the cause, to anticipate the defenders' case, by leading their own evidence on those issues in the first instance: but the result is the same—that, as to the second set of issues, the defenders are pursuers. But when a party complains of the infringement of a patent, he exposes it to challenge at the instance of the defenders.

The first issue assumes the validity of the patent, as a point which may, in the first instance, be easily proved, or may be taken on the simplest evidence; and then asks, "Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, in or at their iron-works at Househill, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use machinery or apparatus substantially the same with the machinery or apparatus described in said specification, and to the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuers?" Perhaps it might be better, in many such cases in the charge, to take the defenders' issues first. But in this case, I do not think that that course would present the case in a fair aspect to you. I think it necessary to explain the full bearing of the law on this first issue as to this particular patent.

My first duty, then, is to call your attention to this patent—chiefly in reference to the first issue. I may have to allude, in anticipation, to the defenders' three issues; but I shall afterwards speak to them separately. On the patent, my remarks will be partly law, partly observations for your assistance.

The first point is, What does the patent claim? To what does it apply? Does it apply to the heating of air? to the mode and way in which that effect shall be accomplished? Or to the use and application of air to be heated at a particular stage of the process—to the use and application of hot air, as the blast which is to enter the furnace, so as to increase heat in the furnace?

The importance of this point you must see.

If the mode and way of heating the air is claimed, then the defenders argue the patent would claim,—

1. What is not new, unless there is some particular contrivance in the mode of heating.

2. What is not described in such terms as truly to form any particular process at all; or,

3. (For the defenders not very consistently state also this objection); it describes one mode of heating the air, viz., in one large vessel to be increased in bulk in all its diameters or sides proportionally; so that for a large blast, there must be a huge vessel of vast dimensions in all its sections—as one witness said, a large room or a small room.

These points are both singularly raised by the defenders.

I have much doubt whether this objection, as to the patent claiming too much, is within the issues. The pursuers do not profess to claim an invention for heating air. If the defenders intended to contend that the patent did, however, contain such a claim, and on that account was void, they might have stated this plea to the Court, before and in bar of trial. I think they were bound to do so, or they might have made it the ground of substantive issue. The way they get at the point now, is by saying, we insist that this is the reading of the patent, and if so, then my objections apply; for on that view of the patent, viz., that it applies to the mode or process of heating air, it is not a good patent. My own opinion is, that this point is not raised—competently raised—under these issues; and holding that opinion, it is right that I should give the pursuers the benefit of it. But, at the same time, it is expedient that no point in this case should not be embraced in any bill of exceptions which either party may wish to present. And on that account, and partly also because the defenders may have some countenance from some uncertainty of proceeding in a prior case—Russell v. Crichton, 8th June 1839—I shall assume at present the competency of this objection. If this matter ought not to be taken as included in the issues, the pursuers can also take an exception to my entertaining this point at all; and my opinion is distinctly, that the point should not be entertained under the present issues. But taking this matter as open to the defenders, then the question, what the patent truly claims, is a point for the Court. The construction of the patent to that extent, and on that question, is matter of law for the Court. The intelligibility of the patent, to use an expression of Lord Eldon's, is for the jury. But the inquiry, what is the subject-matter of the patent, is a question of law, and for the Court. It depends upon a great variety of matters, settled by previous decisions, on the style and form of specifications, their title, structure, and the legal import of their phraseology. It is not a question fitted for each jury in each case, else there would be no fixed law on the subject. But the meaning and intelligibility of the actual description in the particular specification is for the jury in each case, taking the specification, with the evidence of practical and scientific men in that department of arts and manufactures; and the issues here assume that the intelligibility of the specification is for you.

Let me now explain the patent and specification to you.

In the patent—I take the warrant, though the English is also repeated in the Latin, record, p. 65. The object is thus set forth in the words of the petition; but before I read the same, let me say—you are aware there is first letters-patent, and then the party must carefully and particularly describe that which falls within the object of his patent; and in the patent the invention is set forth—and observe this is the whole description or title of the patent—"an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, or furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required." That is the object of the patent—that is what the law calls its title—the parties are entitled to maintain that the specification ought not to go beyond it. On the other hand, the patentee is justly entitled to say that the presumption is, that he did not mean to go beyond it. Observe those terms,—an improved application of air to produce heat in the furnaces or fires. The effect here stated and claimed is the effect on the fire or furnace—not on the air itself—though heated by air. There is no object stated in reference to the state or quality of the air, except as to the result of producing heat in the furnace. This is most material for you to keep in view, in considering what meaning is to be put on the practical directions in the specification. If the specification clearly means throughout to claim, as the improvement—increase of heat in the furnace,—then of course it will be for you to consider whether you can so construe particular expressions respecting the "effect," as to interpret them to allude to a different effect than that which is the object of the patent. It is not an improved mode of heating air that is claimed, but an improved APPLICATION of air to produce heat in fires. The air was previously applied cold in order to produce heat—to produce that same result in a better and more effectual way, Neilson's invention is an improved application of air. How the air is to be applied in an improved manner, the specification is afterwards to tell us. Hence I have to state to you in point of law, that the object and summary of the invention is this—I think correct—title does not profess to include the mode of heating the air—that any mode of heating the air under blast is within the professed OBJECT and TITLE of the patent—provided that subsequent words of practical direction in the specification do not restrict the claim to one particular mode of heating the air. But the specification, although such is the object and the only object of the patent, might have gone too far, and been liable to another objection taken by the defenders—if it should turn out to be a patent only for an abstract philosophical principle.

Turn now to the specification. The specification and patent are to be taken together as one instrument—and I give you this as a suggestion in common sense—though it is, nevertheless, a direction in point of law, viz., the terms are to be understood in the plain, ordinary and popular sense of the terms used, unless the usage of the trade in question has fixed a peculiar meaning on the terms, or the context necessarily gives another sense than the plain, ordinary and popular sense.

The general title is the same as in the patent. Then there is the statement of the object; it quotes, you will observe, the words in the patent; the letters-patent are for "my invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges, and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required." Then there is the condition under which he gets the patent,—"In which letters-patent there is contained a proviso, obliging me, the said James Beaumont Neilson, by an instrument in writing under my hand and seal, particularly to describe the nature of my said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed."

Then at the commencement of the specification, it goes on—"Now know ye, that in compliance with the said proviso, I, the said James Beaumont Neilson, do hereby declare." He must comply with it in order to satisfy the law—then he repeats the terms of his title—he says "that my invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, consists." So here he repeats in the general terms of the patent the object of his invention. Then he says, "consists in introducing into, and applying to the fires, forges and furnaces, atmospheric air in the following manner." I think it is of great importance, in telling you what the patent does not claim, as this is to be considered by the Court, to mention that it does not here say it is heated air, but it is introducing atmospheric air in the following manner.—The air is to be heated as you will see presently; but you will observe it consists in introducing and applying "atmospheric air in the following manner." Now, these terms I hold to be important; they relate distinctly to the introduction into, and application of air to the fires. This marks very plainly the coherence with the patent of the specification.

Then (4.) The blast is material to that. It is admitted that the patent is not meant to be applied to that.

Then he begins (5.) with the following particulars:—

1. The air in blast is to be passed into an air vessel or receptacle before it goes to the fire.

2. That vessel (of sufficient strength) is to be heated. You would observe that some of the defenders' witnesses always interposed,—nothing is said of heating the air. I must say plainly, that whatever else is thought of the patent, it would be an outrage on common sense to pretend that the contrivance is not to heat the blast, and so they admitted this was a necessary inference—a distinction to the practical man without a difference—if red hot, it is said, so much the better, but that is not essential.

3. The materials of the air vessel are said to be not important—iron best.

4. Size is not fixed—though some proportions are given, and increase in size and numbers pointed at as necessary. I am going over some particulars at present which must be for your consideration; but I must state them, in order to explain to you what the patent does claim—I am not prejudging the points to be left to you.

5. Then he says, the form and shape of air vessel is immaterial to EFFECT.

6. He says, the manner of applying heat is immaterial, if you keep up the air to a proper temperature. He says, the form and shape is immaterial, and he says the manner of applying the heat is immaterial. This is of great importance in regard to the defenders' evidence.

On all these passages the question arises,—immaterial to what? important to what? This is a point on the intelligibility of the patent. Some of the witnesses of the defenders say this means EFFECT in heating air during the blast. On that view, the specification is not only untrue, but absurd and ludicrously so—framed in utter ignorance. One witness says, this means immaterial to economy, and in that sense of the term the sentence is still more absurd. Now, these are singular illustrations of ignorance and absurdity—if such should be your view—to find in a patent under which such a host of witnesses conceive there is contained the discovery of a physical principle of great novelty, and of unspeakable importance in point of utility.

Whether in saying these things, he has given wrong directions, which will mislead practical men, is another matter, on which I shall take your opinion. But I am at present only considering what he says, and in the question of what he claims or does not claim in the specification, it is important and necessary to see what he says, and what he professes to claim. It may be, that a specification truly claims more than a party says and professes to do. But the legal presumption is, that he does not claim that which he says he gives no directions about, as immaterial to his object, i. e., the effect he has in view to produce, provided you obtain the agent by which he means to work, viz., heated air.

I have stated the grounds of my opinion on this first point, because the observations I have made may be of use to you when you deliberate on the specification, in regard to the questions which belong to your functions on it. I am of opinion that Neilson does not claim as any part of his invention the mode or manner, or profess to describe any mode or manner of heating the air under blast, which is to be passed into an air vessel interposed between the blowing apparatus and the fire. I hold, in point of law, that this is no part of his claim under the patent or specification. Whether the specification is bad on this account, as resulting in a patent for an abstract principle, without any mechanical contrivance or mode of reducing it to practice, is a different matter, and is also a question of law to which I shall immediately advert. But at present, what I wish to state to you is, that the manner of heating the air—the particular contrivance or shape of vessel, or of constructing the surface and shape so as to secure heat, is no part of the claim of invention contained in the specification.

This direction, in point of law, on a point which all must admit to be law for the Court, you will see to be of great importance for you in considering the meaning of the patent. Indeed, I do not conceal from you, that while the intelligibility of the patent is for you, yet when the previous question—what the patent claims, occurs in any case and is raised, and must be decided by the Court—that question of law must very much guide you as to the intelligibility of the patent on the matters to which it does lay claim.

The defenders say it claims either one thing or another. It is my duty to tell you what it does not claim. That direction, in point of law, does not leave it open to you to take any other view than one of the claim under the patent, viz., that the mode of heating air is no part of the claim patented, nor is intended to be set forth as any part of the patent invention. If that is so, then you will see that my direction in point of law gives you only one other sense, between which you can decide, and an interpretation which makes nonsense of the specification.

His invention then consists, according to the fair meaning of the specification, taken as a whole, and candidly considered, in passing the blast into an air vessel or receptacle, in order to be heated, in order at that stage of the process of application of air to fires, to acquire the agent which he intends to act—heat in the blast instead of a cold blast.

The mode in which you are to heat—the form and shape—dimensions and numbers of the vessels—he does not claim or intend to prescribe—he does not claim or intend to describe,—he does not claim. If in that stage, by so intercepting the air and heating it, you pass the blast into the furnace,—that is, he says, my improved application of air,—that is the agent I mean to use, in order to produce heat in the furnace. How you heat—in what mode, or in what vessel, provided the vessel be strong enough to endure the blast, and of cubical contents of air sufficient for the blast, I neither care nor direct you,—for if you so get the hot blast into the furnace, by heating the air in a vessel between the blowing engine and the fire, you attain my object; you will get my improved application of air.

I am therefore of opinion, and must give you, in point of law, the direction that the specification does not claim any thing as to the form, nature, shape, materials, numbers or mathematical character of the vessel or vessels in which the air is to be heated, or as to the mode of heating such vessels, provided the blast is heated, between the blowing apparatus and the furnace in an air vessel or receptacle,—as to the size, dimensions, and numbers of which you must suit yourself.

It is for the Judge to say what is law, and what is for the jury. If I am wrong in holding this matter to be for the Court, the defenders can have it put right.

Holding it to be matter of law, you are aware that in civil cases, whatever direction I give as to law, must fix in this trial the law of the case, and that the law you must receive from me.

I state that plainly to you, because neither you nor I can wish to trespass on our respective functions, and you will find that I shall leave quite enough to you in this case,—to claim the exercise of all your attention, and of all your observation and judgment.

But within this objection, which is one of law, the defenders urge, that even if Neilson does not claim the air vessel as part of his invention, he has so described it as to make one particular sort of vessel a part of his apparatus, and has limited himself to one sort of air vessel, viz., one large vessel to be increased in size according to the extent of blast—that is, of air to be heated. They say that is the meaning of the specification,—that practical men would so understand it,—that this is so clearly the only vessel that Neilson contemplated, that his invention does not apply to any vessels in the shape of tubes, pipes, &c. In short, on this view of the specification they say, not very consistently with a great part of their case, that the specification contains really a very special, limited, and restricted description, by which the inventor so described one sort of apparatus, that he cannot claim any other, or maintain that his patent is one which applies to all varieties in the mode of heating air. This is a question for you—the jury,—it is a question on the meaning and intelligibility of the specification,—it is embraced under the issues,—for you to answer. It is involved in the 2d and 3d issues. But I also propose to ask you to answer a special question on that point which I shall afterwards state to you. If either party holds this to be a question for the Court, I shall also state my opinion, if required, so that the verdict, if according to the evidence, would stand, if it is a point for the jury:—if for the Court, the point would be fairly raised. But at the same time that this view is pressed by the defenders, and much evidence adduced to convince you that such is the only practical view which can be taken of the specification,—there is another view taken of a totally opposite description, which is a question of law for the Court. The defenders say, the specification seizes hold of an abstract principle, viz., that hot air produces more heat than cold, and of that abstract principle alone,—that the patentee purposely avoids any mode of stating how the principle should be applied:—Hence that the patent is bad, as being one for a principle alone.

The defenders, you will recollect, were very reluctant to state whether they actually raised that point or not. I think it is at the foundation of their whole case, and sure I am, that to enable you to discharge your duty, it is very necessary that I should not in any way avoid that question of law, or turn my remarks on it, which I easily could, into observations in point of fact, which the defenders could not except to; I think it will be more useful to you for me to explain the law to you fully on this point, and the defenders have thus the benefit of being able to except to any thing I say, and so obtain the judgment of the Court on the point, in case I am wrong.

It is quite true that a patent cannot be taken out solely for an abstract philosophical principle, for instance,—for any law of nature, or any property of matter, apart from any mode of turning it to account in the practical operations of manufacture, or the business and arts, and utilities of life.

The mere discovery of such a principle is not an invention in the patent-law sense of the term. Stating such a principle in a patent may be a promulgation of the principle, but it is no application of the principle to any practical purpose. And without that application of the principle to a practical object and end, and without the application of it to human industry, or to the purposes of human enjoyment—a person cannot, in the abstract, appropriate a principle to himself. But a patent will be good though the subject of the patent consists in the discovery of a great, general, and most comprehensive principle in science or law of nature, if that principle is by the specification applied to any special purpose, so as thereby to effectuate a practical result and benefit not previously attained.

The main merit—the most important part of the invention, may consist in the conception of the original idea—in the discovery of the principle in science, or of the law of nature stated in the patent, and little or no pains may have been taken in working out the best manner and mode of the application of the principle to the purpose set forth in the patent. But still, if the principle is stated to be applicable to any special purpose, so as to produce any result previously unknown, in the way and for the objects described, the patent is good. It is no longer an abstract principle. It comes to be a principle turned to account—to a practical object, and applied to a special result. It becomes then not an abstract principle, which means a principle considered apart from any special purpose or practical operation, but the discovery and statement of a principle for a special purpose—that is, a practical invention—a mode of carrying a principle into effect. That such is the law—if a well-known principle is applied for the first time to produce a practical result for a special purpose—has never been disputed. It would be very strange and unjust to refuse the same legal effect, when the inventor has the additional merit of discovering the principle as well as its application to a practical object. The instant that the principle, although discovered for the first time, is stated, in actual application to, and as the agent of producing a certain specified effect, it is no longer an abstract principle—it is then clothed with the language of practical application, and receives the impress of tangible direction to the actual business of human life. Is it any objection then, in the next place, to such a patent, that terms descriptive of the application to a certain specified result, include every mode of applying the principle or agent so as to produce that specified result, although one mode may not be described more than another—although one mode may be infinitely better than another—although much greater benefit would result from the application of the principle by one method than by another—although one method may be much less expensive than another? Is it, I next inquire, an objection to the patent that in its application of a new principle to a certain specified result—observe the words—it includes every variety of mode of applying the principle according to the general statement of the object and benefit to be attained?

You will observe that the greater part of the defenders' case is truly directed to this objection.

This is a question of law, and I must tell you distinctly that this generality of claim—that is for all modes of applying the principle to the purpose specified according to, or within a general statement of the object to be attained, and of the use to be made of the agent to be so applied—is no objection whatever to the patent. That the application or use of the agent for the purpose specified, may be carried out in a great variety of ways, only shows the beauty and simplicity, and comprehensiveness of the invention. But the scientific and general utility of the proposed application of the principle, if directed to a specified purpose, is not an objection to its becoming the subject of a patent.

That the proposed application may be very generally adopted in a great variety of ways, is the merit of the invention, not a legal objection to the patent.

The defenders say—You announce a principle that hot air will produce heat in the furnace—You direct us to take the blast—without interrupting or rather without stopping it—to take the current in blast—to heat it after it leaves the blast, and to throw it in hot into the furnace. But you tell us no more—You do not tell us how we are to heat it—You say you may heat it in any way—in any sort of form of vessel. You say I leave you to do it how you best can. But my application of the discovered principle is, that if you heat the air—and heat it after it leaves the blowing-engine (for it is plain that you can't do it before)—you attain the result I state,—that is the purpose to which I apply the principle. The benefit will be greater or less—I only say, benefit you will get: I have disclosed the principle—I so apply it to a specified purpose, by a mechanical contrivance, viz., by getting the heat when in blast after it leaves the furnace—but the mode and manner, and extent of heating, I leave to you,—and the degree of benefit on that very account I do not state.

The defenders say the patent, on this account, is bad in law. I must tell you that taking the patent to be of this general character, it is good in law. I state to you the law to be, that you may obtain a patent for a mode of carrying a principle into effect, and if you suggest and discover, not only the principle, but suggest and invent how it may be applied to a practical result by mechanical contrivance and apparatus, and show that you are aware that no particular sort or modification or form of the apparatus is essential in order to obtain benefit from the principle, then you may take your patent for the mode of carrying it into effect, and are not under the necessity of describing, and confining yourself to one form of apparatus.

If that were necessary, you see what would be the result? Why, that a patent could hardly ever be obtained for any mode of carrying a newly discovered principle into practical results—though the most valuable of all discoveries. For the best form and shape or modification of apparatus cannot, in matters of such vast range, and requiring observation on such a great scale, be attained at once, and so the thing would become known—and so the right lost, long before all the various kinds of apparatus could be tried. Hence, you may generally claim the mode of carrying the principle into effect by mechanical contrivance, so that any sort of apparatus, applied in the way stated, will, more or less, produce the benefit, and you are not tied down to any form.

The best illustration I can give you, and I think it right to give you this illustration, is from a case as to the application of that familiar principle the lever, to the construction of chairs, or what is called the self-adjusting lever. Minter v. Wells, 1 Crompton, Mason, and Roscoe, 505.

This case, which afterwards came under the consideration of the whole Court, was tried in the Court of Exchequer during the presidency of Lord Lyndhurst, who, as you may happen to know, is one of the greatest patent lawyers in the kingdom, uniting extensive scientific knowledge with all his legal attainments. The case was as to the patent reclining chair, the luxury of which some of you may have tried; it had a self-adjusting lever, so that a person sitting or reclining—and I need not tell you what variety of postures can be assumed by a person reclining in a chair—in whatever situation he placed his back, there was sufficient resistance offered, through means of the lever, to preserve the equilibrium. Now any thing more general than that, I cannot conceive—it was the application of a well-known principle, but for the first time applied to a chair. He made no claim to any particular parts of the chair, nor did he prescribe any precise mode in which they should be made; but what he claimed, was a self-adjusting lever to be applied to the back of a chair, where the weight of the seat acts as a counterpoise to the back, in whatever posture the party might be sitting or reclining. Nothing could be more general. Well, a verdict passed for the patentee, with liberty to apply to have it set aside. Lord Lyndhurst said, every application for a patent must include some principle, and here the principle is the application of the lever to the chair, whereby the weight of the seat acts as a counterpoise to the pressure against the back of the chair. He does not confine the chair to any particular form, but he claims the chair constructed on this principle, in whatever shape or form it may be constructed. Baron Parke was of the same opinion, and the rest of the Court concurred.

The principle of the lever was not new, of course.

Just so as to the hot blast,—only the principle is also new. The patentee says, I find hot air will increase the heat in the furnace—that a blast of hot air is beneficial for that end. Here is the way to attain it,—heat the air under blast, between the blowing apparatus and furnace; if you do that, I care not how you may propose to do it,—I neither propose to you, nor claim any special mode of doing it. You may give the air more or less degrees of heat; but if you so heat it you will get by that contrivance the benefit I have invented and disclosed, more or less according to the degree of heat. This is very simple—very general: But its simplicity is its beauty and its practical value,—not an objection in law.

But it will be more satisfactory to you to be informed, that the validity of this patent, to the general effect I am now stating, is adjudged law—adjudged on this particular patent. The question, Whether this patent was not bad in law, in respect that the specification claimed only a principle, and could not be taken to give a mode of carrying the principle into effect, was argued at great length, and with infinite anxiety, in one of the Supreme Courts in England, in the case of Neilson against Harford and others, decided 26th June 1841, and the judgment of the Court, delivered by one of the Judges, Mr Baron Parke, who had also tried the case, bears,—“Then, taking the construction of the specification on ourselves, as we are bound to do, it becomes necessary to examine what the nature of the invention, which the plaintiff has disclosed by this instrument. It is very difficult to distinguish it from the specification of a patent for a principle. And this at first created in the minds of some of the Court much difficulty; but after full consideration, we think that the plaintiff does not merely claim a principle, but a machine embodying a principle, and a very valuable one. We think the case must be considered, as if, the principle being well known, the plaintiff had first invented a mode of applying it by a mechanical apparatus to furnaces; and his invention then consists in this, by interposing a receptacle for heated air between the blowing apparatus and the furnace. In this receptacle he directs the air to be heated by the application of heat externally to the receptacle;—and thus he accomplishes the object of applying the blast, which before was of cold air, in a heated state to the furnace.” The difficulty which occurred in that case to one of the Judges, the same who gave the judgment, and who tried the case, was on the words “form and shape of the vessel is immaterial to the effect, and may be adapted to local circumstances.” The Court held him to be wrong—and he himself acquiesced in the view of the other Judges. Then this judgment came under the review of the present Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, in application for an interdict to restrain Mr Harford from working by hot-blast. His Lordship had no difficulty whatever in holding the patent to be good, and scouted the idea of attempting to attach to the term effect the meaning of heating the air. (Chancery, p. 15.) The Lord Chancellor said, “Obviously that is not the meaning; it must be the ultimate effect in the furnace.” No doubt the common law court in England (the Jury Court) held that the construction of the patent, as to the meaning of the term effect, was matter for the Court. I do not distinctly know how either of the parties mean to treat this point in this trial. They seem both to have made the meaning of the specification in this respect matter of evidence; and although it is awkward that what should be taken as matter of law in one end of the island, should be held as matter of fact in the other, thus giving the party two strings for their bow, I hold it to be a question for the jury—I mean the sense of the term effect, in working on this specification; and I further hold it to be so under the present issues. I would refer the bar, among many other authorities, to Crosley v. Beverley; 3d Carrington and Payne, at the foot of page 515 and top of 516, before Lord Tenterden. Judgment of House of Lords, Astley v. Taylor, 25th June 1821; 1 Shaw's Appeals, p. 58. Hill and Thomson, 3d Merivale, 630.

But I shall also, if required by either party, state my own opinion upon it, in case the Court should hold it to be matter of law; and I will also put a special question to you on this point; so that if it is matter of evidence for you the jury, the point may be closed by this trial, unless, indeed, the Court should think your answer against the evidence. My object will be to prepare the result of the trial for every contingency which can be guarded against (except that of Judge or jury being wrong, as to which we can only do our best respectively) so that whatever view the Court or House of Lords may take on matters of law, this trial may not be thrown away. I understand, so far as I have hitherto been able to collect their views, that the defenders, however, concur in holding the point, to be afterwards noticed, as to the meaning of the term effect in the specification, to be a point on the evidence for the jury. But I am quite prepared to find that, notwithstanding the evidence led on that view of the point, the defenders will except, on the ground that I leave the point to you as a question for your consideration, with the aid of that evidence.

Having now stated the general law to you, there are some further practical directions, in point of law, which may very usefully aid you in considering the case, and the issues under which it is tried.

1. The first practical direction I have to give you is, as to the meaning of the pursuer's issue,—“Whether, in the course of the year 1840, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, in or at their iron-works at House-hill, by themselves or others, wrongfully, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the said letters-patent, use machinery or apparatus substantially the same with the machinery or apparatus described in said specification, and to the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuers.” Now, I have to observe to you, that the specification is to be read as addressed to artists, or persons of competent skill in the branch of manufactures or process to which it is applicable. Hence, known machinery need not be described when the use of them is to be made in carrying out the object of patent.—Tenterden in Bloxam v. Elsee. If, for instance, in an apparatus for improving the making of gas, a patentee should not mention or allude to a condenser—never notice it, yet in practice, if that is a part of all apparatus required for the making of gas, it is held that every one must know that a condenser must be used. In short, you are speaking to people who know the subject, and must be understood to know those things which are only the incidents in the particular process to which your patent applies.—Since you are not going over all the parts of the process, say of heating air, but only mean to direct generally that air is to be heated for a general result. I will show you how this arose in one case, for it is the particular application of the principle I am asking you to attend to. If a person is taking out a patent, and if it involves machinery that was perfectly well known before—his object not being to heat air—it is not necessary to go over the whole process of heating the air, any more than it is necessary to go over the whole process of making gas. I may give you an illustration of this from Crosley v. Beverley, 3 Car. and P. 513-5. In that case this point occurred. At the trial Lord Brougham, who was then counsel, argued that the things comprised in the specification would not make a gas apparatus—that the specification was incomplete for want of a condenser. Lord Tenterden said,—"A workman would know that it was to be included." Lord Brougham answered,—but the specification does not direct it to be put in. Lord Tenterden replied,—“But it does not tell you to leave it out.” Then the object here being to throw air hot into a furnace; and to do so, vessels are to be heated in order to heat air, you observe it is a specification addressing itself to persons who are to use hot air, and are to heat the air in order to get the hot blast; it refers to vessels intended to heat air—vessels in which air is to be heated. Now, if the patent need not, in order to be valid, describe any mode of heating air, but may include every form, then the specification is correctly framed to effectuate its object, if legal, for it then consistently omits any description of any sort or form of vessel in which air is to be heated. It assumes properly that persons constructing apparatus for heating air are to know the best form and shape of vessels in which air is to be heated—just as persons employed in gas apparatus are held to know that they must resort to a condenser in the course of the improved structure, though nothing is said of it. Now, then, if the object is to throw hot blast into the furnace, and to heat air, but not to describe vessels, then the specification properly assumes, that persons who are to construct heating apparatus know the ordinary rules and common conditions to be attended to in heating air. It leaves everybody to do it in the way they choose. It does not profess to be a patent for any particular mode of heating air. It simply says that the use, in particular processes of the air heated for fires, forges and furnaces, where blowing apparatus is required, and at a particular stage of the process, will do benefit to the furnace; and that is all. Gentlemen, I fairly tell you, that this is not an observation in point of fact—I might so treat it, but I think I am bound to tell you it is an observation in point of law. Whether that is a good patent in law is a different point, on which I have given my opinion.

The second direction I have to give on the first issue is what you must have already seen—that the sense in which the issue is to be understood, is much affected by the law as to the character of the patent. If I hold, in point of law, that he does not claim any particular apparatus, then there is no standard of apparatus in the specification with which to compare the Househill apparatus, and I shall immediately show you the importance of this on the patent. If the patent is good, in the general sense in which I have explained its legal import, and to which extent I hold it to be a good patent, then you will see that variances in the modes or kinds of apparatus are of no moment, provided that, in the processes referred to (the use of fires, forges and furnaces), the object of the particular contrivance or apparatus is to heat the air under blast, at the same stage of the process, viz., between the blowing apparatus and the furnace, and to throw it so heated into the furnace, to the effect of this improved application of air for that purpose. If the patentee has not tied himself down to any particular sort of apparatus or heating vessels—if the use of hot air, heated when under blast, is claimed, and legally claimed, in whatever sort of vessel the air is heated, then see the effect of this view of the patent on the pursuers' issue. By the direction I have given you, in point of law, I take on myself the responsibility of deciding the point you are to look to in considering this issue. The question of infringement comes to be this,—Does the party heat the air in the same stage of the process by mechanical contrivance, and to the effect set forth in the specification, of producing heat in the furnace? If so, then no variety of improvement in the apparatus is of any importance. On my view of the patent in point of law, and if you are satisfied in point of fact, that the description does not describe any particular apparatus—or if that also is a point of law—then in truth the use of the hot blast—that is, the use of the air heated in blast between the blowing machine and the furnace—is the use of the patent machinery, and is not substantially different but to the effect set forth. The light, then, in which the issue is to be viewed, must be received from the Court in a great measure. And on the view I take, and have stated on my own responsibility, I apprehend the question under the pursuers' issue is a very short—a very plain question, not requiring much evidence to solve, and on which, though you must form your opinion, it is truly to be formed in a great measure in reliance on the law stated to you by the Court. The point was so stated and treated by Baron Parke in the English case. You recollect, Ries Lewis, No. 10 of defender's witnesses, was the manager of Hartford's and other works in Wales; and he stated, that while they used the hot blast, they used the pipes, model No. 7, the same as the Househill. This Hartford was the defendant in the English case, so that the question as to infringement was the same in both. No doubt you have plenty of opinions in this case; but in the light in which I have stated the issue to you, these opinions are of little consequence on either side, if the patentee has not tied himself down to one particular form of apparatus. Baron Parke, who is not in favour of the patentee on the law, yet says (page 138),—"Now the best way of disposing of this case, I think, will be to take those questions in order upon which you are to pronounce your opinion; and the first is, Whether the defendants have been guilty of infringing the patent? And I apprehend that there is no doubt they have, if the patent be a good patent, and if the specification be free from the objections that are raised to it, and if the specification is to be understood in the sense which I shall afterwards give to it. If the specification is to be understood in the sense claimed by the plaintiffs, the invention of heating the air between the time it leaves the blowing apparatus, and is introduced into the furnace in any way, in any close vessel which is exposed to the action of heat, there is no doubt that the defendant's machinery is an infringement of that patent, because it is the use of air which is heated much more beneficially, and a great improvement upon what would probably be the machine to be constructed by looking at the specification alone; but still it is the application of heated air, heated in one or more vessels between the blowing apparatus and the furnace; and therefore, if it should turn out that the patent is good, and the specification is good, though unquestionably what the defendants have done is a great improvement upon what would be the species of machinery or apparatus constructed under this patent, it appears to me that it would be an infringement of it, therefore your verdict upon that issue would be for the plaintiff, provided it is for the plaintiff on the other issues."

Now, gentlemen, I don't take upon myself quite so much as is done there, by telling you what your verdict must be; but I say to you, that if the patent is what I have stated, then the use of heated air in any vessel heating the air under current, and applying it to the furnace, is the use of the agent mentioned in the patent. I have only to add farther, that on the view which I have stated of the patent, and if you are satisfied that no particular form of vessel is described and claimed by the specification, then there is no particular standard with which you are to compare the Househill apparatus, which the model No. 7 represents. (To the counsel).—I suppose I need not trouble the jury with the description in the record of the defenders' apparatus. I suppose the model No. 7 adequately and sufficiently comprehends and exhibits their apparatus.

Solicitor-General.—Certainly.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question is not, then, a comparison between No. 7 and any particular vessel, but an inquiry whether No. 7 is not a contrivance to heat the air under blast at the stage proposed, and for the purpose stated in the specification, and thereby substantially the patent apparatus. If that is in your opinion its character, then I state to you in law that the infringement is proved, as there is no standard or form of apparatus, on this view of the case, with which you are to compare the defenders' apparatus.

The next directions I have to give you relate to the counter issues. And first, as to the first counter issue,—“Whether the invention, as described in the said letters-patent and specification, is not the original invention of the pursuer, the said James Beaumont Neilson?” Mr Rutherford here drew a distinction between the first inventor and the public use by others of the invention, and maintained that the attempt to prove prior use is not comprehended under the first issue. The distinction in the abstract is sound; and certainly, in ordinary cases, this issue is not the one taken, or properly applicable to public use and exercise thereof in the kingdom. But a short recollection of the way this issue was put, will satisfy my learned friends at the bar, that in this case I could not put that legal construction on it, and in this case I am of opinion that the inquiry cannot be excluded under this issue. I am quite aware that the issue is not, generally speaking, to be explained by any of the previous proceedings in the cause. But here I must remind the pursuers' counsel of the course taken as to the preparation of the issues. These issues first came before the Court as framed by the issue clerks. There were two versions of the issues, which as to this one were quite the same; because, whether the invention was used in Great Britain previously or not, both were agreed that the originality of the invention was involved. I then suggested that the first part of the pursuers' issue, as proposed by the issue clerks, should be taken as the defenders' counter issue. To this the Solicitor-General consented at once, and the issue was altered in Court, without any one perceiving that the one I so proposed to be transposed was open to the criticism stated by Mr Rutherford, viz., that it did not include prior public use, which the defenders' issue had distinctly included. Under this issue I could not hold that the defenders were excluded from proving the public use of the invention previous to the patent. I must hold that, according to the way those issues were framed, though I admit not the best,—it was an oversight on the part of the Court in suggesting to the defender that this would try his case—I say, as those issues were framed, I cannot, consistently with the course of procedure to which the Court were parties, exclude the defenders from proving the public use. I know in general that you cannot explain the issues by reference to the previous procedure; but in this instance I feel that I would be running counter to the justice of the case if I was to exclude that proof.

Certainly I would in the abstract agree with Mr Rutherford, that an issue as to a person being the first inventor, is not an issue as to public use.

Taking the offer of prior use to be competent to be made out in this case, if the defenders can prove it, I must now give you two directions in point of law on this issue:—

1. It is not sufficient to show that others, in experiments or incidental trials, had hit upon the same idea, not having made public the principle and the application of it to the same processes.

Even if the principle had been a known principle, still, if it is for the first time applied by mechanical contrivance and apparatus to certain processes in which it had not been previously used as an agent, the patent would be good, and still more when the principle and the mode of carrying it into a practical beneficial result are claimed, I have to repeat that the originality of the invention is not destroyed by proof, that in the history of the arts and trades of this country, some one or two, or even more persons may have apparently had some glimpse of the same conception in occasional and insulated experiments, which were not prosecuted nor made known, and from which, so far as the rest of the world were concerned, no result or change followed on former practice.

The second direction, in point of law, which I have to give you on this issue, respects what is prior use, so as to destroy the invention.

Now, this is well expressed in the words of the patent in this and other cases, p. 65. This is what the defenders must prove—that it was not new, in respect of the public use and exercise thereof in this kingdom. These emphatic and plain words hardly require explanation; they convey the meaning to you in a way that it is impossible to mistake; the question in each case is a matter of fact for the jury, but this is, in point of law, the sort and kind of use the existence of which a jury must find to be proved, in order to warrant them to find against the patentee. I may state to you, that great utility is one important element in the question of novelty. For if the process is of great, manifest, striking, and immediate utility, that is of the utmost importance to the point—Could this have been previously in public use and exercise, without clear and abundant proof? The cases referred to at the bar have settled that the use must be public use; that the existence and trial of regular machines of the very same sort, if abandoned, if not used and introduced into practice, is not public use and exercise thereof in the kingdom.

Again, in the case of the suspension principle for wheels, it was well stated by Mr Justice Pattison to the jury who tried that case—"If, on the whole of this evidence, either on the one side or the other, it appeared that this wheel, constructed by Mr Strutt's order in 1814, was a wheel on the same principles, and in substance the same wheel as the other for which the plaintiff has taken out his patent, and that it was used openly and in public, so that everybody might see it, and had continued to use the same thing up to the time of taking out the patent, undoubtedly then that would be a ground to say that the plaintiff's invention is not new, and if it is not new, of course his patent is bad, and he cannot recover in this action; but if, on the other hand, you are of opinion that Mr Strutt's is an experiment, and that he found it did not answer, and ceased to use it altogether, and abandoned it as useless, and nobody else followed it up, and that the plaintiff's invention, which came afterwards, was his own invention, and remedied the defect (if I may so say), although he knew nothing of Mr Strutt's wheel, he remedied the defects of Mr Strutt's wheel, then there is no reason for saying the plaintiff's patent is not good." Again I close what I have to say to you here, by the well-considered language of Chief-Justice Tindal, whose opinion I am always glad to quote, as he unites the character of the accomplished scholar with the most profound knowledge of law:—"It will be for the jury to say whether the invention was or was not in public use and operation at the time the patent was granted. There are certain limits to this question. A man may make experiments in his own closet; if he never communicates these experiments to the world, and lays them by, and another person has made the same experiments, and, being satisfied, takes a patent, it would be no answer to say that another person had made the same experiments. There may be several rivals starting at the same time; the first who comes and takes a patent, it not being generally known to the public—that man has a right to clothe himself with the authority of the patent, and enjoys the benefit of it, if the evidence, when properly considered, classes itself under the description of experiment only, that would be no answer. On the other hand, the use of an article might be so general as to be almost universal; then you can hardly suppose anybody would take a patent. Between these two limits most cases will arrange themselves, and it must be for the jury to say whether the evidence convinces their understanding, that the subject of the patent was in public use and operation at the time when the patent was granted."

You will observe that it is settled, that the trials founded on as a proof of prior use—

1. Must have been public.

2. Must have been CONTINUED, NOT ABANDONED.

3. Must have continued to the time when the patent was granted,—I don't say to the very exact period, but it must have been known and used as a useful thing at the time.

The abandonment of trials as not successful or satisfactory, is a decided proof that the invention was not turned to account for public utility, and was not in public use and operation. With these directions as to the law of this first of the counter issues, you will probably be able easily to dispose of this part of the case on the evidence,—keeping in view that the defender must prove that issue. I have now to call your attention to the next two issues which the defender seeks, and is bound to establish.

2d, "Whether the description contained in the said specification is not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make machinery or apparatus capable of producing the effect set forth in the said letters-patent and specification?"

3d, "Whether machinery or apparatus constructed according to the description in the said letters-patent and specification, is not practically useful for the purposes set forth in the said letters-patent."

Now, gentlemen, observe it is the effect set forth in the letters-patent—it is not to produce the same effect with No. 7,—which I take as a short description generally.

On these issues there are matters for me to state to you in point of law.

"Workmen of ordinary skill," means those competent in the ordinary business and conducting of the particular trade—to furnish and construct apparatus for the purpose required. Certainly the pursuer does not satisfy the condition of the law, if he says that men of the greatest science—first rate engineers, could understand him, and would know what to do, or what directions to give. That is not enough. The specification must be for the benefit of the trade when the patent is out—it is addressed to those engaged in particular departments of trade, and who are to be employed in order to make apparatus for the purpose, those who are competent to make similar apparatus for similar purposes. But the terms in the issue do not denote common labourers or workmen employed under those who do furnish and construct such apparatus. We know that in many trades the most skillful workmen in the subdivision of labour, are conversant only with parts and portions of machines, and could not put together the whole. The workmen referred to by the law are those conversant with the construction, and principles, and rules of apparatus for heating air—and with the object of the blowing apparatus, so that the heating of the air shall impede the blast as little as possible. The apparatus, to attain the end, is to heat vessels in order to heat the blast. Then you are to apply to persons conversant with the rules, purposes, and conditions to be observed, and usually acted upon in heating air, and who construct and furnish such apparatus. Another important direction I have to give to you in point of law is this—when you are asked in the words of the second issue, “capable of producing the effect set forth”—or of the third, “practically useful for the purpose set forth,” &c.,—the point is not, whether, in first acting on the specification, persons would have furnished either Mr Condie’s pipes, or any contrivance at all so good, or giving so much benefit from the invention. You will see now the great importance of the general directions I formerly gave you as to the object of the patent, and the extent of the claim. The patentee does not profess to state any particular form of pipes for getting either a certain degree, or the greatest degree of benefit from the hot blast, and this shows you the fallacy in a great part of the evidence for the defender. The patentee says, the hot blast will produce heat in the furnace. Heat the blast in any way, you will get benefit; and then the question is, can apparatus be constructed by those competent to construct the heating apparatus, so as to have some decided benefit, more or less. If that shall be proved, then we have no question under this issue, whether the greatest benefit would at first have been attained in acting on the specification. Here I prefer putting this point to you in the words of my brother Judge in England, who tried this case last May, in London. Mr Baron Parke, in commenting on the opinion of a scientific witness, examined as to whether workmen could, from the specification, construct an apparatus which would be most efficaciously used—says, (143), “That, however, I do not think is the exact point. The point is, whether it can be used beneficially, taking it in the simplest form. If, in order to use it beneficially at all, experiments were necessary, about which a good deal was said by the Attorney-General, then the specification would be void. If it were necessary to use experiments in order to have the benefit of the invention, in which it is claimed by the specification, in that case it would be void; but if in this case, it is only necessary to have recourse to experiments, in order to have the full benefit that the subject is capable of,—it appears to me that it would not void the patent; because though it is a subject beneficial in its simplest form of application, it is a vast deal more useful when the improvement takes place; and in order to make the greatest improvement, unquestionably many experiments are necessary, and even, at this very moment, notwithstanding the great improvements that have taken place, there is no doubt that the matter is not in that state of improvement which, in all probability, it will be in the course of a few years. It does not appear to me, therefore, that what the Attorney-General has dwelt upon, with reference to the evidence—all the evidence in the case—that that affects the patent. If experiments were necessary to produce any degree of benefit under the patent, then, in that case, I think the specification is void, for it does not give the requisite degree of temperature; but if the simplest form would be productive of benefit, it appears to me that the specification is good.” And again, Baron Parke says, (page 147):—“I have already told you, that if experiments are necessary in order to construct a machine to produce some beneficial effect, no doubt this specification is defective. If experiments are only necessary in order to produce the greatest beneficial effect, in that case I think the patent is not void.” Then (at page 149) Baron Parke says:—“However, I think one may very well collect from the evidence as to Mr Neilson’s own acts, that he really was not fully aware either of the great value of his patent, and still more was not fully aware of the beneficial mode of carrying it into effect. That was discovered by persons more acquainted than he himself was with the science of heating air. Still, however, I think, if you are of opinion that the specification does disclose such an apparatus as to enable an ordinary workman acquainted with the subject of making blowing apparatus, and fitting up apparatus for forges,” (I put it rather differently, I should say workmen acquainted with the construction of apparatus for heating air, and so I observe Baron Parke ultimately put it,) “to construct an apparatus of some value, so as to make it worth while, it seems to me, that so far as this objection goes, the specification would not be insufficient.”

I take these passages, the more because that learned Judge adopted a view of the specification in which the Court held he was wrong, and had throughout a decided impression at the trial, that the specification was defective, thinking that it told those who were to work on it to disregard the rules as to heating air. But even with that view, you see how he puts this point. I have only to add, that I think he states this not so favourably as I can now do, and feel bound to do, guided by the judgment of the English Court of Exchequer and of Lord Lyndhurst. I have to tell you, in point of law, that under this patent not claiming any, or the best contrivance for heating the air, and at the least expense and trouble, the result which actually followed, viz., that persons in the trade, and in acting on the patent, contrived from time to time a great variety of contrivances, more or less valuable or costly, and at last came to settle generally into one form as better than others, was exactly the result which might be expected to follow under a patent of this general character, and that if the patent is good in law, then it gave no form of apparatus for heating air, but claimed the contrivance generally of heating the blast for the effect and end of producing heat in the furnace. The only point for you is,—will any contrivance which heats the blast produce that beneficial effect and end? If so, then the defender has failed to prove these two issues. I shall explain to you, that on this point I think the defender has, in the evidence of some of his own witnesses, given you the most decided and valuable evidence in the whole cause in support of the pursuer’s answer to these two issues.

But then the defender contends that there are directions in the specification as to heating vessels, and as to the form of the vessels, that these directions are at variance with all the rules as to heating air, and would mislead all persons conversant with heating apparatus, by directing them to act against all the known rules for heating air, in order to make blast hot, and in order to attain the end of this patent on the furnace. I am under considerable doubt whether others may view this as matter of law. In case it should be so considered elsewhere, I will, if either party requires it, state my opinion in point of law, so that they may not be cut out of the opportunity of making it matter of record. But individually I hold, under these issues settled to try this cause, that this is a question wholly for you, the jury—keeping in view the principles for construing the specification which I have stated to you, and proceeding as you will upon the view I have stated of the patent in point of law, as a general patent for the application of hot blast to fires, forges and furnaces, the air under blast being heated at a particular stage of the process, and not being a patent for any particular mode of heating air, so that directions to workmen on that subject are not to be presumed. Then another point is raised by the defenders, viz., that the heat of the blast, obtained even by the original forms of the apparatus, and before Condie’s pipes were introduced, was such as to burn the old dry twyres; that even the old water-twyres used at the great heat of refineries would not stand the heat obtained by the hot blast, even before the pipes represented by 5 and 7 were introduced—that the patentee did not tell how the mouth of the aperture into the furnace at which the hot blast was introduced was to be guarded, and that on this account, either the specification is defective in point of law, or does not enable benefit to be derived from the hot blast by Neilson’s invention alone. I am not sure exactly which view the defender stands on—whether it is defective in law, because it does not guard the furnace from the effect of the hot blast—or whether objectionable in fact, because it is shown, as they allege, that without that invention, the benefit would not be derived at all. On the evidence, you will consider whether there can be, in point of fact, any circumstance of real evidence more conclusive as to the great heat obtained in practice with all the older contrivances than that, not only the dry, but even the old water-twyre would not stand—and whether the continuance of the use of the hot blast, notwithstanding these interruptions, is not decided real evidence also of the practical advantages to the trade. But on this point I must state to you, in point of law, that for the object and purpose of the patent, the specification is not defective, so far as it does no state how, or in what manner the mouth of the furnace was to be guarded, and that the patentee was not bound to do so. But I cannot say that this objection, in point of fact, is to be excluded from your consideration under the second and third issues—attending, however, to the rules I have given you in construing the specification, and also to the general nature of the patent, as I have stated it. The alleged difficulty of acting on, and using the hot blast before the new water-twyre was invented, may be used as evidence to show that the invention was of no practical utility until a new water-twyre was invented; for it is said by the defenders, that even the old water-twyre was of no use, although in many of the English works Condie's twyre is not yet used. But as a legal objection to his patent, I apprehend that it cannot be maintained, in point of law, that the patentee was bound to state how the sides of the furnace, where the hot-blast was to enter, should be protected.

To the bar.—Is there any other point of law to which either party wishes to direct my attention? Mr Rutherford and the Solicitor-General both said—No.

Now this brings to a close the directions which I have to give you in point of law. They have been certainly fuller, and perhaps more anxious than necessary. But knowing that one of the parties thought that the benefit of trying the point of law was lost to them in England, I have thought it my duty to state the case most fully, so that every point may be before the parties as far as it occurred; and I have also thought it my duty not to withhold any points of law, so far as their tendency and meaning might bear directly on the light in which you are to consider the evidence. You must, with your intelligence, perceive that the decision of the questions in the cause depends very little on the details of the evidence, but mainly on the general views you must take of the case in point of law, or on the general views you have as to the meaning of the specification. But still the details of the evidence must be anxiously attended to, in order to secure certain and safe judgment.

If your opinion on the whole cause shall be for the defenders, it will be sufficient that you find generally for the defenders on the first pursuers' issue, and for the defenders on the other three.

If your opinion shall be for the pursuers, then I have mentioned, that for various reasons I shall ask you to answer certain additional questions, and I am persuaded that by doing so, I shall save great uncertainty and embarrassment, especially as in England some points were held to be law for the Court, which I humbly think are points for you, and at all events, are made by these issues points for the jury trying the same. I have now to read to you these questions, and beg you will keep them in view in going over the evidence. I shall give you the paper afterwards. Of course, these questions are put on the supposition that you are in favour of the pursuers; for on the other supposition, you have only to find for the defenders on all the issues. The questions are,—

Whether, by the description in the said specification, the patentee did, or did not, refer to any particular form or shape, or mode of construction, of the air vessel or vessels, or receptacle or receptacles, in which the air under blast is to be heated?

Whether, by the use of the term effect in the specification, the patentee did, or did not, state that the form and shape of the air vessel or vessels were immaterial for the purpose of heating the air in such air vessel or vessels?

Whether the terms of the specification respecting the air vessels or receptacles, and the size and numbers thereof, are, or are not, such as to mislead persons acquainted with the process of heating air, so as to direct, and cause them to construct the vessels in a form or manner contrary to the ordinary and necessary rules to be attended to in heating air passed into vessels, for the purpose of being heated under the progress of the blast?

To the Bar.—If, before I have done, any objection shall occur to either of you, either as to the wording of those questions, or as to the propriety or competency of their being put, I should like to hear it."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"At Edinburgh, the 1st, 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of April 1842 years. Before the Right Honourable the Lord Justice-Clerk, compared the said pursuers and the said defenders by their respective counsel and agents, and a jury having been empannelled and sworn to try the said issues between the said parties, say upon their oaths, that in respect of the matters proven before them, they find for the pursuers on all the issues; and farther, find that, by the description in the said specification, the patentee did not refer to any particular form or shape, or mode of constructing the air vessel or vessels, or receptacle or receptacles in which the air under blast is to be heated; and farther, find that, by the use of the term "effect" in the specification, the patentee did not state that the form and shape of the air vessel or vessels were immaterial for the purpose of heating the air in such vessel or vessels; and farther, find that the terms of the specification respecting the air vessels or receptacles, and the size and numbers thereof, are not such as to mislead persons acquainted with the process of heating air, so as to direct and cause them to construct the vessels in a form or manner contrary to the ordinary and necessary rules to be attended to in heating air passed into vessels for the purpose of being heated under the progress of the blast; and they assess the damages at £3060."

The defenders tendered the following exceptions,—the exception to the rule against the defenders leading evidence as to use at Irvine, as above, forms the first exception:

1st Exception.—above.—Cases cited, Russel v. Crichton, 19th June 1838. Neilson v. Harford; Eng. Rep.

"2d Exception.—In so far as his Lordship did direct the jury that the patentee did not claim as any part of his invention, or profess to describe any mode of heating the air under blast in a vessel; or any particular form or dimensions of the vessel or vessels to be employed for that purpose."—Cases cited, Neilson v. Harford, pp. 222, 226, 228, 264.

"3d Exception.—In so far as, upon such view of the extent and nature of the patentee's claim, the said Lord Justice-Clerk did direct the jury, in point of law, that the said patent was valid, and did not direct the jury, in point of law, that the patent was invalid."—Cases cited, Russel v. Crichton, ut sup. Statute James I. c. 3, § 6. Godson on Patents, p. 36. Jupe v. Pratt, in Webster on Patents, p. 136. Henry Blaestone for Bolton v. Bull, p. 463. Godson on Patents, p. 93, Note p. 503. Hornblower v. Bolton; 8 Termly Report, p. 98. Hullet v. Hague; 2 Barn. and Adol., p. 370. Godson, p. 76. Russel v. Cowley; 1 Crompton, p. 39. Jones v. Pearce, Webster on Patents p. 134, and Minter v. Wells, Webster on Patents, p. 114; also in Tyrwhite's Reports, and in Crompton and Meeson.

"4th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk did not direct the jury, in point of law, that the specification, by not giving a particular description of the nature of the said invention, and in what manner the same was to be performed, was insufficient, and did not comply with the condition on which the patent was granted.

"5th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that it was a question on the intelligibility of the patent and for them—whether the specification contains a special, limited, and restricted description, by which the inventor so described one sort of apparatus, that he cannot maintain that his patent is one which applies to all varieties in the apparatus which may be employed in the heating of air while under blast, and did leave that question on the evidence to the jury; and did not direct that the meaning of the specification, on a matter not involving words of art, is matter of law for direction by the Court."—Cases cited by defender, Hullet v. Hague, ut sup. Gordon v. Graham, 3d May 1841; Robinson's H. of L. Rep.

"6th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk did not direct the jury, that on the construction of the patent and specification, the patentee cannot claim or maintain that his patent is one which applies to all varieties in the apparatus which may be employed in heating air while under blast, but was limited to a particular apparatus described in the specification."—Cases cited by defenders, Crossley v. Beverley; Car. and Payne, p. 515. Ashley v. Taylor; 1 Shaw's Appeal Cases, 158. Hill v. Thomson; 3 Merivale, p. 629.

"7th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that the sense of the term effect, in working on this specification, was a question upon the evidence for them, and not matter of law for direction by the Court.

"8th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk did not direct the jury that the term effect, as employed in the specification, meant heating the air while under blast and increase of heat in the furnace.

"9th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that if they were of opinion that the patentee had not limited himself in his specification to any particular description of vessel or apparatus, variances in the modes or kinds of apparatus are of no moment, provided that, in the processes referred to (the use of fires, forges and furnaces), the object of the particular contrivance or apparatus is to heat the air under blast, at the same stage of the process, viz., between the blowing apparatus and the furnace, and to throw it so heated into the furnace, to the effect of this improved application of air for that purpose.

"10th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury, in point of law, that it was no objection to the validity of such a patent that it included every mode of applying the principle or agent so as to produce the specified result, although one mode may not be described more than another—although one mode may be infinitely better than another—although much greater benefit would result from the application of the principle by one method than by another—although one method may be much less expensive than another; and that this generality of claim—that is, for all modes of applying the principle to the purpose specified according to, or within a general statement of the object to be obtained, and of the use to be made of the agent to be so applied—was no objection whatever to the patent."—Cases cited by defenders, Hullet v. Hague, and Russel v. Cowley, ut sup.

"11th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury, in point of law, that the proof of prior use of the patent invention must not only be

"(1.) Public, but

"(2.) Must have been continued, not abandoned; and

"(3.) Must have continued to the time when the patent was granted, not to the very exact period, but that it must have been known and used as a useful thing at the time."—Cases cited by defenders, Strutt, as cited in the charge.

"12th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury, in point of law, that for the object and purpose of the patent the specification is not defective, so far as it does not state how, or in what manner, the mouth of the furnace was to be guarded, and that the patentee was not bound to do so.

"13th Exception.—In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk did not direct the jury, in point of law, that for the object and purpose of the patent, the specification was defective, in so far as it did not state how or in what manner the end of the pipe conducting the heated air into the furnace was to be protected against the effects of the intensity of the heat, and that the patentee was bound to do so."

Cases cited by Pursuers.—Jupe v. Pratt, p. 136 of Webster. 2 Henry Blaestone, p. 496. Wheeler, 2 Barn. and Adol., pp. 349, &c. Hullet v. Hague, ut sup. 2 Barn. and Adol., p. 370. Russel v. Cowley, ut sup. Daniel, in Godson on Patents, 274. Minter v. Wells, 1 Mason, Crompton and Roscoe's Rep., 506. Statute James I., c. 3, § 6. Jones v. Pearce, in Godson, p. 46. Cornish v. Keane, 3 Brougham's New Cases, p. 570. Bloxam, 1 Carr. and Payne, 567. Walton v. Potter, 14th Nov. 1841, Common Pleas, Law Journal. Gibson v. Brand, 4th and 5th May 1842. Meadley, Law Journal.

The discussion which took place on the bill of exceptions is sufficiently indicated in the opinions of the Judges at the advising of this date.

Lord Medwyn.—When this case was set down for argument,

I did not expect to occupy the place I now do, at your Lordship's right hand, and lament the absence of my learned brother from indisposition, as his intimate acquaintance with Jury Court practice would have enabled him to bring to the examination of this bill of exceptions the benefit of his practical experience on the subject, and as following him in the discussion, I would probably have been relieved from the necessity of going at any length into the case. I have, however, given the question all the attention in my power, and am now to submit the result of my opinion.

Before proceeding to consider the numerous exceptions taken to the charge in this case, I think it right to attend, in the first place, to what are the objections to this patent, which fall within these issues on which the case was sent to the jury, and in terms of which it was competent or necessary for the Judge to give directions to them in point of law, or to say that he left the point in their hands. Now, I do not see any issue which involved the validity of the patent, on account of the subject matter of it; whether it be for a manufacture within the meaning of the Statute; whether, in fact, the invention is such for which, in point of law, a patent could be granted and supported; whether it be a mere abstract principle, not embodied, or not involving a process to carry it into effect. Neither do I see that the question can competently be raised, that the patent is invalid because of vagueness—not sufficiently describing the subject matter of it. These unquestionably are good grounds of objection to a patent. But in the present discussion, which is on exceptions arising out of the trial of these issues, we must confine ourselves strictly to what falls within the issues. That is the only matter before us. Now, the first issue assumes the validity of the patent, and of the privileges conferred in it, and asks the jury to consider if these have been wrongfully infringed. Had the defender been satisfied that his case might be tried by a denial of, and defence against, this issue, on the ground that under the term wrongfully, he might have pleaded all his objections to the patent, showing that it could not support the privileges claimed under it, in respect that he could show that the pursuer was not the inventor, or that it did not fulfil the other provisions in the letters-patent, or that it was for a mere abstract principle, or that the specification was too vague, so that it was not wrongful in him to use apparatus to the same effect as the pursuers, he would have rested his case on that issue alone. But according to the course of pleading in such case, I presume he would not have been let in to such pleas against the validity of the patent under this issue, and would have been confined to the defence, that he had not used machinery or apparatus substantially the same, and to the same effect. But, at all events, here the defender has taken counter issues, and I conceive that all the objections to the patent which could be submitted to the jury, and relative to which the Judge was called upon to say any thing to them, must be found in and restricted to these issues. Now, these counter issues are three in number, involving four defences, viz.—that the pursuer was not the inventor,—that it was in previous use—that the description could not enable a workman to make the apparatus,—and that the invention is not practically useful. But these are objections distinct altogether from invalidity or any other ground, and particularly, that it is for a principle merely, or that it is too vague in setting forth what he claims as his invention. Moreover, if the defender had any well-grounded objection to the validity of the invention, as not being the proper subject of a patent, or improperly set forth in the specification, arising out of the construction of these instruments, I think his proper course should have been—before going before a jury on such an issue as infringement, which, in fact, admits the validity of the patent, unless any of the provisions in the grant can be established against it, and which, according to practice, must be the subject of counter issues,—to raise the question of invalidity on the record, and to have pleaded it to the Court. It is raised on the record here, and if it be a question for the Court, as I think it clearly is, it would have been idle to have submitted the questions of fact involved in the matter of infringement to a jury, if the patent was such as the pursuer had no right in law to protect. It was said, that it did not arise till a certain construction was given to it by the Judge at the trial, and it was then only to be raised as an exception to the charge. But I rather think the construction contended for, should have been pleaded before-hand to the Court, as the true meaning of the letters-patent and specification, and that either this could not be the subject-matter of a patent, or that it was too vaguely described to support this patent. I will not say that this point may not be raised yet. The record and pleas are broad enough to embrace it. Only I think it does not come within the scope of these issues, and consequently cannot be the subject of discussion in this stage of the procedure.

If I am right in this view, it will enable us to dispose of a good deal of matter which was pleaded to us. It will also be of use, as a prelude to the examination of these exceptions, to attend to what is the invention claimed by the patent. Its title is "an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required." It is not an improved mode of heating air—it is not even an improved mode of applying air, but it is an improvement in the application of air,—that having succeeded in heating air between the bellows or blowing apparatus, and before it is propelled into the furnace, the effect will be produced which is intended, of greatly increasing the efficacy of the blast in the furnace. Looking to the whole description of the invention as given in the specification, I think this clear. A blast or current of air is to be produced in the ordinary way, and the patent disclaims being extended to this: the blast is to be passed into an air vessel, and it (the air vessel) must be kept heated, at a considerable temperature—better red heat or nearly so, but so high a temperature not necessary for a beneficial effect, the effect of the invention, i. e., to produce heat in furnaces; hence the specification says, the form or shape of the air vessel is immaterial, and the manner of applying heat to it is immaterial; the materials of which it is made is immaterial, provided it be kept at a proper temperature. The size, however, must depend upon the blast, and on the heat necessary to be produced. All this seems quite clear, when it is considered that the patent is not for heating air in the air vessel, where form would be of the utmost consequence, but that the invention and the beneficial effect intended, is for producing heat, increased heat in furnaces, by heating the air between the furnace and the blowing apparatus. It is very clear, I think, that it is for the Court to construe the patent and specification to the effect of defining what is the claim made by the patentee. It is so laid down in the judgment of the English Court on this patent in Harford's case; and it is very material that this construction should be given to it, because there cannot be a doubt that towards the heating of air the shape and materials of the vessel in which it is heated are most material, so that such a statement as that they are immaterial, would be a false statement in a material part, and would void the patent. This adds to the certainty that the right construction has been put upon the patent, as to the subject-matter, as no mode of heating air is given, and if it had, I think it must have been disclaimed, just as the blowing apparatus is. Hence, then, the subject-matter of the patent plainly is to throw hot air instead of cold air into a furnace,—heating the air between its passage from the blowing apparatus to the furnace in an air vessel.

Now let us attend to the exceptions, and I shall begin with the 2d, and dispose of that before considering the 1st, as they are of a class and description quite different from the 1st, involving questions under patent law, and applicable to it alone,—the other being as to the form of process, admitting more of illustration from our system of pleading generally in ordinary cases before the Court, although, no doubt, there is a point in it applicable to patent-law practice also.

The 2d and 3d exceptions are connected together. In directing the jury, in point of law, that the patentee did not claim as his invention, any mode of heating the air under blast in a vessel, or describe any particular form or dimension of the vessel to be employed, I have already indicated my opinion very clearly; and had your Lordship directed the jury in the manner it is said you should have done, I think it would have been most plainly a misdirection—that you would have misconstrued the patent and ascribed an invention to the pursuer which he did not claim, and which probably would have been bad if he had claimed. I need say no more on this 2d exception. According to this view, it is very clear also, that I cannot sustain the 3d exception. It is founded on the direction which it is said should have been given under the preceding exception. If part of the invention had been heating the air under a blast in a vessel, and no mode of doing this is described, nor any particular form or dimensions of the vessel given, the jury should not have been directed, in point of law, that the patent was valid—the direction should have been, that it is invalid.

Now, I have already observed, that under the issues in the present case, I do not think the question of the invalidity of the patent on this ground of law can be competently raised. It may be doubted, even whether as being a question of law, and on the construction of the patent, if the discussion involve no words of art which require explanation by parole evidence, an issue could be competently sent to a jury on this ground of invalidity. If it could, I think it would not be difficult to find an issue to try the point, whether it was sufficiently described. But be this as it may, I think it is not raised by the first issue, the only one under which it could be brought; and, at all events, as I am of opinion that no part of the invention claimed is for heating air in an air vessel, it would have been a misdirection to the jury to say, that the failure to describe the mode of doing so, or form or dimension of the vessel, rendered the patent invalid.

The 4th exception admits of an easy answer, after the discussion on the two preceding issues, that by not giving a particular description of the nature of the said invention, and in what manner it was to be performed, the specification was insufficient. If the invention claimed had been for heating air under blast in a vessel, the description of the mode of doing so would have been insufficient, and the patent invalid on this ground; but if this be not the nature of the invention, and the mode of heating air required no description, then the Judge could not have given the direction in point of law, which is here said he should have done.

The 5th exception bears, that the charge is wrong, in holding that it was a question on the intelligibility of the patent, and for the jury, whether the specification describes one kind of apparatus only, so that the patentee cannot maintain that it applies to all varieties of the apparatus for heating the air under blast, and that that question was left on the evidence to the jury. One observation very strongly strikes my mind here, that both parties seem to have considered this point as a matter for the jury, as I observe that much evidence is adduced on this very matter on both sides; and your Lordship seems only to have followed the course according to which both parties conceived the case should be disposed of; at the same time, with all deference to your Lordship, I have had difficulties on this point. The intelligibility of a patent, that is, whether the specification is such that a practical man of competent knowledge can, from the description alone, and his previous acquaintance with the subject, execute a machine with the effect intended, is unquestionably a matter for the jury,—it is a question of fact cognisable by them alone. But I think that the construction of the letters-patent and of the specification, to ascertain from them not merely what is the subject-matter of the patent, as whether it be a principle, or a principle carried into effect by a mode or manner of doing so, but whether the specification describes one specific mode of doing so, or embraces all modes, is not properly a question on the intelligibility, but as to the subject-matter of the patent, the nature of the invention, or rather the mode by which it is to be made practical,—the principle clothed with practical application, by which the effect intended is produced. The mode may be quite intelligible, so intelligible as to show what precise mode is claimed, and so described as to require no jury to say that a workman could copy it; and the whole question might be, if the patent covered every mode of producing the same effect, as in the case alluded to in the pleadings as to the evaporating process. I scarcely think the point is for the jury, but for the Court, whether this intelligible mode is exclusive of all others, or whether, though a step in the process, the mode—the peculiar mode of obtaining it—is not the subject of the patent. Thus, for instance, in the present case, the invention is construed by the Court to be not for heating air, but for blowing heated air into the furnace, and the description of the air vessel giving no particular mode of heating air in it, necessarily leaves every mode of producing such heated air, when used for this purpose, protected by the patent,—a question, I incline to think, rather for the Court, as depending on the construction of the patent and specification.

But the pursuer says, that be it so, and that this should not have been left to the jury, the defender cannot take benefit from it, unless he can show that the Court ought to have come to a different opinion on the point from what the jury did; and that as the 8th exception, which contains the direction which it is said should have been given on this point, that the patentee cannot claim all varieties for heating air while under blast, but was limited to a particular apparatus described in the specification, is not such as your Lordship should not have laid down, but the contrary, the result would have been the same had it not been left to the jury, but kept in the hands of the Court.

The defender, on his part, argues, that although he may be wrong in the law which he says should have been given to the jury, still if he be right in his plea, that it was a point for the Court and not for the jury, he is entitled to have the 5th exception sustained.

On this point, also, I feel a great deal of difficulty. I believe it to be a rule of practice, in the application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, to refuse the trial if the evidence admitted or rejected could not affect the result, or if the party could take no benefit on other grounds, by setting aside the verdict; but I do not know that the same rule applies as to a question of law such as I think the question is,—whether a point is to be sent to the jury, or reserved for the decision of the Court? No case in our practice of jury trial was referred to, and I do not recollect any English case on this point, which it was said could assist in guiding us to the determination of this matter. At the same time, I freely own I was much moved by the argument, from principles so well explained by the senior counsel for the pursuer, more especially when I cannot shut my eyes to the extreme hardship of holding the whole expensive proceedings in a case such as this, which occupied so much time, and occasioned such anxiety, to go for nothing, on a ground which could not affect the justice of the case, or make any difference in the result. For on the principle assumed, that the conclusion of the jury was right as to their opinion on the point, if a new trial were granted, the same verdict would be returned, provided the same evidence was laid before the jury (for the verdict here is not to be impeached as being against evidence—that point, we were told from the bar, has been given up), and your Lordship carefully, and with particular attention to the interests of the parties, took care that the opinion of the jury should be expressed on the point, that the patentee did not refer to any particular form or shape of the air vessel.

Now the argument was, that if a party excepts on the ground of law omitted, he must state what is the law omitted which he says should have been laid down; and this exception will not be sustained unless the suggested law be good law, such as the case required. But if the Court leaves the issue to the jury, involving law as well as fact, and the jury answer the issue, is there any difference as to this point, between leaving it to the jury expressly, and saying nothing about it? In both cases, the direction is withheld—in the one, by saying nothing about it; in the other, by saying it is for the jury. If in the case of omitted law, the law which should have been laid down must be stated, and that must be sound law in the case,—must not also the law be stated which the Court ought to have taken to themselves, which they should have told the jury they must take from the Court, and this law must be such as would not support the verdict, but would lead to an opposite result? If the exceptor cannot ask such law—law different from what the jury followed,—ought his exception to be sustained, unless he can say that the Court reserving it to themselves, would have produced an opposite verdict? There is certainly much good sense in this view, and I am inclined to adopt it as a sufficient answer to the difficulty I have under the 5th exception.

Now the same observations apply to the 7th and 8th exceptions. Supposing that the defender was right in maintaining that the meaning of the term effect in the specification was to be settled by the Court, and was not a question on the evidence for the jury, I am very clearly of opinion, that effect, as employed in the specification no less than four times, does not mean heating the air while under blast, but the ultimate effect in the furnace by blowing heated air into it; and the view taken of this by the jury, is the direction that the Court should have given on this point.

The 9th exception cannot occupy much time, after the points which have already been disposed of. It was laid down, and as I think, most correctly, that the patent does not claim any particular sort of apparatus or heating vessels,—that there is no standard of apparatus in the specification with which to compare the defender's apparatus—and that this does not affect the validity of the patent; on the contrary, it affords a better protection to the invention, as it applies to every process or mechanical arrangement by which the air is heated in an air vessel between its passage from the blowing apparatus into the furnace, and variances in the modes or kinds of apparatus are in this view of no moment.

It cannot therefore affect the validity of the patent, if this point could be raised under these issues, as I think it cannot—that it includes every mode of raising the temperature of the air in the air vessel, producing the increased effect in the furnace by propelling heated air into it; all modes of doing this in the same stage of the process being protected by the patent, and not rendering it invalid.

The 11th exception was only considered as to the third condition implied in the prior use; and I cannot help thinking that if it was objectionable at all, it is because it laid this down, that the use need not come down to the exact time of obtaining the letters-patent. But I do not object to the direction here. It must be a new invention—it must not be known and used as a useful thing at the time; and a previous invention may have ceased to be used for a week or two, not implying its abandonment from want of beneficial effect, say from unskilfulness, or from some trifling defect in the machinery, but from want of funds, or some such cause, leading to a temporary interruption.

The 12th and 13th exceptions may be taken together—that the jury were not directed, in point of law, that the specification is defective, by not stating how the mouth of the furnace, and also the end of the pipe conducting the heated air into the furnace, were to be protected against the intensity of the heat, and that the patentee was bound to do so. Now, this question might fall under the consideration of the jury under the 2d and 3d issues, but if the jury were of opinion, that without any such description, a workman of ordinary skill could make apparatus to produce the effect set forth in the letters-patent, it was for the Court to say whether the omission to state what it is maintained the patentee should have stated, vitiates the patent. It is admitted that this is a question of law; and as it did not raise any difficulty as to the intelligibility of the patent falling within the scope of the 2d and 3d issues, if it goes to the validity of the patent, on the ground that the specification does not describe what it ought to have done, it cannot come within the present discussion. But I think it was not necessary to describe how these parts of the machinery should be guarded. It was a known process before. Any workman of competent skill knows how to do it, and I presume if the twyre had been described, it must have immediately been disclaimed as part of the invention. Therefore those exceptions must also be disallowed.

There only now remains the 1st exception to consider; and I am ready to admit that I feel more at home in the discussion of this objection than in those I have been hitherto considering.

The exception regards the time of inquiry which the defender proposed entering into, in order to show that the invention was not new, but had been in prior use; and the grounds on which that line of inquiry, and the witnesses who were to instruct such prior use, were excluded, are stated at page 66.

It is said that the averment is made generally on the record, that this invention was known and practised prior to the date of this patent, both in England and Scotland; and farther, that before closing the record, a note of objections was given in under Lord Brougham's Act, which stated that it was known and publicly practised at Irvine, Greenock, Glasgow, and various other places in the counties of Ayr, Renfrew, and Lanark, and at various places in Mid-Lothian by various iron-masters, and iron-founders, anchor smiths, and others; and it is said that this particularity sufficiently supplements the generality in the record, and ought to have let in the evidence and line of inquiry which was rejected.

Now, before going farther, I must own that I have great hesitation in thinking that the section of the Act founded on, (the 5th) applies to Scotland at all. The 1st section and the 4th, as to the prolongation of the term for a patent, certainly apply to Scotch patents, as being an amendment on the law of patents generally, and reference is made in the first directly to Scotland. But this 5th section applies to the system of pleading in the English Courts, and is intended to obviate what was held there to be a defect in trying such cases as this of patent, but which could not be objected to against our system of pleading, which requires no aid from such a regulation as this, nor can derive any assistance from it in securing such a statement of facts and circumstances, as to prevent any thing like surprise at a trial. I cannot conceive that it was intended to interfere with our system of a closed record on a revised concordance and answers, so as either to make the exclusion of unexpected evidence either more stringent or less so; and when I look at the terms of this section of the Act, I cannot help thinking, that besides the object of it, to correct the want of specificness in English pleading, the terms which it uses sufficiently exclude the idea that it was intended for our practice, or is adapted to it. It bears, that in any action brought for an infringement of a patent, the defendant on pleading thereto, shall give to the plaintiff, and in any scire facias to repeal such letters-patent, the plaintiff shall file with his declaration a notice of any objections on which he means to rely at the trial. Now, all this may be very necessary under the English form of pleading, while it is already most fully accomplished by our form of process. Although the enactment, so far as the subject-matter of a patent is conceived, may extend to Scotland, I think it would require something very imperative, and not the mere applicability of the other portions of the Statute to this country, to make us also import from it a form of pleading plainly adapted to England alone, into our practice, so recently amended by the Legislature, and when our pleadings, according to this statutory description, ought to embrace everything which the notice of objections in England is required to set forth.

I think, therefore, that we must look to the closed record, the foundation of these issues, and on the averments in which the parties agreed to close, and of course to foreclose themselves as to all other averments in fact, and we must consider whether the defender made such statements as to entitle him to go into this line of inquiry. Now, I say that the pursuer would have been misled by the record, for that he never could have expected any proof against his invention from the examination of an anchor smith using a common smith's forge in the town of Irvine, or any similar evidence. The record led him to expect quite a different state of facts to be proved against his being the inventor of this improvement. The defender specifies Chapman's invention. He next states the prior use of Neilson's invention, both in England and Scotland, particularly at two iron-works in Yorkshire, and one in Staffordshire, mentioning them by name, referring also to the patent of Botfield and Mr Stirling, and the mode invented by Mr Jeffries. Now, I hold it was quite incompetent, after exhausting the line of evidence here pointed out, or using as much of it as the defender thought available to him, to resort to an inquiry as to the use of heated air in a smith's forge at Irvine, about six years before the date of this patent, which does not seem to have been followed in other smiths' forges, nor described in any of the philosophical journals of the day as an important improvement. The record assuredly gave no information which called upon the pursuer to expect such a line of inquiry and evidence, or would have enabled him to meet it. If this line of inquiry had been allowed, and the verdict had been against him on the ground of prior use, I think he must have been allowed a new trial on the ground of surprise, and therefore that this evidence was properly refused.

I perceive that in a recent English case, where the note of objections had specified the prior use by certain persons named, and by others, the Judge at Chambers made the party strike out this general expression, and confine the proof to the persons named. In the case of Russel with us, it was specified on the record that there was prior use of making gas pipes by various persons both in Glasgow and Edinburgh; this generality was not objected to, nor brought before the Court, for the practice was recent, and in the hands of few. Those who manufactured them were well known, and no further particularizing was required by the party. This is no proof that greater explicitness would not have been required, if it had been necessary and insisted in; it is only proof that in that case the party did not wish for further notice in order to defend himself. Here I think it was different, more especially when the references to such works as could have used the hot blast in furnaces were so precise and numerous.

I am, therefore, upon the whole, for disallowing the bill of exceptions.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This bill of exceptions raises many important questions in patent law. It also raises several important points as to our system of pleading, and as to the principles on which bills of exceptions are to be disposed of. In giving my opinion, I shall not go over the law stated at the trial. The directions, in point of law, then stated were the result of much consideration,—although purposely stated in a variety of forms, and with (perhaps) unusual fulness, in order that I might be sure that the jury were able to follow and apply these directions. To that law, after attending to the arguments of the defenders, I now adhere. I shall confine my opinion, therefore, chiefly to the other questions which occur on this bill of exceptions.

In reference to the objections stated to the charge, I think it is necessary to classify them, in order to give a consistent opinion.

One very important question on this bill of exceptions is, whether some of the points are open under the issues which are in the course of trial? Now, to bring out that point clearly, and to show the importance of fixing the meaning of the issues, I have to notice, in the first place, that the line of objection urged against this patent was inconsistent with itself. One broad ground taken was, that this patent claimed too much,—that it claimed the process of heating air in a vessel without any particular directions as to that process, so as to make any new invention in what is universally practised,—and that it also claimed the introduction of hot blast, in the abstract, into fires, forges, and furnaces, without giving in the specification any directions as to the application of that principle, and without the specification of any mechanical contrivance, being in truth a patent for an abstract principle:—And hence that the patent was void,—1st, for claiming too much, and claiming what was not new; and, 2d, as a patent which, when the specification was considered, was merely for a general philosophical principle. But at the same time the defenders contended that the patent and specification applied only to one particular sort of apparatus,—was, in the description of the application of the principle, so limited to one particular kind of apparatus, that all other contrivances for effecting the same object, and in which there was not an adoption of the particular forms and shapes of vessels and apparatus described in the specification, were not, and could not, fall within the operation of the patent, but were necessarily open to the use of all the world, inasmuch as the patentee had limited himself wholly to one form of apparatus as the only mode in which he knew that his principle could be applied, or at least the only mode which he had described. And hence he contended that the series of pipes used by the defenders were substantially different from the apparatus which alone was described in the specification, viz., large vessels very ill adapted to attain a great heat in the air.

These two views of the patent and specification are fundamentally different; they adopt respectively totally opposite constructions, and are necessarily at variance the one with the other.

Now, before trial, and in a discussion on the validity of the patent on any legal pleas which could be started, it is true a party may argue alternatively; contending, 1st, that the patent is bad on account of vagueness and generality, or, 2dly, if that ground fails, on any other.

But of the two views urged in this case, the second could only be entertained at the trial; for whether the machinery was substantially different from that described in the specification, and whether the description in the specification was so worded as to cover it, depended wholly on evidence by which each was to be explained.

In the present case, these two views could not have been decided before trial, but one might.

But, further, though a party may, to the Court before trial, urge objections in point of law which are inconsistent, and the one of which only arises when the other is overruled, or on the supposition that it shall not be entertained—yet this I apprehend to be a clear point, viz., that issues for the trial of a cause by a jury cannot be framed on any alternative or inconsistent view. A general issue may admit of every variety of line of argument or of plea open on the record. But the case was not tried on a general issue. There is one issue given to the pursuer, and three issues given to the defenders, on certain special pleas or grounds of objection against the validity of this patent.

These are in truth all special issues, or rather, I should say, specific issues.

I am aware of no authority for holding that issues of this character can be framed on alternative views so as to be applicable equally to totally opposite views of the whole case. Such a notion is utterly inconsistent with the theory and object of framing issues. The theory is, that you have ascertained and specified the point to be tried under the issue; the object is to exclude any other, and to attain certainty by that result.

The defenders did not contend that their counter issues could admit of this alternative course of pleading, or indeed of the general objections stated as to the invalidity of the patent in point of law. They contended that it was the pursuer's issue which opened up to them these objections, however contradictory the view on which they are severally founded.

To recommend their line of argument the more to the Court, the motion for the new trial was abandoned, and very little even explained as to the particular kind of apparatus to which it was said the specification was exclusively restricted. In this respect the argument took a turn quite different from that urged in the Exchequer in England. Indeed the Solicitor-General seemed to make this limitation consist in the description in the specification being applicable merely to the process of heating, while the real ground of defence was, that the patentee had led those, to whom the specification was addressed, to understand that large vessels, cubical vessels increasing in size with the extent of the blast, not only without attention to the extent of the heating surface, but to the diminution of the heating surface as you required increase in the capacity of the blast, were the only forms to be employed in order to produce the effect intended.

But the pursuer could not have intended to take an issue which was adapted to the alternative pleas of the defenders.

Nay, when the defenders can only bring in these general objections in law to the validity of the patent as included under the pursuer's issue, their course of pleading must be unsound; for the pursuer's issue in a patent case is not intended, in our practice, to embrace the grounds of objection stated in law against the patent. The defender cannot enter into these without counter issues. The pursuer's issue is framed on the very opposite view, viz., that there is a prima facie case for the patent to entitle him to an issue of infringement—holding the patent to be good, until the defender makes out in defence that it is bad under any of his issues. By bringing the action, the pursuer puts the validity of his patent in issue in the cause,—that is, he exposes it to any objections which the defender can state against it. But if no ground of invalidity is urged to the Court in bar of trial, or if such is overruled, he is entitled to an issue of infringement, which issue assumes the validity of his patent, provided the defender cannot make out any of his counter issues; and if the defender takes none, then the only question at the trial is infringement or not.

This point, which clearly is the result of the law as to patents under our system of pleading, was fully discussed and finally decided in Russel v. Crichton, June 19, 1838, 16 S., 1155. The rubric of this case, as there reported, is,—“In an action by the holder of letters-patent, concluding for interdict and damages on account of alleged infringement of the patent—Held that the patent afforded prima facie evidence of the originality of the alleged invention, but that the defender was entitled to take an issue of denial of the invention.” The Court, after full argument, gave the pursuer, in that case, an issue of infringement, as the proper issue.

This matter did not pass in this case without observation. In the draft of the issues reported by the Lord Ordinary for the consideration of the Court, as to other points, the pursuer's issue included an inquiry into the validity of the patent on one point, viz., originality of invention, laying the onus on the pursuer, but only on that one point. The issue, even as framed by the pursuer, included that point. In the course of the discussion, I pointed out, with the concurrence of the rest of the Court, that this was a mistake under the decision in Russel v. Crichton, and the issue was altered accordingly, leaving it only an issue of infringement. The issues were, after discussion, settled in this case to the satisfaction of all parties,—so much so, that the Solicitor-General did not desire to be heard in reply upon them, after the proposed alterations were stated in the course of Mr Rutherford's speech—the defenders having the right of reply in that discussion.

Supposing the pursuer's issue had stood as originally framed, is it not clear that one point only would have arisen under it as to the validity of the patent, viz.,—Whether Neilson was the inventor? If he had made out that (probably the onus would have been easily satisfied), then there remained only the question of infringement.

But this first question was, as I have mentioned, struck out ex preposito, on the ground distinctly, that the pursuer was entitled to have an issue of infringement, holding that he had a prima facie case under the patent to claim damages for infringement, until the defender, by his counter issues, could show the patent to be bad—no plea in law against the patent being stated to the Court in bar of trial, or to be decided before trial. This issue of infringement, I apprehend, assumes the patent to be valid, so that if the defender's counter issues fail, and if the apparatus is, in point of fact, substantially the same in the opinion of the jury, the pursuer's issue is proved and exhausted, and he is entitled to a verdict.

It would throw our proceedings into utter uncertainty, and, indeed, render the form of issues not only an useless but a mischievous farce, if, although the defender failed in all his counter issues, embracing each a distinct ground of objection to the patent, he could still say, that under the pursuer's issue it was open to him to contend at the trial that the patent was invalid on any other ground which happened to be mentioned in the record. If so, why was the defender to take any counter issues at all on some grounds of objection. These, on the hypothesis of the argument we are considering, would have been equally open to him at the trial, without any issues. Yet, while he takes issues on three (I may say four) grounds of objection, each one of which would entitle him to a verdict, he says he has behind and in reserve, under the pursuer's issue of infringement, as many grounds of objection as the general plea on record, of vagueness and generality, and as to the patent being for a principle alone, will enable him to raise on the construction of the specification.

I am very clearly then of opinion, that the principle on which the pursuer's issue proceeds, excludes all general objections to the invalidity of the patent in point of law.

It was contended that the word wrongfully raised these objections. If so, then no counter issues need ever be taken. But that word is necessary to show that the pursuers aver that the same machinery was used without a license, or sanction, or permission of any sort, so as to make the infringement not only in law, but in fact, a ground of damage—that it was continued to be used after challenge—that it was used in knowledge of the patent, deliberately, systematically used,—in short, to meet every plea of mitigation or extension.

I must here observe, that there is one practical distinction to be attended to, as to our issues in patent cases. In England, the actions seem to be intended only to try the question of right or infringement, and the damages are obtained in Chancery, as I understand, by insisting for an account of the extent to which the business was carried on by means of the patent machinery. Our issue necessarily is to try the claim for damages also, and hence the word wrongfully is of great importance to include all the averments which may exclude pleas in mitigation.

Some attempts were made to endeavour to include the general points raised by the exceptions, under the words, “in contravention of the privileges conferred by the letters-patent.” This is plainly frivolous. The term “privileges” refers to the monopoly or protection of the patentee, and the issue is confined to the privileges conferred by the letters-patent. Now, the letters-patent do not contain the specification, on which alone these pleas can be raised. The letters-patent bestow the privilege—the grant of monopoly—the protection, under a proviso not originally required by Statute, but introduced by the Crown,—that the invention shall be fully described, and that in a separate instrument, which time is given to prepare. The reference, then, in the issue to the privileges conferred by the letters-patent, cannot raise any question as to the validity of the specification, when the rest of the issue itself does not.

My opinion then is, after very full consideration, that the question as to the validity of the patent on either of these three grounds—for they are in truth three separate grounds,—1. In respect of the extent of the claim: 2. Of the generality and vagueness of the specification, so far as that is pleaded to the Court as matter of law for a definite direction to the jury, that the patent is invalid on that ground, as in the fourth exception, so as to leave the jury no question under the issues at all for consideration; and, 3. In respect of the subject of the patent not being within the law of patent inventions, but being an attempt to appropriate merely an abstract principle, without any application to mechanical contrivances or tangible means:—My opinion, I say, is, that the question as to the invalidity of the patent, on any of these three grounds, is not comprehended under any of the issues in this cause sent to trial.

I have considerable doubt whether the last of these grounds of objection is raised even by any of the exceptions, unless it is under the 4th, and yet the 4th might be sustained on grounds wholly different. The 3d exception does not raise it; I do not think the 4th does;—For the 3d only states, that, on the view which I took of the nature of the patentee's claim, I ought to have held that the patent was invalid; and the 4th is confined to the vagueness of the specification;—And the 9th and 10th cannot, I think, be fairly so taken.

The question as to whether the validity of the patent on these grounds is raised either by the pursuer's issue, or by such counter issues as the defenders have here taken, is one of great practical importance to the successful conduct of trials. I complained at the trial of the uncertainty in which I was left by the defenders as to the grounds on which they stood. The main objection, in point of law, on which they now rely, they did not specifically state, until I called on the Solicitor-General at the close of his speech to say, seeing that it pervaded his whole case, whether he required a direction from the Court on that point, so as to take the whole cause from the jury. That course was very inconsistent with the line of evidence which the defender intended to lead, and was meant, naturally enough, to be reserved as an exception to be stated to me after my charge was closed. But the whole matter for the Court and jury was thrown into a most embarrassing shape, for one-half of the defenders' pleas are inconsistent with the other set, and arise only on hypothetical conjectures as to the construction of the patent being taken the one way or the other. He took neither view. He takes neither in the exceptions. He states two views quite irreconcilable, and asks for opposite and contradictory directions in point of law. Certainly issues could not have been framed with the intention of introducing such uncertainty and embarrassment. And I am confirmed, by reflection, in the opinion I stated at the trial, that the three grounds of objection which I have referred to are not comprehended in, or raised by any of the issues sent to trial. On that ground alone, I would disallow several of the exceptions—the 2d, 3d and 4th.

I do not say that the grounds of objection to the validity of the patent now adverted to ought to have been raised before trial, or could only have been raised before trial. To be sure, as the defenders have argued the case, they have shown us that they might all have been so raised. But the party may take issues so as to embrace them: And it may happen that none of them can be brought out clearly, even as points of law for the Court, except at a trial. Further, all the three points may in some cases—certainly the 2d and 3d—the vagueness of the specification, and the subject-matter of the patent, may involve matters on which the opinion of a jury may be required, and I can very well understand that the Court in many cases may refuse to decide any of these points before the case is fully developed and explained by the practical evidence as to the object of the patent, and the mode of working on the specification.

But if the points are not decided before trial, they must be specially comprehended under the issues which are framed.

The defenders say that issues could not be framed so as to embrace these grounds of objection. That is a singular line of argument, when it is contended that the issues in this case do comprehend all these questions. But there could be no difficulty whatever in framing issues on any of these grounds of objection. In the course of the discussion I stated the terms of such an issue, to which no objection was made. It was further urged, that such issues would be only contrivances to send questions of law to the jury. The observation of Lord Moncreiff was conclusive—that it is very strange, then, that the existing issues should do that without contrivance at all. But it does not follow that the issues would embrace only matter of law.

The consideration of this point is the more important, for it is right to explain that we have no proceeding of the same character, as I understand it, as a motion to arrest judgment. It is competent to a party, after verdict, to show that the verdict cannot be applied at all, or cannot lead to judgment wholly or at all in favour of the other party, or that a verdict only embraced a part of a cause, and did not exhaust it, and that he has still pleas conclusive in his favour remaining on the record, and undisposed of and not abandoned.

How far, according to our system, after issues are taken as the only grounds of defence against an issue by the pursuer, leading to and claiming damage, and requiring a sum to be assessed as damages actually due by the one party to the other, it is competent and open to the defender to maintain that he did not abandon any pleas which were on the record, and which might either have been discussed before trial, or made the subject of issues, will be matter for very serious consideration, if ever raised.

That all the grounds of objection to this patent should not have been embraced in these issues may now be subject of regret. I own, at the time the issues were brought before us, I was surprised, having the full report of the English case in view, that the defenders contented themselves with the issues they proposed. But the Court could not ask, whether they did not take other issues on different grounds.

The defect is not one with which the Court is chargeable, nor could the Judge at the trial aid the defenders further than he did, viz., by stating his opinion on all the points they raised, although he thought them not under the issues.

In the general view which I have taken of the true import and character of these issues, viewed without special reference (if it is possible so to view them) to matters purely of technical form, and to our peculiar system of pleading, I have been very much confirmed by the two cases in the Common Pleas, Walton v. Potter, and Gibson and Campbell v. Brand, to which I called the attention of parties in the course of the argument. The examination of these cases, in which the points come out very clearly to my mind, has been to confirm me in the opinion I expressed at the trial, not only on this, but other points in the cause. I think the issues in these cases were very analogous to those we have here; and the Court in both held these general grounds of objection to be excluded. Comparing the issues in these two cases with the issues under which this cause went to trial, and with the issue raised by the fourth plea in the cause, on this patent in the English Exchequer, I think the point comes out very clearly as to the construction to be put on our issues.

The fourth plea for the pursuer in that case (Neilson, &c. v. Harford, &c.) is as follows:—"That the said instrument in writing, in the declaration mentioned, and whereby the plaintiffs, in their said declaration, allege that the said James Beaumont Neilson did particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the said supposed invention, and in what manner the same was to be and might be performed, was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say," (here specification engrossed) "as by the said instrument in writing, now remaining enrolled in the High Court of Chancery of our Sovereign Lady the now Queen Victoria, will fully appear; and the defendants in fact say, that the said plaintiff, James Beaumont Neilson, did not by the said instrument in writing, under his hand and seal, or by any other instrument in writing, under his hand and seal, at any time, within six calendar months after the date of the said letters-patent, particularly describe and ascertain the nature of his supposed invention, and in what manner the same was to be performed, and by reason thereof, the said letters-patent became, and are wholly void; and this the defendants are ready to verify."

No doubt in England the difference is this, that if the points are raised by the record, they must (if I understand rightly the import of a remark of Chief-Justice Tindal in one of these cases) be in issue before the jury, if not disposed of before trial by demurrer. With us, although on record,—yet as we frame the issues which are to try the cause, it is admitted and clear, that they must be embraced in these issues which we frame. But that is a difference which only gives the greater point and importance and significance to our issues, carefully and specially extracted from the pleadings, at the desire of parties, by the issue clerks, in order to embrace and ascertain their case,—to try all they intend to stand upon,—and which they have the means always of discussing and objecting to before the Court, if dissatisfied with the terms of them, as was done in this cause.

Upon the grounds of objection to the patent, which have however been raised under this bill of exceptions, if competent under the issues, and competent under the exceptions, I retain the opinion in point of law which I stated to the jury. I shall not enlarge upon these matters. But I will only explain that the determination of the nature and extent of the patentee's claim, which may require the Court to look for certain purposes to the specification, and which clearly involves matter of law, in no degree whatever imports that the clearness and import of the specification for practical purposes and to practical men, is also matter of law, so far as there are questions at the trial upon that specification. The one may be decided before trial,—satisfactorily and justly decided in favour of the patentee; and yet the specification may be utterly insufficient, and may be so found at the trial (whether by the Court or the jury), without any inconsistency with the prior decision on the nature of the claim. A person's claim may be quite correct, but he may not afterwards have given such a description as to describe and ascertain distinctly the nature of his invention. I think it is right further to add, that I am quite aware that in many cases this question cannot well be disposed of except at trial. It may partly depend upon matters on which the opinion of the jury must be taken. In this case, I think the question, if comprehended under the issues, was purely matter of law; and for the decision of it, I do not think that the sufficiency of the specification (so far as involved in the pursuer's issue, or in the defender's issues,) required to be decided by the Judge.

The next set of exceptions relate to those matters which it is said the Judge ought not to have left to the jury. And here the pursuers reply, viz., that the defenders, in maintaining that a point was a matter of law for the Court, and to be ruled by the Court, were bound to state what law the Court ought to lay down; and further, that if the law in the bill of exceptions stated is bad,—and that if the only law which the Court would lay down, would lead necessarily to the very verdict which the jury have returned upon the matters so left to them,—there is no error in the result: The verdict is right. The exception cannot be sustained as to the law, which the defenders require, and the other exception cannot be sustained since it has produced no error in law.

This reply raises another most important question in reference to the disposal of bills of exceptions.

I own I have a great reluctance to exclude a party who says, I committed an error in leaving a point to the jury which was matter of law, by this sort of answer, that the jury have gone right in point of law, when the party was entitled to the opinion of the Judge, which might have been the other way, giving him the verdict, and placing the pursuer in the situation of struggling against the verdict. I probably might not entertain this feeling so strongly, if the exceptions were not to my own charge; and perhaps the desire I have that a party should be able directly to encounter any error I committed, if error there was, leads me to distrust this reply more than I might in other cases.

This is very clear, that the reply would be unsatisfactory and insufficient (so far as I at present see), under a general verdict. To admit and give effect to this reply, I think you must have certainty as to the exact view which the jury took. It would not in my mind be satisfactory to indulge in conjectures as to the view the jury took upon a point incorrectly left to them by the Court, and on which they ought to have received direction in point of law from the Court. The function of the jury is not to decide law. One cannot tell, under a general verdict, whether they considered the point at all. One cannot tell what difference a direction in point of law might have made in their view of the facts, and in their general conclusion upon the whole case. In short, there could be no certainty under a general verdict.

Aware of this, and desirous that if I was wrong in leaving to the jury the matters on which I required their opinion, I put to them the propriety, if they were generally in favour of the pursuers, of considering and answering the three questions stated at the close of the charge, and I framed these so as to exhaust these points which were argued to be matters of law for the Court. The jury, whose opinion was in favour of the pursuers, took that course, and have specially found—"that by the description in the said specification, the patentee did not refer to any particular form or shape, or mode of constructing the air vessel or vessels, or receptacle or receptacles, in which the air under blast is to be heated; and farther find, that, by the use of the term "effect" in the specification, the patentee did not state that the form and shape of the air vessel or vessels were immaterial for the purpose of heating the air in such vessel or vessels; and further find, that the terms of the specification respecting the air vessels or receptacles, and the size and numbers thereof, are not such as to mislead persons acquainted with the process of heating air, so as to direct and cause them to construct the vessels in a form or manner contrary to the ordinary and necessary rules to be attended to in heating air passed into vessels for the purpose of being heated under the progress of the blast; and they assess the damages at £3060." There is thus perfect certainty as to what the jury did upon the points on which they were left to form their own opinion. No objection was stated to the terms of the questions, nor have the defenders shown in answer to the view opened very powerfully by Mr Inglis, that there is any matter in the specification left to the jury, but which the Judge ought to have decided, which is not included under these special findings.

The pursuers then certainly have been enabled in this case to put the point to the Court:—"Here is a verdict with these matters declared upon as to the specification. Is there error in that verdict? It is said, you, the Court, are to construe the specification. Do so. Do you differ from the jury? Are the jury wrong upon those matters, which by the error of the Judge (and the argument assumes error at the trial) was left to them? Can you sustain the meaning given to the specification by the 6th and 8th exceptions? If not, are you prepared to declare the construction only in conformity with the verdict, and then to end by setting aside the verdict."

I have arrived at the conclusion that this plea must be sustained; but I acknowledge with considerable distrust, and with no friendly feeling to the plea. There is no greater error in jury trial, I mean none that may produce greater miscarriage, than leaving to the jury, matters that are for the Court for direction in point of law. That is an error in the whole trial. It goes to the foundation of what was done. It gives the jury a function and a duty which in law they have not, and for the discharge of which they were in point of fact incompetent. Their conclusion then, in point of law, if right, must be held to be so by accident, and the exception taken is, that the jury, who were incompetent to judge of the matter, were left to form their own notions when it was purely a question of law on which the Court ought to have decided; and further, on which the party was entitled to have the opinion of the individual Judge who tried the case, so as to obtain the verdict whether the Court might agree with him or not. In most cases this view is conclusive, and it will not often happen that the reply I am now adverting to can be sustained.

It is necessary in the first place, that the Court should hold that the party was bound to state the law which he required the Judge to lay down. Now there are many cases in which a point may be improperly left to the jury, in which the party is not bound to state what law the Judge should state; and I have considerable doubt whether the defender was called upon to do so at this trial. Observe :—The Judge left the questions stated on the specification (whether limited or not, and the meaning of the term "effect") to the jury. Now, the complaint is, that the Judge did not himself construe the specification and state its meaning. It is not a necessary part of the objection "you leave the jury to consider the specification, while it is matter of construction in point of law, and you ought to state your own opinion," to add what the party holds to be the meaning of it, and its true construction. The error of the Judge is, that he does not himself construe and state his own opinion. His error is in leaving it to the jury. Now, at that stage, I am not satisfied that I could at the trial have called on the defender to say what construction I should have put upon the specification. The defender could not decide for the Judge, whether the latter would construe it or not. He was to form his own opinion upon that point. The defender said, my point is, that you ought to construe. I have a right to have your opinion. I think and expect you to go right. If you go wrong I will except. But the verdict, so far as dependent upon this point of law, must be on your responsibility and opinion. You are wrong in leaving it to the jury. It is matter of law. You ought to construe and state your opinion.

Now, to enable the Judge to consider and decide that question—(whether he was to give his opinion on the import of the specification as a direction in point of law),—it does not signify what view the defender took of the specification as matter of construction, nor what view the Judge himself took. The point of difference is :—Is the question for the jury or for the Court? who is to declare whether the specification is limited to one form of apparatus, and in what meaning and sense the term "effect" is used? Now, is not the Judge first to decide whether the point is for him, or is a question for the jury? He leaves the matter to the jury as a question for them. Then the defender says, "there is the error. I had a right to the opinion of the Judge. The cause was not well tried without that opinion. The verdict should have been on his opinion. Until he stated his opinion I am called upon to do no more. I have no law to state, except that the Judge should have construed and stated his opinion."

To this extent I cannot get over the difficulties attending the reply which the pursuers make, and hence I have the greater difficulty in ultimately sustaining that reply. But after verdict there is a great difference in the shape in which a cause is placed.

In the first place, the charge in this case placed the jury and the defenders in a particular situation, for I asked them specially to find the meaning of the specification on certain points, if they agreed with the pursuer's views of the specification. Hence, I not only left the question to the jury, but special questions for them, and I think, therefore, that the pursuer could not avoid stating that he considered, in point of law, the construction to be different from that stated in these questions.

But farther, though the exception is taken at the trial, the bill is not prepared till after verdict. Now, could the defenders have prepared the bill of exceptions with the special findings in this verdict, without exceptions which declared the verdict to be wrong in point of law?

After verdict, the question as to what either the Judge or the jury did after the trial, is really material only in regard to the ultimate result of the verdict,—when that verdict is distinct, full, and special, so that the Court can judge of the result. Of course, I am not representing the distinctions between the functions of the Judge and the jury, as not most material to the conduct of jury trial in general, or underrating the necessity of the Judge taking the full responsibility of all directions in point of law. I allude only to alleged error in the individual case. Now the verdict, which is the object and the conclusion of the trial, is the result of the joint duties and consideration of Judge and jury. Both meet, and are brought together to produce that result. The verdict is distinct, and declares the meaning of the specification. If the Judge had thought it to be expedient,—and in this case I should, after what has taken place in England,—he might have directed the jury, in point of law, not only as to what was his own opinion on the specification, but directed the jury specially to find what was the meaning of the specification in terms of his opinion. If I had not left the matter to the jury, I would have done so, in order that the question as to the patent might be matter of record upon the face of the verdict. Now, that would have been perfectly competent for the Judge. He thinks a point is matter of law, and gives his direction. But he also sees that it is very material that it should distinctly appear that the jury proceed upon this ground. He sees that they might arrive at the same result upon other ground, and hence, that neither in a motion for a new trial, nor in a bill of exceptions, would there be certainty as to the ground on which the jury proceeded, and so he directs the jury to find specially in terms of his direction. Probably this is the only course that will satisfactorily raise points for the Court under issues respecting stake-nets.

Now, if I had thought the points contained in the 5th and 7th exceptions were matters for the Court, I would have directed them to find in terms, no doubt, of the direction, but to find the very matters contained in the verdict :—For my own opinion was coincident with the verdict. Now then, here is a verdict which is the result of a trial before a Judge and a jury. The verdict is special. An error is said to have been committed by the Judge, in leaving the matter so specially found, to the jury. Then was the defender, in the bill of exceptions, not bound to state his pleas in law upon those points specially found by the verdict, in order to allege error in the verdict, and to be entitled to set it aside? I think he was. The reason for excepting to what was done by the Judge as erroneous—the title of the party to insist in his exception—is the verdict returned. To get rid of that verdict is the party's interest. But if the verdict is special, is the Court not to consider if the verdict is right or wrong in what is so specially found? Well then, if in considering the pleas which assign error, and contain the exceptor's law, the Court are of opinion that they are ill founded, and if taking the specification and the verdict they could only declare and find upon the former, as a direction for another trial, the very declarations as to the meaning of the specification which are contained in the verdict, is it enough to set aside the latter, or reasonable or warrantable ground for producing another trial, that the jury, left to themselves no doubt by an error of the Judge, have ended in the very conclusion which the Court arrive at in considering the verdict.

If the Court, with the special declaration in the verdict, are satisfied that the jury have construed the specification rightly, the Court is bound to presume that the Judge, a fortiori, would have construed the specification rightly also, and to the same effect, if he had himself done that. Then, why allow the error in leaving the matter to the jury, to overturn the verdict, when the law required by the defenders cannot be sustained, and when the findings of the jury, being in truth on matters of law, are found to be right in point of law?

Taking then this as a special case, I am of opinion that the reply must be sustained, because I am also further of opinion, that the 6th and 8th exceptions are not maintainable, if they are matters for the Court, and am very decidedly of opinion that the declarations as to the description and terms of the specification contained in the verdict are well founded in the substance and in the terms of the specification, if the Court is to declare the same.

It is contended, however, that this mode of dealing with a bill of exceptions is inconsistent with the Statute; and that if any one exception is well founded, there must be a new trial. Now, this is not a correct reading of the Statute.

In the first place, I do not think, that in Scotland we are called upon to admit the great difference which seems to exist in England between the grounds of disposing of motions for new trials and bills of exceptions. Both are introduced with us by Statute. Both stand on the same footing. The Court is not restrained in judging of the one more than of the other. The nature of the two proceedings imply, it is true, the discharge of very different duties in several particulars by the Court. But in considering whether an exception is to be sustained, I cannot find sufficient warrant in the Statute for holding that the Court is entitled to disregard the reply which the pursuers have here made, founded upon the terms of the verdict, which gives the defenders their only title and interest to insist in their exceptions, and founded upon other exceptions, inseparable, in the determination of the matter, from the 5th and 7th. The defenders have put the points in the form of separate exceptions. But the Court is not bound so to treat them, and give him the technical benefit of saying that the 5th and 7th must be judged of by themselves, and sustained if well founded, without reference to their bearing and effect upon the verdict in point of error, and without reference to the other exceptions, the 7th and 8th, if the latter are not tenable. The fact, that the defender splits his case into exceptions 5, 6, 7 and 8, cannot constrain the Court to do what is against law and justice, or prevent the Court from considering whether (say) the 5th and 6th are not substantially but one exception. The Court are entitled to look to the effect of the alleged error upon the verdict; and if they find upon the face of the verdict that the result, in point of law, is right, it would be a very strange construction of the Statute which requires the Court to set aside the verdict which, upon the face of it, is right in point of law. I think the exceptions come to be what are termed insensible, if they do not lead to the end of showing the verdict—the actual result of the trial—to be wrong in point of law. I have considered this point without reference to the effect of 7 Will. IV., c. 14,—for I must acknowledge that I do not exactly perceive the object or meaning of that Statute,—nor am I aware of the doubts which it is therein said existed as to the former Statutes. But, certainly, this subsequent Act, 7 Will. IV., c. 14, seems at least to support the view on which the Court is proceeding.

If such is the view we are entitled and bound to act upon under our Statutes, then certainly there are numerous cases in England, in motions for new trials, in which a similar reply has been sustained to complaints made of what was done at the trial. But I rather take a case as to a bill of exceptions. I admit there is scarcely any case, so far as one from books can ascertain English views as to bills of exceptions, which afford authority in support of the pursuer's plea. But there is one which seems to be a very direct and weighty precedent. I allude to the case of Vines v. Corporation of Reading, 1 Young and Jervis, p. 4. The nature of the case was in substance this: The Judge at the trial, and after the whole case for both parties was concluded, delivered his opinion, that the evidence of the pursuer was insufficient in point of law to maintain the pursuer's case, and directed the jury accordingly to find for the defenders. The Court, upon considering the bill of exceptions, which set forth the whole evidence, thought the Judge was wrong, and that the pursuer's evidence was sufficient, in point of law, to maintain his case. Had this been the only matter then which appeared on the face of the bill of exceptions, there must have been a new trial, according to the opinion of the Court. But in the defenders' evidence, the Court found a sufficient plea in bar of the pursuer's claim,—in other words, what would have been raised as the subject of a counter issue with us, and which was made out so as to sustain, in point of law, that counter issue, or bar to the pursuer's verdict. Taking that view of the defenders' case, the verdict came to be a right verdict in point of law, although the direction of the Judge at the trial, that the evidence of the pursuer was insufficient in law to maintain his case, appeared to the Court to be erroneous. As there was then no error in the verdict, in point of law—as the Court must have declared the law of the case in terms which would lead, in point of law, to the very same verdict which was pronounced, the Court disallowed the bill of exceptions, and so sustained the verdict. Now this was a stronger case than the present;—for, 1. The verdict was general. 2. The Court took up the matter themselves, as arising out of the defenders' case, as stated on the face of the bill—whereas the corresponding point here is forced upon us, not only by the terms of the special findings in the verdict, but also by the exceptions stated in the bill, which call upon the Court to consider the law which it is said the Judge ought to have laid down. This case then seems, a fortiori, to warrant us in holding, that if the exceptor's law is wrong, and if the law of the case (assuming the points to be matters of law,) would lead to the very verdict returned, we are not bound to sustain an exception in order to set aside a verdict which is right in point of law. If I understand this English case rightly, it is a satisfactory confirmation of the view which we take of this matter. But I wish to add, that I cannot admit that we are at all restrained by English rules or practice as to bills of exception, so as to prevent us taking a course which seems to be agreeable to principle and to the justice and law of the case in its ultimate result.

Without referring to, or depending upon English authority. I do not think that the pursuer's reply is excluded by the terms of our Statute.

But I cannot rest my opinion upon this reply alone,—1st, because the point is new, difficult, and of very delicate application; and 2d, because I have a much more clear and decided opinion upon the points raised by the 5th and 7th exceptions, and involved, perhaps, in some others. Indeed, there is no point on which I have a more deep-rooted opinion than that the questions left at the trial for the jury were according to principle, to reason, and common sense, and, with a due regard to the only mode of obtaining a satisfactory result, questions for the jury; and further, that they were made questions for the jury under the issues in this cause.

I think this is a matter of the deepest importance. It goes to the mode of dealing with every patent. It enters into the construction and object of the issues. It affects every trial, and it must decide whether the meaning of a paper intended to form directions to practical men on matters of the arts and manufactures, is to be judged of by the Court, who, I think are unfit to form that opinion in the first instance, or by juries taken from the very classes of men to whom the specifications are addressed, with the aid of the evidence of workmen and men of skill conversant with the subject to which the specification relates. What is the nature of the paper or instrument termed the specification? It is not a document forming a contract, or relating to any legal right or interest. It is practical instructions directed to practical men, relating to the construction of apparatus, mechanical contrivances, the combinations of principles with such contrivances, and intended to enable practical men, after the expiration of the privilege, to do and perform what the patentee has been doing and performing. It is a record or preservation of what he does, so that when his exclusive right expires, all may be on an equal footing with him, and equally able to do easily from his description what he was doing.

The whole of the specification is addressed to practical men. The 5th exception says, that there are no terms of art involved. How can the Court know that, or safely affirm that in the abstract, as to a document intended entirely for practical direction. Even where, in a proper contract between the parties, terms are employed which appear not to be terms of art, there is great risk of error if the Court take the construction upon themselves, when it is avowed that they are understood in a sense different from the construction the Court might put upon them,—of which a good illustration occurred in an English case, Clayton v. Gregson, 6th Nev. and M. 694, to which I beg the special attention of counsel. But there is no question here of particular expressions and terms in a document which, in itself, might fairly be brought before the Court for construction. The whole of the specification is matter of direction to workmen and men of skill in particular trades. The true question is, how are they to understand, not merely parts, but the whole of the directions? Nothing could be so hazardous as the Court taking upon itself to construe such a document, upon the notion that there are no terms of art involved. For instance, looking to this specification, nothing appears so general, or so easy for the Court to construe, as the term "air vessel or receptacle;" yet the defender endeavoured to make out, that in the understanding of practical men, that was a distinct term of art which had received a fixed meaning. Mr Hawthorn, p. 86-7, held air vessel to mean and to be descriptive only of a cylinder, because in his particular trade, he says, air vessel has received that special meaning. Mr Cottam, p. 72, held cubical contents necessarily to imply that the vessel was to be of cubical form. And if the evidence had been clear and satisfactory upon such points, it surely would have been a question for the jury, whether such notions were not necessarily involved in the directions contained in the specification.

In the next place, let us consider the issues here.

Under pursuer's:—Who is to consider the description in the specification in order to answer this question but the jury? It is admitted that they must judge of the identity or the variance, and whether the variance is substantial, or to the effect set forth in the specification. Then, must they not form their own view of the description in the specification, and of the effect to be attained? How could there be any certainty if the Court were to construe, and the jury desired to inquire whether a thing was substantially the same, not with the view existing in their own minds, but with the view of apparatus stated by the Court, and as to which every one of the twelve jurymen might form a different idea? But if it is plain that they must consider the specification, and form their own opinions to the full extent of answering this issue, I apprehend that involves the consideration of the whole specification, so far as involved in this trial, and that consistently the Court cannot say that other similar questions on the specification are not to be decided by the jury. Else what might be the result? The jury might form their own view under this issue, and then be directed to take just an opposite view upon the other questions in the specification.

Then take the counter issues. How can they answer the first, without forming their own opinion as to what is described, and what has been previously used, and comparing the thing previously used with the thing described?

Again, take the second. Must they not consider whether workmen so read it, that they would not know how to act upon it, and could not find any directions for any apparatus whatever? Or, on the other hand, both as to this issue and the pursuer's, is the jury not to consider whether it is so understood by workmen that it is limited exclusively to one sort of apparatus, and therefore inapplicable to any other, and that workmen judging of, and acting on the specification, would produce no other contrivance but one, and that substantially different from the defender's apparatus, as in model No. 7?

Again, how could the third be answered upon the evidence, without the jury forming their own opinion of what is the description by which the apparatus is to be constructed? Again, take the 7th exception. I apprehend that is clearly a practical point for the jury.

I am of opinion that all the points that were left to the jury, and I should say generally the sufficiency of the specification, so far as involved in this trial (though there may be at times a question raised upon generality for the Court), are matters for the jury in all cases, and specially under these issues, to the extent of all matters involved in these issues, and which arose at this trial.

I confess I am satisfied that this was held to be a clear point in both of the recent cases in the Common Pleas, which I have referred to. But having gone over almost every case which has been tried, I find innumerable authorities quite conclusive upon this matter.

We have been much pressed with a passage in the judgment delivered by Mr Baron Parke on the part of the Court in the case tried upon this patent, Neilson v. Harford, and which was fully considered by the English Court of Exchequer. The passage is at p. 263 of the report, and is in the following terms:—"Then we come to the question itself, which depends on the proper construction to be put on the specification itself. It was contended, that of this construction the jury were to judge. We are clearly of a different opinion. The construction of all written instruments belongs to the Court alone, whose duty it is to construe all written instruments as soon as the true meaning of the words in which they are couched, and the surrounding circumstances, if any, have been ascertained as facts by the jury, and it is the duty of the jury to take the construction from the Court, either absolutely, if there be no words to be construed, as words of art, or phrases used in common, and no surrounding circumstances to be ascertained, or conditionally, where those words or circumstances are necessarily referred to therein." This passage is pressed upon us as a deliberate opinion, that the points raised on the specification at the trial before me were points of law exclusively for the Court. I must look to this judgment with great respect. But I am bound to form my own opinion, and I must look to the proposition that is here given to us as distinct and practical law, and consider its meaning and value as so stated. I own that I am not able to put any sensible meaning upon this passage which could be practically acted upon at a trial, if it points to any other course than that which I followed. I requested, during this discussion, the opening counsel for the defenders to state how this opinion could be acted upon at a trial, but neither he nor the Solicitor-General gave me any information. The Court, in the English case, having a point reserved, had the whole matter, law and fact, fully before them for consideration, and I cannot help thinking that the separate functions of Judge and jury were not distinctly attended to in the use of the terms employed in this passage.

Observe:—It is said that the Court is to construe written instruments "as soon as the true meaning of the words in which they are couched, and the surrounding circumstances, if any, have been ascertained as facts by the jury." Now this, I own, I do not very well understand, if the jury are not to judge of the meaning of the specification. If the jury is to ascertain the meaning of the words, then that was what I left to the jury, and what thereafter remains for the Court I do not know. Farther, when the Court is to construe, I apprehend that is a case in which nothing is left to the jury. Besides, how could this be acted upon at a trial? The Judge would have, first, to state certain questions to the jury as to the meaning of the words,—then, to deliver back to the jury his construction, founded upon their answers as matters of fact,—and thirdly, to require their verdict. But how can two parties so work together, as to the meaning of the specification? The answers by the jury, the Judge must hold to be conclusive, but they may be utterly at variance with the Judge's decided opinion upon the meaning of the specification. Nay, with these answers, he may not be able to make sense of the specification, while, on the other hand, but for that disturbance to his own views, he has a very clear view of the whole specification.

Again, how could you in such a process accurately separate the functions of Judge and jury, or be sure that the jury kept themselves clear of the Court, and the Court of the jury? Let any person try to act upon this sentence as to this particular specification, and say what sort of questions he would frame as to the meaning of the words, which could at the same time leave the construction of the specification as wholly matter of law for the Court.

I know there are cases,—The English case of Clayton v. Gregson is an instance in which particular words may occur in an instrument, which require to be explained by evidence, and may be submitted to a jury. But the judgment referred to is not given in a case of this description, for it applies directly to questions raised upon the meaning and import of the whole specification; and, curiously enough, the Court held the meaning of the only particular word,—viz., "effect,"—upon which any question is raised separately, to be matter for the Court, and not for the jury. Hence the judgment refers generally to the whole meaning of the specification, and of the description therein contained.

When the passage thus is pressed upon us as an authority, I must fairly own that I cannot subscribe to it as sound in principle, or as precise and distinct in expression, so as to convey to my mind any definite rule to be acted upon in a trial in regard to this specification.

It is very remarkable, that in not one patent case is there any appearance of a similar doctrine.

I lay aside, of course, all cases in England on motions for new trials, and in the consideration of questions raised after verdict, and so forth; for the Court in such cases have the full right to review the opinion formed by the jury upon evidence at the trial; and I also lay aside opinions given in the equity courts upon injunctions, where the court may be called upon to construe for itself, but in which, wherever there is doubt, they send the matter to a jury. Among other authorities, I may refer to the following: See Davis's Cases, p. 45. Charge of Lord Loughborough, p. 56. In Arkwright's case—of BUTLER, 105-128, in the second case on that patent. In Boulton and Watt v. Bull, the questions arose on a special case. Hence there is no inference, that if the trial had not taken that turn, the sufficiency of the specification would not have been for the jury, but the jury found certain things in regard to the specification,—then as to the opinions of the Court respecting these findings, see Roake, I. p. 183-5. Ch. Justice Eyre, 215. See also opinion of Kenyon, 224, in Hornblower v. Watt; of Ashhurst, 225; Grose, 228. See Lord Ellenborough, in Huddart, 285-87; Ch. J. Gibbs, p. 400, in Boswill and Moore. I might add many other authorities.

I think the matter comes to a very short issue. Is evidence competent in order to ascertain the sense in which alone the specification can be understood by those to whom it has been addressed? That never has been doubted. Then, if so, the question is matter of evidence for the jury. The defenders so treated this case. I am quite aware that there are many cases in which, when the evidence is led, there may be points on which the Court is to be aided by evidence in its own construction of an instrument, still keeping the construction in its own hands. But on the other hand, when the question is raised as to the meaning and understanding of the whole specification, as to the result that it will produce in working upon it, as to the sense in which practical men will be directed towards the object intended, or to wrong objects,—whether the real effect is truly described by intelligible and distinct terms in the specification, and the means of attaining that effect distinctly and sufficiently described. In short, when the meaning of the whole specification must be judged of in order to know whether it will be easily and satisfactorily understood by practical men together, I know of no ground on which that matter can be taken from the jury.

Upon the remaining points in the cause I shall say little. The parts of the charge to which the 9th and 10th exceptions relate, state the points in favour of the patentee, undoubtedly in very general terms; but if his patent is a good patent, I think it implies and requires law to the extent there stated. But of course, these passages are to be taken,—1st, In connection with the context: 2d, In reference to this particular patent, or one similar; and, 3d, With special reference to the limitation stated at the close of each of these passages. The sentences quoted from Baron Parke's charge show, that though he thought the patent too vague, yet, when putting to the jury the matter of infringement, he gives the patentee the benefit of the same law. The limitation at the end of the 10th exception makes the law sufficiently safe, and I do not see how this patent can be sustained at all without requiring directions to the full extent of the passages excepted to in the 9th and 10th exceptions, when the jury are considering the question of infringement.

On the 11th exception I have nothing to add. The defender's argument plainly confounded novelty and prior use.

On the 12th and 13th I retain my opinion, that, for the objects of this patent, it was not essential either that the patentee should describe existing contrivances for protecting the mouth of the furnace or the end of the pipe from being injured by the heat, or should invent better contrivances than those in use for these purposes. If, indeed, it had been proved that the invention was utterly useless, and that no benefit whatever could be obtained, such as the specification set forth, until a new water-twyre had been invented, there might have been more difficulty on this point. But the old water-twyre was well known—was used for several years in Scotland after the hot blast was applied, and, moreover, is still the only water-twyre generally in use in England, or at least in much use in England.

On the 1st exception I have nothing to add to what Lord Medwyn has stated. Holding the section of the Act of Parliament in question to apply generally to Scotland, so far that there must be notice which satisfies the terms of that clause, it is plain that it was not meant to affect the forms or principles of Scotch pleadings. Our system of pleading previously required everything to be stated which the provision in the Statute introduced for England. The question, then, is wholly a matter of Scotch pleading, and I concur with your Lordships, that, according to our settled practice, it is necessary in such a case that the prior use at particular places, and by particular persons, shall be so stated, that the pursuer may be able to meet distinctly the particular use by individuals in which his invention is said to be traced.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of opinion that none of the exceptions can be sustained.

In general, it appears to me that there is one fallacy which runs through a considerable number of these thirteen exceptions, and the greater part of all the reasoning on the subject. And, indeed, the Solicitor-General, in his speech, in reality reduced the main controversy to the question, whether that which I think a fallacy is not the true state of the case.

That assumption is, that the essential point of what Neilson claims as his invention, is a mode of heating air in a vessel.

But, in my apprehension, this is refusing to look at what the invention claimed really is, and laying hold of a circumstance collaterally connected with it, as if it were the thing itself; to have claimed which, as the essence of the patent, would have rendered it no patent at all.

The second exception brings out the point. The defenders except, "in so far as his Lordship did direct the jury that the patentee did not claim, as any part of his invention, or profess to describe any mode of heating the air under blast in a vessel, or any particular form or dimensions of the vessel or vessels to be employed for that purpose."

To me it appears that the defenders here complain of the direction, because the Judge told the jury what the claim by the letters-patent and the specification plainly is, and because he told them that it was not that which the patentee entirely disowns, but which the defenders themselves wish to represent it to be, for the manifest purpose of destroying it altogether.

When we go to the part of the charge on which the exception is founded, pp. 108-9-10, and compare it with the letters-patent and the specification, I think I find in it only a very clear exposition of the nature and principle of the invention, and of the mode of carrying it into practical operation, under such safeguards as were essentially necessary to protect it against immediate piratical invasion.

The title of the patent is—"An invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required." Here there is not a word about a mode of heating air IN A VESSEL. It is not the thing enunciated, which is simply "for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces," &c. The specification is in perfect accordance with this, p. 10. The invention "consists in introducing into, and applying to the fires, forges and furnaces, atmospheric air in the following manner." No doubt there is a mode or manner, not of heating the air in a vessel, but of applying or introducing the air to fires, forges, &c. That manner is described, and, in one word, it consists in passing the air through a vessel or receptacle placed between the blast and the furnace—which vessel must be air-tight, except in the necessary apertures; "and at the commencement, and during the continuance of the blast, it must be kept artificially heated in a considerable temperature."

There is not any doubt, that, at the bottom of the invention, there is the principle, that a blast of hot air will produce more heat in a furnace than a blast of cold air. But it is not for this principle simply that the patent is taken, but for the principle carried into practical use, by a mode of operation or mechanical process laid down. After the principle was obtained, the difficulty was to find a practicable mode of applying it. The extent of this difficulty is explained in the evidence—Jessop, 58, 59—and the precise mode of overcoming it by this patent. "The heating the air between blowing apparatus and furnace is a mechanical contrivance to attain end, which, if placed elsewhere, would not answer." See also Profr. Forbes, p. 31.

Such being the principle, and the mode of application, the very term used in the specification, that the interposed vessel must be kept "artificially heated" during the blast, would necessarily imply that the invention claimed does in no degree consist in any particular mode of heating such a vessel. But it is in express words declared, that "the manner of applying the heat to the air vessel is immaterial to the effect, if it be kept at a proper temperature."

In like manner, the description given of the air vessel necessarily imports, that it is not a vessel of any particular form, size, or material, that is required or prescribed, provided only that it is capable of receiving the air under blast, according to the quantity or extent required, and capable of being "kept artificially heated in a considerable temperature." But it is in like manner expressly declared, that those particular qualities of the vessel—the form, shape, size, or material—are "immaterial to the effect, and may be adapted to the local circumstances and situation." That is, any such particular form, &c., is expressly disclaimed as part of the invention.

The specification being thus perfectly clear and explicit in these points, how can we possibly say that the direction is wrong, which simply tells the jury, as a matter of law, that which is self-evident on the face of the specification? That the patentee did not claim as any part of his invention, or profess to describe any mode of heating the air under blast in a vessel, or any particular form or dimensions of the vessel or vessels to be employed for that purpose. Whatever may be the effect of it otherwise, I think it impossible that any other direction could have been given.

What, in reality, the defenders complain of is, that the pursuer, very vexatiously for them, has not claimed, and will not claim, as essential to his invention, what would at once render the patent nugatory, by laying it open to the easiest means of violation. For, as there are very many ways of heating such a vessel, well known to all men of ordinary skill; and as there may be very many forms of such vessels which will equally answer the purpose, according to circumstances, as the specification plainly declares, it is evident, that to have made any one mode of heating, or any one form of vessel, an essential part of the mechanical contrivance claimed in the invention, would have enabled any one the moment the real invention was disclosed, by simply adopting some variety in these points, to set the patentee at complete defiance. And yet, whatever construction of apparatus were adopted, the end could never be attained without beginning by appropriating the real contrivance of this patent, by applying heat in some manner to a vessel of some form, placed between the blast and the furnace, in which the air might be heated in the blast, and thence passed into the furnace.

I am therefore of opinion that the 2d exception is altogether groundless, and that any different or opposite direction from that given would have been entirely erroneous.

3d Exception.—That, upon such view of the nature and extent of the claim, the Judge directed in point of law, that the patent was valid, and did not direct that it was invalid.

This is founded on certain passages of the charge, pp. 112, 113—118-119.

1. The defenders are here met by a preliminary objection of great importance,—that there is no question of general invalidity, or of invalidity in respect of the vagueness or generality of the specification, raised by the issues.

I agree in the opinions delivered, that this is a question of great importance to the law, and the course of pleading in such cases. In the record there was a general averment, (p. 11,) that the “patent is invalid on account of the general vagueness of the specification.” But even this was connected with the statement, that it was not accompanied with drawings and models, and was “in itself insufficient to describe the alleged invention, or to enable workmen of competent skill to construct the necessary apparatus,” &c. But when the parties came to adjust the issues, while the pursuer’s issue was simply on infringement, the defenders took specific issues, directed against the validity of the patent, on precise and definite grounds. But they took none on the ground of vagueness or generality in the specification. And this is the more remarkable, because the matter of the second of the counter issues is taken from the same article of the defender’s statement on record, which he had introduced by an averment of invalidity on the vagueness of the specification. That is entirely left out in the issues. I apprehend that the defenders were under the necessity of taking these counter issues in regard to the specific averments of invalidity to which they relate, as held in the first case of Russel v. Crichton, 19th June 1838. But, at any rate, they did take them; and after doing so, they never can be allowed to plead under the pursuer’s issue any ground of invalidity, which they plainly abandoned by asking no issues upon it. Read every word of all these issues, and it is impossible to find in any of them any thing which can be twisted into the plea of invalidity put into this exception.

Very remarkably, this point arose also in the second case of Russel v. Crichton, 8th June 1839, in the trial of a bill of exceptions. The party had an issue on the averment that the invention claimed was not original. But at the trial he attempted to raise a new plea of invalidity, on the ground that the specification was too sweeping and comprehensive. The Lord President directed the jury that the patent was good. But in discussing a bill of exceptions, Lord Gillies said—“It appears to me that this point is not duly raised under the issues, and is thereby excluded.” Lord Mackenzie had not so much confidence in the objection; because he thought that, by a certain construction of the issue on want of originality, as, applied to the plea attempted to be brought in, it might possibly be held that the matter of embracing both new and old might be held to be within the issue against the novelty of the invention. But the principle of Lord Gillies’s objection was not doubted; and the Court, being in general clear that the exception was not well founded on the merits, did not enter farther into the point. I think this perhaps unfortunate; and thinking the point very clear in the present case, with no such difficulty as that which occurred to Lord Mackenzie in the construction in that case, I am of opinion that we should not hesitate to declare the point of law in the present case.

If we are to look to English authorities, as I think we certainly may in such a question, the cases to which I have been referred, Walton v. Potter, &c., Com. Pl., Law Journal, Vol. XI. p. 138, and Gibson and Campbell v. Brand, ib. p. 177, &c., appear to be very decisive of the point. It is clear to me, though I speak with great distrust of my own judgment, that the issues in those cases (I speak of Walton particularly), were in their substance the same which were put to trial in the present case. Their forms of pleading are not the same with ours; and therefore I speak with great fear of mistake. But as I understand the matter, the first plea of the defendants corresponds precisely to the plea of general denial of our first issue, viz.,—not guilty: Then the counter pleas are to be collected from the pleadings; and as I read them, they amounted precisely to pleas of disprove,—1. the novelty—2. the workableness—and 3. the public benefit of the invention claimed. If I take a right view of the issues joined, the case is identical with the present in the point in controversy. But, under these issues, an attempt was made to require the Judge to direct the jury that the patent was invalid, on the ground of a defect in the specifications, to which defect no allusion was made in the issues. The Court held (Tindal, &c.) that there was “no issue upon the record to raise the question before the jury, whether this was a fit subject for a patent?” The other case of Gibson, &c., bears very strongly to the same point.

Independently of any authority, I think it of great importance that pleas should not be allowed to be raised, after issue joined on specific questions, which cannot reasonably be expected by the adverse party, under those issues which have been thought sufficient for the trial of the case. And on this whole matter, I am of opinion that the plea of invalidity, through vagueness in the specification, is not at all admissible under the issues in this case.

But as it has happened in other cases, I am here of opinion that, supposing the objection of invalidity to be perfectly admissible, it is altogether groundless. The whole plea for invalidity proceeds on the same fallacy which I think runs through all the case of the defenders. It is, in my apprehension, a mere misrepresentation of the specification to say, that because it does not claim a specific mode of heating air, or a specific form of the vessel, it does not claim any mode of carrying the principle of the patent into operation. The simple explanation has been already given. It is not in the mode of heating the air vessel, but in the mode of intercepting the air in blast between the blast and the furnace, that the nature of the invention consists. And therefore, though it may be perfectly true that that essential point in which the invention consists, admits of many varieties in the modes of heating and the forms of the vessel, it cannot be maintained, on any sound principles, that that shall destroy the validity of the patent as long as it is clear that there is a principle discovered, and a mechanical process for carrying that principle into operation pointed out. I think that the whole plea is groundless on its merits.

The 4th exception stands on a footing with the 3d in regard to its competency under the issues. There is no issue under which it could competently have been found, that the specification was insufficient, in respect of its not having given a sufficiently particular description of the nature of the invention. The defenders have totally failed to show that, under any one of the issues, there is any such question raised. And it is really a matter of no small importance in the pleadings in such cases, that, after a trial has taken place on issues very carefully and deliberately settled, parties should not be permitted to raise new questions, originating in the chances of a trial, and the desire of avoiding final judgment on the case.

It is certainly of the less consequence how the preliminary objection to the competency of this plea may be disposed of, that the plea itself seems to have no solid foundation: I must regard it as a very clear matter, that taking the plea to be fully before the Court and the jury, it is altogether unmaintainable. When the true nature of the invention claimed is rightly understood and fairly stated, there can, in my opinion, be no doubt that that nature of it is particularly described, and that the specification does sufficiently describe the manner in which the essential process is to be performed, to comply with the condition of the patent. In what respect this question of sufficiency is a question for the jury, is a different matter, belonging to the next issue. But in so far as it is strictly a matter of law, I am of opinion that there is no colour or ground of objection to the sufficiency of the specification, when it is considered with reference to the true nature of the patent.

The objection to the verdict raised under the 5th exception is important in itself, and is rendered more so by the views of your Lordships. I do not entirely concur in either of the opinions delivered. For I am, first of all, of opinion, that the exception is not well founded on its merits; and supposing it were otherwise, I think the pleas brought forward for obviating it very clearly well founded, and do not feel all the difficulties in those points which have occurred to your Lordship. Your Lordship has so fully, and to my mind, so satisfactorily discussed the question as to the correctness of the charge excepted from, that I do not think it necessary to go into that matter so fully as I might otherwise have done. But it appears to me, that with special reference to this case, and the point of it to which the part of the charge excepted from relates, there can be little doubt that the direction was sound in law. I prefer considering the point in that view first.

I think it right to observe, however, that I do not mean to lay down abstract points of law in a branch of law not of daily practice in this country, but confine myself to the law which I think properly applicable to this case, and to the view which I take of the particular direction which is here excepted from.

The exception is thus expressed:—"In so far as the said Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that it was a question on the intelligibility of the patent, and for them, whether the specification contains a special, limited, and restricted description by which the inventor so described one sort of apparatus, that he cannot maintain that his patent is one which applies to all varieties in the apparatus which may be employed in the heating of air while under blast, and did leave that question on the evidence to the jury, and did not direct that the meaning of the specification on a matter not involving words of art, is matter of law for direction by the Court." This picks up some of the terms employed by the Judge. But I apprehend that, in order to judge fairly of the import of the charge, the sentence must be read in its whole connection, and particularly with reference to the direction in law delivered immediately before it.

It will be observed, then, that the passage occurs immediately after the law had been laid down, which forms the subject of the 2d exception, concerning the nature and extent of the claim of the patentee. And that law must be taken along with the statement which follows it. The charge goes on:—"But within," &c., p. 114, &c. What is the fair meaning of this? After having maintained, in point of law, that under this specification, Mr Neilson does claim the mode of heating the air and the form of the vessel as essential to his patent, and that, if he does not, his patent is void for generality, the defenders farther maintain, as now expressed in the 6th exception, but expressed as much as possible to give it the appearance of pure law, what is substantially this, that in the practical meaning and application of his specification, he is confined to one mode of heating and one form of vessel, so that practical men, working on that specification in order to attain the end, could construct only one form of apparatus; and consequently, that any other would be no infringement of the patent. Either this is the nature of the plea, or it is simply a repetition of the averments which are the subjects of the second and 3d issues. It is to the other view that the Judge is expressly addressing himself. And must not the practical intelligibility of the specification—the way in which practical men would understand it, to work on it—and the sorts of apparatus which they would construct in so working—be the subject of evidence to be considered by the jury, and on which they must be entitled to decide? They are to consider it, no doubt, along with the law previously delivered as to the nature and extent of the claim. If the defenders required law to be charged on that point, or whether they required it or not, they got it, and got it correctly. But beyond and under that law, it remained for the jury to decide on the working capability of the specification, and the mode or modes of that working, as practical men would understand it. The defenders made this a question for the jury by the nature and terms of the 2d and 3d issues—and they made it so more definitely, in precise reference to the matter of this exception, by the evidence which they adduced by practical men concerning their understanding of the working qualities of the specification. It is to this that the part of the charge now excepted from is directed—"the meaning and intelligibility" of the specification to practical men—and whether, by its terms, they would feel themselves tied down to one single form of apparatus. Reading the charge as in its express terms and plain meaning of this import, I own I cannot entertain any doubt that it presented a question proper for the jury; and that without a deliverance of the jury upon it, no legal results could have been legitimately obtained.

But I do not think it immaterial in this question, that the Judge, while he so sent this matter to the jury, did expressly state, that if either party objected to this, and required him to state his own opinion as in matter of law on a simple view of the specification, he was ready to do so; and that the defenders did not so require him. I do not say that they were bound to make such a requisition. But as I look more to the practical attainment of the ends of justice than to the effects of particular modes of pleading, or the position of the parties, it is evident to me, that if they had so called on the Judge to direct, and a direction had been given leading to the very result of this verdict, it would have been impossible for them to maintain the exception now insisted on; and that would have been the just state of the case.

Your Lordship has referred to a great number of English cases, in which such matters, in the construction of patent specifications, were held to be matters for the jury. I have looked particularly into the two cases of Walton v. Potter, and Gibson and Campbell v. Brand, and as far as I may be enabled to judge, I think it is apparent that the Judges did hold such questions, in the practical construction of the patent, to be fit matters to be left to the jury.

If I entertained more doubt than I do on this part of the case, I should still think that, in the state of this case, the defenders could take no benefit by the exception. I apprehend that the 5th and 6th exceptions must be read together as constituting one plea. For the defenders, in complaining of the Judge for having left the points in the 5th to the jury, were bound to state the doctrine of law by which they say he ought to have withdrawn it from them, and ruled it as proper for the Court. They have done so. And now if the Court are of opinion, not only that that law could not have been delivered to the jury, but that, in so far as law ought to have been stated, it must have been the reverse of that laid down, and in precise accordance with the verdict as it stands, I really cannot conceive that any rule of proceeding can require us to sustain this exception. Indeed, I should humbly think, that unless the law required by what is put as the 6th exception can be sustained, we cannot allow the 5th. It would be so, assuredly, in a motion for new trial; and I do not conceive that there is any thing in our Statutes or practice to require us to proceed more strictly, in this respect, in the case of a bill of exceptions.

On this point of the case, Mr Rutherford's argument was perfectly satisfactory to my mind. I need not inquire how the matter might stand upon a general verdict; though I am not prepared to say that I should not have the same opinion in that case. Here, by your Lordship's direction, the jury have found the matters specially; and if the law which ought to have been stated (if it were matter of law), must have been such as to constrain the jury to return the very same verdict which they have returned, I cannot conceive that it must be incumbent on the Court to disturb that verdict. I think that neither principle nor authority requires us to do so. Justice has been fully done in the strictest view that can be taken of the matter. And being clearly of opinion that the verdict is in accordance with the correct law of the case (in so far as we can be called on so to treat it), as the jury have found it to be in accordance with the evidence, I should see no good ground for reversing the proceedings, even if I thought, which I certainly do not, that there had been any mistake in the form which the case has taken. If the verdict is accordiug to law, I cannot think that we are called on to set it aside as contrary to law.

The case of Vines, referred to by your Lordship yesterday, appears to me to be very much in point. I will only add, that I observe in the case of Walton v. Potter, that Mr Justice Colman, while he was inclined to hold that the point of invalidity raised was within the issue, nevertheless, being of opinion that the patent was valid, concurred with the other Judges in sustaining the verdict.

The 7th and 8th exceptions seem to depend on the same question with the 5th and 6th. I will only observe, that I cannot imagine that there should be any reasonable doubt, either in law or fact, concerning the meaning of the word effect in this specification. But if there was such a doubt, it surely must have been a question for the jury on the whole evidence.

On the grounds which I have already explained, and concurring in the views of your Lordship and Lord Medwyn, I am of opinion that these exceptions (9th and 10th) cannot be sustained.

11th Exception.—Looking to the terms of the Statute of James, and the way it has been applied, and to the nature of the direction excepted from, I am of opinion that the direction was right. But the question is, whether the supposed previous invention must not have been known and used as a useful thing at the time—that is, in fair understanding at the time of the patent in question being obtained, in terms of the Statute.

I am of opinion with your Lordships, that there is no ground in law for these (12th and 13th) exceptions. I think it clear that the specification is not defective in the points referred to; the modes of protection of the mouth of the furnace, and the end of the pipe being perfectly well known to all persons of ordinary skill in such things.

On the first exception I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Medwyn.

It is very clear to me, that our Statutes concerning the effect of the closed record, which are neither repealed, nor in any manner touched, by Lord Brougham's Act, must be in full force, and must rule the question; and that that record cannot be supplemented by any note of objections subsequently lodged.

Then it appears to me, that if the party meant to try to prove any special case of prior use, it should have been specifically stated. They did so in various instances, and the consequence was that they were disproved in the trial by persons who had made themselves acquainted with the works referred to.

The case of the gas tubes rather tends to illustrate the point. The averment was definite, and limited to previous use in Edinburgh and Glasgow; and it was so put in the issues. The making of such articles at all was of very recent practice; and all the persons employed in it in these places were well known. But if you make a general averment about common forges, with reference to numerous places or districts all over the kingdom, it is impossible for any one to tell or to discover what the particular thing is which you propose to prove under it.

An averment of a general custom would be a different case. But even for that, the record here would not be sufficient.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly disallowed the bill of exceptions, and also refused a motion for a new trial.

Presiding Judge at Trial, Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope).—Act. Rutherford, P. Robertson, A. Anderson, Inglis; G. and G. Dunlop, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Whigham, Mure; Tod and Romanes, W.S., Agents.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 277.—WILLIAM LANDELL, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM PURVES, Defender.

Process—Jury Trial—Leave to Appeal—Agent and Client—Reparation—Relief.—An action of relief having been raised by a pursuer to recover damages from a law-agent, in consequence of the former having himself been subjected in damages from the use of a border warrant, which had been obtained, as alleged, on the advice and employment of the defender as agent, and which had been found illegal, an issue was refused by the jury clerks, and the Lord Ordinary held the action irrelevant; but the Court, though expressing doubt, unanimously held the summons relevant. Thereafter an issue was approved of to try the case, but before that could be done, the defender applied to the Court for leave to appeal against the judgment finding the summons relevant. The Court, in the circumstances, granted leave, provided the petition of appeal should be presented on or before a (week) limited time.

Continuation of case supra, p. 417. Since the decision of the Court (supra) altering the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and finding the summons relevant, the defender presented a petition for leave to appeal against the interlocutor pronounced by the Court.

Rutherford, for the pursuer, opposed the application, in respect that as the case was now remitted to the jury roll after the finding of relevancy, it was unusual to grant leave of appeal, especially where it was understood the Court was unanimous, and, accordingly, he proposed that their Lordships should refuse leave, and approve of the issue which had been drafted and submitted to the defender.

The issue proposed was as follows:

"Whether the pursuer employed the defender as his law-agent, to adopt legal measures for making the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, the person named in the said warrant, amenable to the Scotch Courts, and whether the defender advised the pursuer to apply for said warrant, and represented the same to be legal and proper; and whether the defender thereafter, acting as agent aforesaid, obtained the said warrant, and after he obtained the same from James Bell, Sheriff-clerk of Berwickshire, gave instructions to the Sheriff-officer for putting the said warrant into execution against the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, by imprisoning her in the jail of Greenlaw, whereby the pursuer was subjected to the expenses and damages, of which he demands to be relieved by the defender?"

Lord Justice-Clerk.—What does the defender say to the draft?

Whigham had nothing to say about the pursuer's draft issue. All that the defender had to state was in support of the petition for leave to appeal. The Court had expressed doubts as to the summons being relevant; in particular, Lord Moncreiff was understood to be of that opinion; and as the judgment was not unanimous, leave should be granted.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Do you admit that the proposed issue is conform to the summons?

Whigham.—I do so. It covers the point in the summons, certainly.

Rutherford.—Then the only course for the Court is to approve of the issue as drafted.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—That is the first step, certainly. But should you not add to the draft, "to the injury and damage of the pursuer?"

Rutherford was not sure if that would be conform to the summons. It was only a question of relief that was raised, and the summons contained no conclusion for damages.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I know that: But why not insert the usual expression?

Whigham.—It would alter the summons.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—No, indeed. As the pursuer was subjected himself in damages and expenses, I confess I think the words ought to be added.

The other Judges rather thought that the words should be added, and they were so accordingly, and the issue approved of.

As to the claim for leave to appeal,

Lord Moncreiff (looked back to his notes of the advising.) There happened to be no register present I recollect, when the case was argued, and I cannot now charge my memory with what I said. I thought the case attended with difficulty I recollect; but all I find in my notes, as applicable to what I said at the time in reference to the question of relevancy, is the expression—"Doubt." I forget exactly what I said, but I am inclined to think, that on the whole I concurred with your Lordships.

Rutherford.—Therefore the judgment was unanimous, and there is no ground for the appeal. We have now got an issue, and we shall give notice to try the case, and why not proceed to trial? We may not obtain a verdict: therefore the necessity for an appeal would be at an end. Besides, it is plain the defender wishes to endeavour to hang up the case from the jury indefinitely, by taking the case to appeal; but the pursuer, since the issue was approved of, had a material interest to prevent this, and the Court would be slow to interfere.

Dean of Faculty.—But if, on appeal, the decision is reversed, then a trial would be rendered unnecessary.

Lord Moncreiff.—The only thing I would remark is, that we have pronounced an interlocutor of relevancy, which is a very rare thing; and on that ground there may be a reason for granting leave.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—If the defender can show at the trial what he avers on the record as avoiding the damage, then the pursuer will not get a verdict. There are few or no cases in which an appeal has been allowed after the approval of an issue. There was the case of the Duke of Hamilton, but it was different; and the appeal here may turn out quite useless.

Dean of Faculty.—But if the pursuer get a verdict, and the decision of the Court here is reversed on appeal, the trial will have been useless, in which way the proper course would seem to be to grant leave; however, if the Court think that all our defences are reserved, to be raised at the trial, that may make a difference in our course.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is not a similar case to that of the Duke of Hamilton. There the question appealed was as to the state of interests; so that, if reversed, it materially altered the case.

Rutherford.—The plea in defence here was, not simply that the action was not relevant, but want of employment. This latter question was ante omnia to be tried; for if settled, it would supersede the question of law. An issue obtained in the common case, implies relevancy. Here relevancy is no doubt expressly found by the Court, and there is the issue also approved of; but what difference is there between the two cases? One might as well appeal against an issue after it is approved; but how unusual that is. Referred to the case of Magistrates of Wighton, 15th February 1834; 12 S. and D., p. 459.

Dean of Faculty.—The special defences will be superseded if the action is held to be bad.

Lord Justice-Clerk thought there was a great specialty in the case. The defender pleaded that the action was not relevant, but he did not content himself with that, and went on and closed a record on a variety of averments. Now, after the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of March 1842, the pursuer could not amend his libel. His Lordship was against allowing the leave to appeal, after the course adopted by the defender in the record, who now had advantages he would not have had if the discussion on the relevancy had taken place before going into a record. The summons has now been found to be relevant. The issue has been approved of; and evidence may be lost by delay, to the great prejudice of the pursuer. Then the defender has his special defences, and if these be proved at the trial, the verdict will be in his favour, and that would supersede the necessity for any appeal. The question is entirely a matter of fact; and if the leave is granted here, it may be granted in every other case where the issue is to the loss and damage of the pursuer. This is not equivalent to the question which sometimes arises, whether malice should go into the issue. It is a case in which you can't begin anew. The defender can suffer no prejudice by the trial; and I am accordingly against granting leave.

Lord Medwyn was of a different opinion, and did not see why the closing of the record made any difference, as both pursuer and defender were parties to that. The pursuer ought to have got the question of relevancy set at rest himself before going into a record. His Lordship was in favour of granting leave, since he was inclined to have the question of relevancy reconsidered, as it had been said that it was the first instance of the kind where malice was not averred, or want of skill in the professional man, or neglect or dereliction of duty.

Lord Moncreiff confessed he was of Lord Medwyn's opinion. It was a very special case, both from the fact that the jury clerks could not find matter in the summons to frame an issue, and also because he believed it to be the first case of the sort. His Lordship thought nothing of closing the record, nor could he see how it bore on the question. It was the pursuer's duty to look after his own interests, in the conduct of his case, and the Court could not either assume negligence or ignorance on his part. If the summons was not relevant, there was no case; and "were the Court, while in dubio as to whether there was any ground for action, to send it to trial?" He certainly doubted the judgment pronounced holding the summons to be relevant; but in the question, whether they ought to allow an appeal of that judgment, it was a very extraordinary case in the circumstances, and on that ground, and on the doubt as to the judgment itself, he thought leave should be granted. The issue clerks could find no issuable matter in the summons. The Lord Ordinary held it to be irrelevant; and the Court, only with some doubt, held it to be relevant. And they pronounced, what is a very unusual thing, an interlocutor of relevancy. In these circumstances, accordingly, in such an important question involving the liability of an agent, it would be going far to refuse the leave.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court

"grant leave to the petitioner to present a petition of appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutor of the 27th day of May last, provided, however, that the said petition shall have been presented on or before the 27th day of July current."

Act. Rutherford, J. S. More; Greig and Morton, W.S., Agents.—Alt. Dean of Faculty (Wood), Whigham; Ainslie, Macallan and Graham, W.S., Agents.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 278.—W. H. SANDS, Trustee of the deceased John Duke of Roxburghe, Objector, v. THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF WEMYSS AND MARCH, Respondent.

(In Locality of Whittinghame.)

Teinds—Titularity—Completing Titles—Augmentation and Locality—Church—Circumstances in which held, that a certain progress of titles conferred the right of titularity on A, to the teinds of a parish, in preference to B, who claimed it in virtue of another set of titles; and that a disposition by A of the teinds of certain lands within the parish, was a valid and effectual heritable right in favour of the heritor to whom it was granted; and effect accordingly ordered to be given to it in a process of locality and augmentation of the parish.

The objector set forth, that the collegiate church of Dunbar was established in the year 1342 by Patrick Earl of March, and confirmed by William, Bishop of St Andrews. Its constitution consisted of a dean, an archpriest, and eight canons, for whose support there were assigned the revenues of the church of Dunbar, and the incomes of the chapels of Whittinghame, Spot, Stanton, Panshiel, and of Hedderwick; and the churches of Linton in East-Lothian, Dunse and Chirnside in Berwickshire, were likewise annexed to the establishment—the granter reserving to himself the right of patronage. By a new regulation in 1492, when the establishment was again confirmed by the bishop of St Andrews, the churches of Dunbar, Pinkerton, Spot, Belton, Pitcokis, Linton, Dunse, and Chirnside, were appointed prebends of it,—Chalmers's Caledonia, Vol. II. p. 511.

In 1372, George then Earl of March gave in marriage with his sister Agnes, to James Douglas of Dalkeith, the manor of Whittinghame, with the parsonage of the chapel; and by charter, of date 17th October 1564, Queen Mary granted to James Douglas of Dalkeith, then Earl of Morton, inter alia, the lands and barony of Whittinghame, along with "advocatione et donatione ecclesiæ de Quhittinghame et omnium aliarum ecclesiarum et cappellaniarum earundem ac omnibus pertinentiis jacen. infra vicecomitatum nostrum de Edinburgh et constabulariam de Hadintoun."

The estates of the Earl of Morton were forfeited to the Crown in 1581, and in the same year a Statute was passed ratifying a conveyance granted by his Majesty to John Earl of Morton of a considerable portion of the forfeited estates, but neither the tenandrie of Crumstane (afterwards mentioned), the deanery of Dunbar, nor the patronage of Whittinghame, formed parts of the grant. In consequence, the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, and of all the benefices and chaplainries connected with it, including the patronage of Whittinghame, was vested in the Crown for some time previous to the end of the sixteenth century, and at that period, and subsequently, the objector alleged that the Crown possessed and exercised a right of property over the whole revenues which pertained to the collegiate church, and to the benefices, prebends, and chaplainries connected with it.

By an Act of Parliament in 1606, in the reign of King James the Sixth, the narrative of which set forth the great services of George Earl of Dunbar, Lord Home of Berwick, "Chief Treasurer of Scotland, Chancellor of the Eschequer in England," his Majesty granted, disposed, and confirmed to the Earl,

"his airis and ass'nais inter alia, all and haill the tennendrie of crumstane comprehending the landis and ground quhairone the Castell of dunbar is situat The foirthis castell steid and haill precinct yairof with housis yairdis and pelces of land vseit and went to p'tene to the said Castell The landis and boundis of the great loch of dunbar The landis of browmepark wt. medowes et horswardis The lynkis and cunnynger of estbairnis and all p'tinentis belanging of auld to the lordschip and baronie of dunbar Alsua all and haill the landis of Rewlismaynis Sampsones Wallis crumstane with the myln yairof The landis and akeris besyd and within the towne of duns, with the cottages yairof The landis of Newtoun quhitasum, twa husband landis in hiltoun and landis callit prestoun waris with all thair pairtis pendiclis anaxis conaxis dependencis and pertinentis lyand in the said s'refdome of berwick toggidder wt. aduocation donatioun and richt of patronage of the benefices and chaplanreis following vizt. The denrie of dunbar including the personage and vicarage of the parochin of qubittengem The archiprestrie or vicarage of dunbar including all the kirklandis and teyndis vseit and went of all and haill the parochin of dunbar The prebendarie of duns, including personage and vicarage of the haill parochin of duns The prebendarie of Chirnesyd including personage and vicarage of the haill parochin of chirnesyde The prebendaris chanonreis or personages of dunbar pincartoun Beltoun and pitcokis The Chaplanreis callit the saull preistis and all vtheris chaplanreis fundit of auld within the college anexit thairto with the comones or co'mountie teyndis depending vpoun the zeirlie fruttis and co'moditeis of the foirsaidis as proper p'tinentis of the samyn, all vnait and incorporat in the foirsaid tenendrie of crumstane," &c.

The Statute, after of new conveying the lands, proceeded:

"With all pairtis pendiclis and pertinentis yairof with advocatioun dona'un and richt of patronage of the denrie of dunbar The Archiprestrie of Dunbar The Chanonreis and prebendaries of dunr. chirnesyd, dunbar, pynkertoun spott beltoun and pitcokis The chaplanreis callit the saull pristis and all vtheris chaplanreis fundit or anexit of auld To the said college of dunbar Toggidder with the prebendarie of the parochin of lynthoun including personage and vicarage yairof anexit and fundit of auld within the sami college kirk of dunbar with the saidis comonis and comountie Teyndis Pertenig and depending vpoun the zeirlie rentis of the saidis kirkis as proper pertinentis of the samyn, And siclyk all and haill the landis of lochend with medowes and pertinentis yairof The haill toune and landis of mekill and litill pynkertownes Quhytrig and burt with tennent tennendreis and all thair pertinentis Pertenig to oure souerane lord beinge p'ts of his hienes anexit propertie and patrimonie of the Crowne."

Following on the Statute of 1606, King James the Sixth granted a charter in July of the same year, precisely in the terms of the Statute in favour of the Earl of Dunbar. The Earl having died, he was succeeded by two daughters; but by agreement between them, a title was made up in 1613 to the said lands and others, inter alia, to the deanery of Dunbar and other benefices, solely in the person of one of them, namely, his eldest daughter, Lady Anne, exactly in terms of her father's titles. Two sets of titles thereafter appear to have emanated from the successor of the Earl of Dunbar:—1st, In 1616, Lady Anne and her husband resigned the lands of Whittinghame into the hands of the Crown, "nec non totas et integras terras ecclesiasticas et glebam de Quhittinghame," "una cum advocatione et jure patronatus ecclesiæ parochialis de Quhittinghame tam rectorie quam vicarie ejusdem," in favour of Sir Archibald Douglas of Whittinghame, who thereafter was infeft, in 1616, on a Crown-charter dated in 1616, whereby there were disposed to him, and his heirs-male and assignees,

"omnes et singulas terras de Whittinghame cum turre fortalicio manerie domibus edificiis hortis pomariis molendino terris molendinariis, multuris, sequelis, annexis, connexis, partibus pendiculis et omnibus suis pertinentiis, nec non totas et integras terras ecclesiasticas et glebam de Quhittinghame, cum domibus edificiis et omnibus suis pertinen." &c., "una cum advocatione donatione et jure patronatus ecclesiæ parochialis de Quhittinghame tam rectorie quam vicarie ejusdem." &c.

The Crown-charter, besides containing the right to the patronage of Whittinghame, contained a clause erecting the whole into a barony, to be called the Barony of Whittinghame.

Following on this deed, and on the narrative that Sir Archibald stood infeft "in the advocation, donation, and richt of patronage of the parish kirk of Qubittinghame" under Crown titles, a deed was executed in March 1618 by John Viscount Lauderdale, who appeared to have had some claim (the nature of which was not set forth on the record) to the patronage of Whittinghame, whereby he ratified and confirmed Sir Archibald's "said heritable right to the said patronage."

In regard to the 2d title emanating from Lady Anne, the eldest daughter of the Earl of Dunbar, it appears that James Baillie of Lochend had led an apprising against Lady Anne and Sir James Home of Whiterig, to whom she had been married, in consequence of which he was infeft on a Crown-charter of adjudication in March 1618. This charter, after narrating that certain obligations, rights and securities, formerly belonging to Lady Anne and her spouse, had been lawfully appraised from them by decree, 19th December 1617, disposed to Baillie the lands and others which were previously mentioned as having come into the person of Lady Anne on the death of the Earl of Dunbar, viz.,

" cum advocacione donacione et jure patronatus beneficiorum et capellaniarum supra-script. viz., dict. Decanatus de Dunbar includen. rectoriam et vicariam dict. parochiæ de Whittinghame, dict. archipresbiteratus seu vicariæ de Dunbar, includen. omnes terras ecclesiasticas et decimas usirat. et consuet. totius antiquæ parochiæ de Dunbar, dict. prebende de Duns, includen. rectoriam et vicariam totius parochiæ de Duns, dict. prebende de Chirnside, includen. rectoriam et vicariam totius dictæ parochiæ de Chirnside, dict. prebendariorum canonicatum seu rectoriarum de Dunbar Pincartoun Beltoun et Pitcockis dict. capellaniarum vulgo nuncupat. lie sanct. priests, et omnium aliarum capellaniarum ab antequo fundat. infra dictam ecclesiam collegiatam de Dunbar eidem annexat. cum dictis communibus seu communibus decimis dependen. super annuis fructibus et commoditatibus ecclesiarum supra-script. tanquam de propriis bonis et pertinentiis earundem."

Baillie was duly infeft in April 1618, and the Earl of Lauderdale, who also claimed some right to the deanery of Dunbar, came forward, and by a deed, dated 11th July 1618, narrating "certain good reasons and considerations," resigned and conveyed to Baillie,

"all and baill the greens and cunnynghairs of East Barnes, pertinentiis thair of quhatsoever, lyand within the sheriffdom of and constabularie of Haddington, together with the advocacione and donatoun of the prebendaries of the college kirk of Dunbar after spect., viz., the deanerie of Dunbar, comprehending the personage and vicarage of the kirk of Qubittinghame, the archiprestrie of Dunbar, the prebendaries of Chirnside, comprehending the personage and vicarage of the kirk of Chirnside, The prebendaries of Dunbar, Pincartoun, and Beltoun, The chaplanrie called the saul-priests of Dunbar."

This deed specially excepted from the warrandice the deed of ratification previously executed by the Earl, viz.:

"Exceptund always furth of the said warrandice the facts and deedis already done by us before the making hereof, viz., ane ratificatione of the patronage of the prebendarie of Chirnside, made be us to Alexander Earl of Home, ane ratificatione of the patronage of the deanerie of Dunbar, comprehending the kirk of Qubittinghame, maid to Sir Archibald Douglas of Whittinghame, Knight, ane of the senators of the college of justice; ane disposition maid by us to the said James Baillie of the patronage of the archiprestrie of Dunbar, and saulpriestrie thereof, with the com'ouns of the kirk of Dunbar, and all deeds (gif any be) done by us the said Viscount in favour of umql. George Earl of Dunbar, his heirs and assignees, quhilks ratificationes and dispositions sall nowise be comprehended within the said warrandice, but exceptit from the same."

Following on this deed, and with a view apparently to confirm his right, Baillie of Lochend entered into a contract of sale with Lady Anne in July 1618, in regard to certain subjects contained in the apprising, being the lands of Broxmouth, the Links of East Barnes, the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, and the lands of Meikle and Little Pincartouns, Brunt and Whiterig, and Lady Ann and her husband conveyed the same to Baillie, together with "the advocatioun donatioun and right of patronage of the benefices and chaplanries following, viz. the sd. Deanrie of Dunbar including the personage and vicarage of ye sd. parochin of qubittinghame the archeprestrie or vicarage of Dunbar including yr'intill all ye kirk lands and teinds vait and vont of all and baill the said parochin or Dunbar the sd. prebendarie of chirnsyde including personage and vicarage of ye sd. baill parochin of chirnsyde the sd. prebendaries chaplanreis or persongis of Dumbar, pincartoun and beltoun the prebendaries callit ye saulpriest wr. the commounes and commoun teindis depending vpon ye zeirlie fruitis and commodetis of ye foresaids kirkis."

The contract excepted from the warrandice the conveyance of the patronage to Sir Archibald Douglas. Baillie thereafter obtained a charter under the Great Seal (on 30th July 1618), whereby the Crown conveyed to him these subjects,

"una cum advocacione donacione et jure patronatus ecclesiarum et beneficiorum subsequen., viz. decanatus de Dunbar, includen. rectoriam et vicariam parochiæ de Whittinghame Archipresbiteratus seu vicariæ de Dunbar includen. omnes terras ecclesiasticas et decimas usirat. et consuet. totius et integræ parochiæ de Dunbar, prebende de Chirnside, includen. rectoriam et vicariam totius parochiæ de Chirnside, prebendariorum cappellaniarum seu rectoriarum de Dunbar, Pincartoun, et Beltoun, prebende seu capellanie vulgo nuncupat. lie saulpriestrie de Dunbar, cum communibus seu communibus decimis dependen. super annuis fructibus et commoditatibus d'tarum ecclesiarum Nec non totas et integras terras de Meikle et Littell Pincartounes, Brunt, and Qubittig cum domibus edificiis hortis partibus pendiculis earundem tenentibus tenandriis earundem et singulis suis jacen. infra constabulariam de Haddingtoun et vicecomitatum de Edinburgh antedict."

This charter erected the whole of these subjects

"in unam integram et liberam tenandriam omni tempore affuturo tenandriam de Pincartoun nuncupand;" "cum communibus seu communibus decimis dependen. super annuis fructibus et commoditatibus aliarum ecclesiarum."

Baillie afterwards (in August 1618) conveyed the great portion of the subjects composing this tenandry, as now described, to Robert Earl of Roxburghe, in whose favour a charter was subsequently (19th August 1618) passed under the Great Seal, the quæquidem of which described the subjects in similar terms to the enumeration in the charter to Baillie, of July 1618. The clause of novodamus was conform to that description; and the charter contained a clause of new erecting the same into a tenandry, apparently because the whole subjects previously contained in the tenandry were not now conveyed to the Earl of Roxburghe.

To follow out the titles to the Douglas family, the first above mentioned:—Sir Archibald (the 1st) having died, his succession was taken up by his eldest son, Arthur. Arthur—who was duly infeft in 1628 on a Crown title, which specially described the subjects contained in it, in the same way as they were disposed and held by his father, and as having been erected into a barony—thereafter, in 1642, under reservation of his liferent, resigned the barony, &c., and whole subjects above conveyed, with the exception to be mentioned, to his eldest son Archibald (Sir Archibald the second) who was infeft on a Crown-charter: But the charter excepted, or at least did not per expressum convey to Sir Arthur's son, the patronage of Whittinghame.

Thereafter, on the second Sir Archibald's death, a title was expedite (in 1662) in favour of his eldest sister and heir-at-law, the Countess of Kingston, and subsequently, on her death, a title was completed (in 1684) in favour of her son Archibald (the third Sir Archibald, and) Master of Kingston, in precisely the same terms as the titles stood in the person of the first Sir Archibald Douglas in 1616.

The Master of Kingston (the third Sir Archibald Douglas) having contracted debt, a decree of apprising was obtained against him, whereby there were appraised from him the lands and barony of Whittinghame, "with the teinds great and small, both parsonage and vicarage, of the aforesaid barony and others." Thereafter, William Hay of Drummelzier obtained right from the creditor, Elizabeth Rutherford, to this apprising, and he was infest in 1700, on a charter of adjudication and resignation from the Crown, which disposed to him the barony of Whittinghame, and others comprehended therein,

"Totas et integras terras et baroniam de Whittinghame inibi comprehenden. una cum advocacione donatione et jure patronatus ecclesie parochialis de Whittinghame, cum decimis ejusdem tam rectoriis quam vicariis."

The charter described the lands:

"Et quæ omnes terræ aliaque suprascript. in unam et liberam baroniam vocat. Baroniam de Whittinghame erect. fuerunt secundum antiqua jura et infeofamenta ejusd. quond. Archibaldo Douglas de Whittinghame et predecessibus suis concess. Et quæquidem terræ et baroniæ de Whittinghame comprehenden. ut predictur cum decimis magnis et minutis tam rectoriis quam vicariis dict. terrarum et baroniæ ad dictum quondam Dominum Archibaldum Douglas de Whittinghame et ad Dominam Elizabetham Douglas ejus sororem sponsam Alexandri Vicecomitis de Kingstoun et dicto Alexandro Vicecomiti de Kingstoun seipso et ad quondam Carolum Magistrum de Kingstoun filium legitimum natu maximum procreat. inter dict. Alexandrum Vicecomitem de Kingstoun et Dominam Elizabetham Douglas per prius hereditariè pertinuerunt, et quæ appreciatæ fuerunt a dicto Alexandro Vicecomite de Kingstoun ad instantiam Elizabethæ Rutherford."

The lands and barony of Whittinghame were possessed in virtue of this title down to 1817, when they came by purchase into possession of the present family of Balfour.

After this enumeration of titles, it is necessary to state, in regard to the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame, which, prior to the end of the sixteenth century, were in the hands of the Church, and drawn by the deanery of Dunbar, that in February 1590, Lord Claud Hamilton, who was the commendator of the Abbey of Paisley, and also the dean of Dunbar, with consent of his prebendaries and chaplain of the collegiate church of Dunbar, granted a lease to his son, Sir George Hamilton, and his heirs, for a very long period, of the "teynd scheaves, utheris teyndis of lamb and wool, fruits, rents, and emoluments, profeitis and duties whatsoever, of the parsonage and vicarage of Whittinghame, with parts, pendicles and pertinents," &c., pertaining to the deanery of Dunbar. This tack was assigned by the lessee to Sir Claud Hamilton of Shawfield; and it appeared from a decree of platt, in January 1618, and relative proceedings, that a prorogation was obtained of the tack, which, it was averred, continued in subsistence till after the commencement of the present century.

The objector alleged that the Roxburghe family had always possessed the subjects described as contained in the tenantry of Pinkerton, which was so erected in 1618, from that period down to the present moment: That in particular, they possessed the titularity of the parish of Whittinghame in virtue of their right to the deanery; and in exercise of the right of titularity, the late John Duke of Roxburghe had, in 1798, disposed to Robert Walter Lord Blantyre, all and whole the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, of all and haill the lands belonging to the latter, lying within the parish of Whittinghame, and that they had exercised other unequivocal and substantial acts of possession of the titularity, which were set forth on the record, viz., by conveying, in right of the title to the deanery, &c., the teinds on various occasions, to various heritors within the parish of Whittinghame. And the objector accordingly pleaded in this locality of the parish of Whittinghame, that in virtue of the titles and possession which has been explained, the late John Duke of Roxburghe had a valid and effectual title to the titularity of the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame, and that the disposition to Lord Blantyre in 1798, was therefore effectual to constitute an heritable right to the teinds thereby disposed; and it was argued, that the alleged title to the titularity in the family of Hay, was ineffectual in competition with that of the objector's constituent; because, 1st, the party from whom the right to the barony of Whittinghame was adjudged by the Hays, had no right to the teinds in question, and accordingly, that the charter of adjudication, and whole progress following on it, was void, as flowing a non habente potestatem; and, 2dly, because no possession of the teinds had ever been had by the Hays, or by their predecessors or authors; and the objector therefore objected to the schemes of locality and of accounting between the heritors, in so far as effect had not been given to the heritable right held by Lord Blantyre to his teinds in the parish; and he craved rectification and adjustment accordingly.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The respondent—denying that the titularity was conveyed at all to the objector's constituents—alleged, besides, that there were no sufficient acts of possession of it; and it was maintained that the titularity was in the respondent, who, or his authors, had invariably, from 1700 to the present time, possessed and exercised the right of patronage. And it was averred that the title to Lord Blantyre had been executed by the Duke of Roxburghe for a purpose, in order to enable Lord Blantyre, as having an heritable right to his teinds, to avoid being allocated on in the then pending process of locality and augmentation by the minister of the parish. It was admitted that the common agent had given effect to the title, but objections, it was stated, were lodged to it, which, however, never came before the Court, in consequence of Lord Blantyre's property and that of Drummelzier centering in the proprietor of Whittinghame. In 1808, however, in a new locality, these lands, which had belonged to Lord Blantyre, were localled on; but that process fell asleep. In 1829 a new process was brought, and in it the same lands were again localled on, in respect of no heritable right having been instructed to the teinds of them by Mr Balfour, the then proprietor, and a final scheme of locality (now objected to) was made up on the principle that neither the late Lord Blantyre nor Mr Balfour had any heritable right to their teinds.

The respondent accordingly argued, that the Duke of Roxburghe had no right, as titular, to grant the disposition to Lord Blantyre in 1798, and that the right to the titularity must be held to be in the respondent, and that his title was preferable to that of the objector. Further, it was argued, that as the present proprietor of the teinds in dispute had consented to be allocated on as a party having no heritable right to his teinds, there were fair grounds for presuming that the present objections were untenable.

VOL. XIV.—No. XLII.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

" 11th March 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and thereafter made avizandum, finds,

" 1st, That the titles of the family of Roxburghe do not contain any right to the titularity of the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame per expressum.

" 2dly, That although the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, including the rectory and vicarage of the parish of Whittinghame, was erected into a tenantry in favour of Baillie in 1618, and that that tenantry of Pinkerton was afterwards conveyed, with parts and pertinents, to the Earl of Roxburghe, yet the patronage of the parish of Whittinghame had been previously conveyed to Douglas of Whittinghame.

" 3dly, That the Roxburghe family do not appear ever to have possessed the teinds of the lands in question, or of any part of the parish of Whittinghame.

" 4thly, That, in the absence of any heritable right in the family of Roxburghe, or any other person, William Hay of Drummelzier had, by Statute, a right in 1700 to the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame, and that the same appears to have been contained in the charters of the barony of Whittinghame from 1700 down to, and since 1798, and conveyed to Mr Balfour, the present proprietor.

" 5thly, That, in these circumstances, the family of Roxburghe have not instructed any heritable right to the titularity of that parish, and that the disposition from John Duke of Roxburghe in 1798 was granted a non habente protestatem, and did not convey a valid and effectual right to the teinds of the lands in question: Approves, therefore, of the interim scheme as a final scheme of locality in this parish: Finds the trustee of John Duke of Roxburghe liable in expenses, subject to modification: Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits to the auditor to tax and to report.

" Note.—The question before the Court is, whether John Duke of Roxburghe had a right to teinds in the parish of Whittinghame, which he sold to the late Lord Blantyre in 1798?

" It is not necessary, with a view to its decision, to go into the earlier titles of the collegiate church of Dunbar, some of which, from the year 1342 to 1581, have been referred to. The paramount right seems to have been vested in the Crown in 1581. In 1606 an Act of Parliament was passed, which ordains a charter to be made under the Great Seal in favour of George Earl of Dunbar, of the barony of Crumstane, comprehending the lands on which the Castle of Dunbar is situate, 'togidder with advocacy, donation, and richt of patronage of the benefices and chaplanries following, viz., the deanrie of Dunbar, including the parsonage and vicarage of the parochin of Whittinghame, the archpriestrie or vicarage of Dunbar, including all the kirk lands and teyndis usit and wont of all and hail the parochin of Dunbar, the prebendarie of Duns, including parsonage and vicarage of the hail parochin of Duns, the prebendarie of Chirnside, including parsonage and vicarage of the hail parochin of Chirnside, the prebendaries, chanonreis, or parsonages of Dunbar, Pincartoun, Beltoun, Pitkokis, the chaplanreis callit the saullpriests and all utheris chaplanreis fundit of auld within the college annexit thereto, with the communes or comountie teyndis depending upon the yearlie fruittis comodities of the foresaidis as proper pertinentis of the samyn, all unitit and incorporat in the foresaid tenandrie of Crumstane.' The Act of Parliament also of new 'grants to the said Earl the tenantry of Crumstane, with advocatioun, donatione, and richt of patronage of the denrie of Dunbar, the archpriestrie of Dunbar, the chanonreis and prebendaries of Duns, Chirnside, Dunbar, Pincartoun, Spott, Beltoun and Pitkokis, the chaplanreis callit the saullpriests, and all utheris chaplanreis fundit or annexit of auld to the said college of Dunbar; togidder with the prebendarie of Lyntoun, including parsonage and vicarage thereof, annexit and founded of auld within the sami College Kirke of Dunbar, with the saidis comunis and comountie teyndis pertenig and depending upoun the yeirle rentis of the saidis kirkis as proper pertinentis pertenig to our Sovereign Lord, being pts. of his hienes annexit propertie and patrimonie of the Croune.'

" A charter and infeftment in favour of George Earl of Dunbar followed on this Act of Parliament, and the rights of both parties to the teinds in dispute may be said to be derived from that charter. There is a question between the parties, how far that grant included the titularity or teinds of the parish of Whittinghame, or only the patronage which, after the Statute 1690, carried with it the titularity where there was no heritable right. Under the grant of patronages quoted, the deanery of Dunbar includes the parsonage and vicarage of the parish of Whittinghame. The novodamus clause gives the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar without special mention of the parish of Whittinghame. Then follows an enumeration of the archpriestrie of certain prebendaries, chanonreis and chaplanreis, followed with a clause of common teinds as pertinentis of them. It is contended that this clause of common teinds is to be considered as a grant of the titularity of all these separate benefices, and among others, of the parsonage and vicarage of the parish of Whittinghame, which was included in the deanery of Dunbar. On the other hand, the clause of common teinds of the said kirkis may be applied not to the deanery, but to the benefices which are specified afterwards, for the parish of Whittinghame, included in the deanery, might not then be considered as a separate benefice. This ambiguity might be cleared up by possession on either side, but unfortunately the possession was not such as to remove that difficulty.

" Lady Anne Home, the daughter of George Earl of Dunbar, conveyed the patronage of the parish of Whittinghame to Sir Archibald Douglas, who obtained a charter in 1616: from the quæquidem of which it appears that he previously had the property of the lands of Whittinghame, as also the ecclesiastical lands and glebe, by other titles, and that the patronage of the church of Whittinghame belonged to Lady Anne Home, and was conveyed by her, with consent of her husband, and resigned by them in favour of Sir Archibald Douglas.

" Infeftments were taken on this charter, and it was confirmed by Parliament in 1621, and from that time down to the present, the patronage of Whittinghame appears to have been exercised under that title by the proprietor of the lands of Whittinghame. No heritable title to the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame appears to have been acquired by the proprietor of that estate until the year 1700, when William Hay obtained a charter and adjudication of the lands and barony of Whittinghame, 'una cum advocatiōe, donatiōe et jure patronatus ecclesiæ parochialis de Whittingham, cum decimis ejusdem tam rectoriis quam vicariis.'

" It is contended on the one side, that this was fully warranted by the Statute 1690; on the other, that the titularity of the teinds of Whittinghame remained with the family of Dunbar, and was conveyed to the Roxburghe family.

" It appears that Lady Anne Home entered into a contract with Baillie of Lochend, with procuratory of resignation of the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, including Whittinghame; but the clause of warrandice contains an exception of the disposition which Lady Anne Home and her husband had made to Sir Archibald Douglas of the right of the patronage of the parish of Whittinghame, parsonage and vicarage. Baillie, however, obtained a charter of apprising in terms of the Earl of Dunbar's charter, with the 'Decanatus de Dunbar, includen. rectoriam et vicariam parochiæ de Whittinghame,' with a clause of novodamus erecting the subjects contained in the charter into a tenantry. Baillie conveyed this tenantry to the Earl of Roxburghe, who, in 1618, obtained a charter of resignation of the tenantry of Pinkertoun, 'una cum advocatiōe, donatiōe et jure patronatus beneficiorum et capellaniarum subscript. viz., Decanatus de Dunbar, includen. rectoriam et vicariam parochiæ de Whittinghame, prebend. de Chirnside, includen. rectoriam et vicariam totius parochiæ de Chirnside, prebendariorum, capellaniarum seu rectoriarum de Dunbar, Pincartoun, et Beltoun.'

" The Earl of Roxburghe's charter contains no express reference to the common or commonie teinds, further than they may be understood to be carried by the word pertinentis; and the subsequent titles of the Roxburghe family are in similar terms.

" The Lord Ordinary has therefore found, that there was no express title to the teinds of Whittinghame in the Roxburghe family; and although the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, including the rectory and vicarage of the parish of Whittinghame was included in Baillie's titles, and passed into the Roxburghe titles, it is not disputed that the patronage of the parish of Whittinghame was previously disposed to the Douglasses, and has been possessed by the barony of Whittinghame ever since, and was also excepted by Lady Anne Home in warrandice of her conveyance to Baillie.

"The right to the titularity of Whittinghame, so far as regards the titles of the Roxburghe family, comes therefore to depend on the clause of common or commontie teinds which occurs in Baillie's charter, but does not appear in the Roxburghe titles, unless it is carried as a part and pertinent of the tenantry of Pinkertoun. This is certainly a very slender title, but it might have been sufficient if it had been followed by clear and appropriate possession of the teinds of Whittinghame by the Roxburghe family.

"It is a peculiar feature of the present case, that neither party can show any actual possession of the teinds of Whittinghame unless constructively. The trustee for the Duke of Roxburghe refers to various decreets and conveyances of the teinds of different lands, but they all appear to be in the parish of Dunbar, or in some of the other parishes included under the different benefices of which the patronages remained with Lady Anne Home, and were conveyed through Baillie to the Roxburghe family, "is proved by Claud Lord Hamilton in 1590, granted as Dean of Dunbar, a tack for a yearly payment of £200 Scots of the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame to his eldest son, and to the heir next succeeding him, and the longest liver of them two successively during their lives, and for three nineteen years after the death of the survivor.

"Afterwards the Parliamentary Commissioners appointed in consequence of the Statute 1617, modified a stipend in 1618 to the minister of Whittinghame and his successors, with the consent of the Earl of Abercorn, present for himself and his father as Dean of Dunbar, and ordained the tacksman to pay the stipend, which considerably exceeded the tack-duty. The Commissioners, in recompense of the burden imposed on the tacksman, added to the years of the tack seven nineteen years, to begin at the end of the period contained in the tack. As the tack commenced with two liferents, the termination of which is not ascertained, it cannot be stated with certainty when it expired. The trustee for the Roxburghe family says it was current till very lately, and the respondents say it expired somewhere about the year 1800. Both parties therefore agree in making it endure after the date of the conveyance of John Duke of Roxburghe to Lord Blantyre in 1798.

"Sir William Hamilton, who was in right of the tack in 1632, assigned the tack and decret of platt prolonging it, so far as regards the lands and barony of Whittinghame, to Arthur Douglas, for crop 1630, and all succeeding years. The tack was also assigned by a Sir Andrew Ramsay of Abbotshall to Walter Lord Blantyre, so far as regarded the teinds of the lands now in dispute.

"Both parties are therefore agreed that for two centuries, down to 1800, the possession of the teinds in question took place under the tack, which both sides admit endured for a period of more than two years after the disposition to the late Lord Blantyre by John Duke of Roxburghe. There was therefore no appropriate possession of these or other teinds in the parish of Whittinghame by the Roxburghe family before the conveyance in 1798, and without such possession the titles of the Duke of Roxburghe to these teinds was not such as to establish in his person an heritable right to these teinds. If there was no heritable title to the teinds in possession of the Duke of Roxburghe, the title obtained by the Hays of Drummelzier in 1700 (since conveyed to Mr Balfour), strengthened by the Act 1690, was liable to no legal objection, and vested in the proprietor of Whittinghame a legal title to the teinds in 1798, while, on the other hand, the Duke of Roxburghe had no such right."

The objector reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn went over the terms of the original charter of erection of the collegiate church in 1342, observing, that the dean of Dunbar pro prebenda sua perceptit omnes decimas tam majores quam minores et obventiones parochie de Whittinghame keeping a perpetual vicar. The archpriest had to superintend the chaplainries belonging to the establishments, &c. &c., and to him pro prebenda assignantur omnes decimæ et obventiones altaragia spectan. totius parochie de Dunbar præter decimas capellæ de Quittinghame. After some remarks as to the duties of the canons, &c., his Lordship proceeded:—The March estates having been annexed to the Crown by forfeiture in 1487, an Act of Parliament was passed in 1606, ordering a charter to be granted to the Earl of Dunbar of the tenantry of Crumstane, part of these estates, together with the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, including the parsonage and vicarage of the parish of Whittinghame, the archpriestrie, or vicarage of Dunbar, &c., and concluding thus,—“with the commons or commontie teinds depending upon the yearly fruits in commoditiis of the foresaids,” as proper pertinents of the same. The subject of the grant was certainly in the Crown at that time. Now the benefices, with all their parts, profits, &c., and not the patronage of them merely, were granted to the Earl of Dunbar. The right to present to the benefice, conferred the benefice with all its emoluments on the patron, and that right was to present a titular to the office, who drew the teinds and other emoluments of it. When vacant, he drew them himself.

At the Reformation, the collegiate church of Dunbar was suppressed as an establishment, but the parish churches which had been annexed to it, and such as were served by vicars, were retained. Thus the parish churches of Dunbar and Whittinghame were retained. The teinds of the latter parish had been received by the dean of Dunbar as his provision; and at the Reformation, Lord Claud Hamilton was titular and dean, and drew the stipend, which was assigned to him out of the thirds, and not from the teinds of the parish. The teinds of Whittinghame, Lord Claud Hamilton drew as titular and dean of Dunbar, till he, in that capacity, and with consent of the chaplain, granted a lease of them in 1590 to his son, George Hamilton, for a very long period, on payment of 200 merks Scots to the granter.

The Earl of Dunbar was succeeded by his two daughters, and by agreement between them, Lady Anne took up the succession, and made up titles to that part of it which comprehended the deanery of Dunbar and other benefices, in ipsissimis verbis of her father's titles. In 1616, she and her husband resigned the lands of Whittinghame, “nec non totas et integras terras ecclesiasticas et glebam de Whittinghame una cum advocacione donatione et jure patronatus ecclesie parochialis de Whittinghame tam rectorie quam vicarie ejusdem” in favour of Sir Archibald Douglas. But this title merely conveyed the patronage of Whittinghame, as is clear from the ratification which followed on it by Lord Lauderdale.

In 1617, Baillie of Lochend then led an apprising against Lady Anne and her husband, and he also obtained a disposition of certain of the lands, with the advocacy and donation of the prebendaries of the College of Dunbar, viz., the deanery of Dunbar, comprehending the parsonage and vicarage of the kirk of Whittinghame, the archpriestrie and vicarage of Dunbar and others, of the benefices which constituted the collegiate church, with the commons or commontie teinds of these churches. And Lord Lauderdale, in his ratification, excepts from the warrandice the ratification he had previously executed of the patronage of the deanery of Dunbar, comprehending the kirk of Whittinghame, made to Sir Archibald Douglas. Mr Baillie, with a view to complete his right, entered into a contract of sale with Lady Anne, by which she and her husband conveyed to Baillie certain of the lands contained in the apprising, with the patronage of the deanery, including Whittinghame and the other benefices, with the commontie teinds, but she excepts from the conveyance the right to Sir Archibald Douglas of the patronage of Whittinghame. Then followed a charter from the Crown in favour of Baillie, with novodamus, and a clause erecting the subjects into the tenantry of Pinkerton. Now, without adverting to the conveyance of the commonty teinds, which do not apply to the church of Whittinghame, as they were given to the dean for his support, it is clear that Baillie got all belonging to the church of Whittinghame which the Crown conveyed to the Earl of Dunbar in 1606, with the exception of the patronage of the church, so that the teinds of the parish were made over to him. These teinds were carried by the charter, 30th July 1618,—the patronage merely having been disposed away previously. After this, the tenantry of Pinkerton is made over to the Roxburghe family, in August 1618, by Baillie. Then there is a Crown-charter in their favour, with a novodamus, and a clause of new erecting the subjects into a tenantry, as the whole subjects previously constituting the tenantry were not conveyed to the Roxburghe family. In particular, the archpriestrie was not conveyed, nor the commons and commony teinds. Both the contract and quæquidem set forth, that what was conveyed was with all right, &c., which Baillie had in the subjects; and though the common and commony lands were not conveyed, Baillie made over to the Roxburghe family the deanery, and parsonage and vicarage of Whittinghame, and all others. The archpriestrie, and the commons and commony teinds, were reserved to be included by Baillie in the barony of Lochend, which was done by charter in 1620. In this way, the subjects so reserved were disunited by the Crown from the collegiate church and united to Lochend. His Lordship thought it of little moment that these reserved subjects were not conveyed, as he doubted whether the right to the archpriestrie, commons and commony teinds, would fortify the right to the teinds of Whittinghame, which were, he thought, carried by the right to the deanery. The Roxburghe family continue to possess the subjects acquired from Baillie under similar investitures as that in the charter 1619; and in 1798, the late Duke of Roxburghe granted to Lord Blantyre an heritable right to the teinds of his lands in the parish of Whittinghame, which was given effect to down to the present locality.

* Thus in the original.

As to the title in Sir Archibald Douglas, from the charter 1616 down to the acquisition by Hay of Drummelzier, that was a mere conveyance to the patronage of the church of Whittinghame. In 1628, the lands of Whittinghame and the patronage were conveyed to Arthur Douglas; and he, in 1632, obtained from Sir W. Hamilton, the lessee of the teinds of the parish of Whittinghame, an assignation to his lease, in so far as regarded the teinds of the lands. This was an important fact, as showing that Douglas had not an heritable right to the teinds of his lands of Whittinghame, and that he possessed them in virtue of the tack 1590; and it was so important, that Arthur Douglas got a parliamentary ratification of it in 1633. The next title, in 1642, in favour of Archibald, the son of Sir Arthur, omits the patronage. He was succeeded by his sister, and she by her son, the Master of Kingston, against whom an apprising was led of the lands of Whittinghame, with the teinds of that barony, but there is no mention of the patronage. That the apprising contained mention of the teinds, is no proof that they were in the debtor, as such decrees were made as broad as to comprehend every supposed right in the debtor; and here it could only carry the tack so far as the teinds of Whittinghame were concerned.

Hay of Drummelzier acquired right to this apprising, and was infeft in a Crown-charter of adjudication of the lands of Whittinghame, with the patronage of the parish church, "cum decimis ejusdem tam rectoris quam vicarii." The instrument of resignation and the quæquidem in the charter, show that it was in virtue of teinds being included in the apprising that they were put into the Crown-charter, and not in virtue of the Act 1690; and the quæquidem most incorrectly sets forth that the teinds belonged to Douglas of Whittinghame. This title has been renewed to the present day in the same terms, and in a similar way in the sale of the lands in 1817.

It is clear, and not disputed, that the right of patronage was in the proprietor of Whittinghame; that under his title to the lands he might prescribe a right to the teinds; and under the Act 1690, also a right to the teinds of the parish, to which there was no heritable right. Now, as to this last, if he was right in holding that the grant from the Crown in 1606 conveyed the titles (lands?) as well as the patronage of the church of Whittinghame (as the patronage only was conveyed to Douglas), and that the rest of the grant, so far as regarded the church of Whittinghame, became the property of Baillie, the teinds of the parish must now be in Baillie's disponees—the family of Roxburghe. They could not enter into actual possession, because the tack subsisted till about 1808, and so excluded the titular from drawing the teinds. But the titular was in possession through his tacksman. The tack was granted by the dean, and depended on his right, and again eventually supported the right of the successor of the dean. The only act of possession the titular could have during the currency of the tack, was to dispose of the teinds to each heritor, subject to the tack. This was accordingly done by the Duke of Roxburghe in 1798, in his deed to Lord Blantyre, and it has not been challenged either by the heirs of Baillie or Hay of Drummelzier. Even as to the teinds of the lands of Whittinghame, I do not see that the proprietor has secured a right to them. His possession, and that of his predecessors, till 1808, was in virtue of the assignation to the tack, ratified in Parliament in 1633—the heir of the tacksman being excluded from drawing the teind by the assignation, and the titular being excluded by the tack in favour of the tacksman and his heirs; and since the expiry of the tack, prescription has not run on his title. It is of consequence that there is proof of possession by the Roxburghe family by sales, as titulars in the parish of Dunbar. The sale to President Dalrymple is sufficient evidence of this. This was under the same title, either as dean of Dunbar, or as succeeding to the prebendary of Dunbar—which, his Lordship could not say; but the title to both was the same, viz., the right of patronage of those benefices, which, by possession, had been shown to convey right to the teinds which formerly were drawn by the members of the collegiate church, and by the patron when the benefice was vacant. His Lordship was for supporting the right of the Roxburghe family, and finding that the disposition to Lord Blantyre gave him an heritable right to his teinds.

Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

Lord Moncreiff also concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly (13th July)

"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find that the conveyance by John Duke of Roxburghe in favour of Lord Blantyre, of the teinds of the lands therein described, within the parish of Whittinghame, was granted by the titular of the said parish, and is a valid and effectual heritable right in favour of Lord Blantyre, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to remit to the Teind Clerk, with instructions to give effect to the said heritable right in rectifying the locality, and to prepare a final scheme of locality for the said parish: Find the Earl of Wemyss liable in expenses, after the date of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 2d March 1839: Appoint an account," &c.

Lord Ordinary, Murray.—For Duke of Roxburghe, H. J. Robertson, Baillie; W. H. Sands, W.S., Agent.—For Earl of Wemyss, A. Anderson, Mackenzie; Tod and Hill, W.S., Agents.—[G.D.F.]

20th July 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 279.—COLONEL ALEXANDER FINDLAY, Pursuer,
v. WILLIAM MACKINTOSH, Defender.

Process—Ranking and Sale—Writer's Hypothec—Lien—Circumstances in which, in a process of ranking and sale of an estate, the Court dispensed with the production of the title-deeds of the lands under sale.

In the process of ranking and sale of the estate of Millbank, belonging to the defender, which had been brought by Colonel Alexander Findlay, a postponed heritable creditor, Alexander Eneas Grant, writer in Nairn, who was trustee of the defender in virtue of a previous sequestration, was examined before the Sheriff-substitute of Nairn, under the usual commission and diligence from the Lord Ordinary in the ranking, and required to produce the title-deeds, writs and evidents, of the estate of which he was in possession as trustee; but he declined to do so, or to produce the act of sequestration and relative papers in his favour, on the allegation that they were hypothecated to him and Robert Roy, W.S., in security of business-accounts due to them by the defender. After this refusal, a correspondence ensued between the Edinburgh agents of the pursuer and of Grant, in regard to the production of the titles, but the agents having disagreed as to the conditions on which production should be made, recourse was had to the Lord Ordinary on the question, whether the process could competently proceed without production of the titles, which the pursuer maintained he was entitled to insist on; or whether, as Grant maintained, he was entitled to lodge them in process, against the express wish of the pursuer, to the effect thereby of obtaining a preference, primo loco, on the price, in payment of the accounts covered by the hypothec?

The Lord Ordinary (Murray for Cuninghame) pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th March 1842.—Having heard parties' procurators, before farther answer as to production of the title-deeds of the subjects under sale, over which a right of hypothec is claimed by Mr Grant, writer in Nairn, the holder of the same, as a security for payment of business-accounts alleged to be due to him and to Mr Robert Roy, W.S., by the common debtor,—Remits to Mr Gardiner, the common agent, to inquire into the facts, and to report to the Lord Ordinary quam primum, whether the proceedings can be properly carried on without production of the title-deeds in this process, and how far the want of these title-deeds could be otherwise supplied, and what effect the non-production of them in this process is likely to have upon the sale or the price to be obtained for the lands, keeping in view the amount of the sums in the said accounts so claimed, the amount of the heritable and other preferable debts secured over the estate, and the rights and interests both of the heritable and personal creditors, and his opinion as to the necessity or expediency of admitting the preference claimed under the said right of hypothec, in order to obtain production of these title-deeds in process."

The common agent reported as follows:

"The pursuer, Colonel Findlay, the party principally interested in opposing the production of the titles, is the holder, as already stated, of a security over the principal portion of the subjects embraced in the ranking for £1000;—it holds the second place among the heritable debts, a security for £2000 now held by Murdo Mackenzie, Esq. of Dundonnell, ranking first. The bond is dated 2d February 1822, and was originally granted in favour of Lachlan Mackintosh, Esq. of Raigmore, and others, as trustees for behoof of the Society for the Education of the Poor in the Highlands. By them it was assigned, in May 1826, to the Reverend Thomas Fraser and spouse, in conjunct fee and liferent, from whose heirs it was acquired by the present holder, Colonel Findlay, on payment merely of a consideration of £60, by disposition and assignation, dated 20th May 1841.

"The accounts for which the hypothec is claimed, and the admission of which the pursuer opposes, commence as far back as 1831, and appear to have been incurred under varied circumstances. Down to January 1833 the parties, Mr Alexander Æneas Grant and Mr Robert Roy, W.S., acted simply as the private agents of Mr Mackintosh. At that period, Mr Mackintosh, whose affairs had fallen into embarrassment, executed a voluntary trust, by a disposition of his whole property in favour of Mr Grant, in virtue of which Mr Grant was infeft in the subjects embraced in the present summons, by instrument of resignation and sasine, dated and recorded 13th February 1833. He appears also to have been invested in other subjects belonging to the common debtor, which were afterwards sold, but for what sums, and how the prices were applied, the reporter has no means of knowing.

"Mr Grant seems to have acted under this private trust down to November 1834, and to this period a considerable portion of the accounts apply. About that date Mr Mackintosh was sequestrated, and Mr Grant was appointed trustee on his estate, and the remainder of the accounts then relate principally to the transactions under the sequestration.

"The amount of the accounts in all for which a preference is claimed, is £982. 11. 10½.—£843. 4. 7. by Mr Grant, and £139. 7. 3½. by Messrs Roy and Wood.

"It may be proper to state, however, as a point not immaterial to the present discussion, that the common agent has gone over the accounts in question, and is humbly of opinion, that for the whole accounts a preference, in virtue of the agent's right of hypothec, could not be sustained, even supposing the titles are received under the claim. To state, however, the precise amount which the hypothec would not cover, would require an investigation and length of detail which could not be gone into in present circumstances; but the reporter has little doubt that the extent to which the preference claimed would fall to be disallowed would be far from inconsiderable.

"The debts claimed in the process are very large, compared with the value of the subjects.

"Thus, of heritable debts there are,—

"1. The bond already mentioned, held by Mr Mackenzie of Dundonnell, being the first security, . . .	£2000 0 0
(with such interest as may be due.)
"2. Colonel Findlay's bond, . . .	1000 0 0
"3. A bond in favour of Hugh Duff, Esq., and spouse, dated 18th August 1826, . . .	1000 0 0
"4. A bond, dated 28th November 1831, in favour of James Brown, junior, and Margaret Brown, . . .	400 0 0

"Only £250 of this bond, however, has yet been claimed.

"Amount of heritable debts, exclusive of interest, £4400 0 0

"While of personal debts, including the said accounts due to Mr Grant and Messrs Roy and Wood, claims are already lodged, exclusive of interest, for . . . £1599 0 0

In all, . . . £5999 0 0

"Being very far above the value of the subjects contained in the ranking,"—the probable value of which the common agent reported to be £2585. 12. 3.

In his report the common agent proceeded to set forth, after an examination of the register, what deeds he supposed the titles consisted of. The report then proceeded:

"From the foregoing enumeration of the titles, supposed to form the necessary progress which a purchaser would be entitled to require on a sale of the respective subjects, it will appear, in so far as regards the lands of Millbank proper, that the title is ex facie regularly made up; that the deeds, Nos. 2, 5 and 7 of that progress, being instruments of resignation and sasine; the disposition, No. 1, which has been recorded, and the retour, No. 4, might be supplied by extracts, but that the dispositions, Nos. 3 and 6, so far as appears, have not been registered, and could not therefore be supplied otherwise than by taking up the originals held in hypothec; and in so far as regards the field between the roads, that the title is also ex facie regular; that the deeds, Nos. 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 11 of that progress, being instruments of resignation and sasine, or writs on record, could be supplied by extracts, while, as it does not appear that they have been registered, there does not seem any means of supplying the places of the original dispositions, Nos. 1, 3, 5 and 10. In regard, again, to the progress applicable to the feudal subject (the Brae of Millbank), to supply their place by extracts, even if in every case practicable, would incur an expense altogether unequal to the value of the subject,"—the yearly value of which was stated at 30s.

As to the necessity or expediency of admitting the preference under the hypothec, the common agent stated his opinion as follows:

"Supposing, then, that the original titles are not taken up, and the proceedings carried on with either no titles at all, or defective, in so far as they cannot be supplied by extracts, the principal results which would follow would be, that the subjects must be sold, in all probability at least, more or less at an undervalue, in order to give a purchaser an equivalent for the imperfect progress, and that, in the ranking, the heritable securities could not be subjected to the same scrutiny which the common agent might otherwise have it in his power to give them had be the whole titles of the subjects before him. It is at least possible, although perhaps not very probable, that, on examination, such a flaw might be discovered to attach to the title in the person of the bankrupt as might cut down the preferences of the heritable creditors, and throw the price of the subjects open for general division.

"To what extent the want of a complete progress might affect the price, the reporter cannot venture an opinion. It is a matter that must depend in a great measure upon the views of an intending purchaser himself, and the desire he may have to become possessor of the property.

"Such, then, being the results in judging of the necessity of the titles being taken up, the reporter would merely observe, that, while there can be no doubt that not to have the titles produced is to adopt a course unusual in a process of ranking and sale, still, so far as he is aware, there is nothing in any of the Acts of Sederunt regulating the action of ranking and sale which directly requires that the procedure should not be carried on without the titles. By section 3 of the Act of Sederunt, 23d November 1711, it is provided, 'that after a process of sale is raised, the pursuer shall have diligence granted him against all havers of the writs of the debtor and bankrupt's estate, and the lands, to the effect the same may be timeously exhibited in the clerk's hands.' It is under the diligence authorised by this and similar clauses in other Acts of Sederunt that the titles are usually brought into process. In referring to it, Mr Darling, in his Forms of Process (p. 537), remarks,—'The title-deeds of the lands will be recovered under the diligence. If they be hypothecated in the hands of a law-agent, as generally happens, he will deliver them under a reservation of his right of hypothec, in virtue of which his claim will be ranked primo loco on the price of the subjects when sold, or he will be entitled to warrant on the factor to pay him out of the funds in his hands.—Mackenzie, 9th February 1793, M. 6254.'

"While, however, there seems to be no clause expressly requiring production of the title-deeds, it is also true that some of the regulations seem to proceed on the principle that the titles are accessible in the process. Thus, by section 7 of Act of Sederunt, 17th January 1756, it is provided, that 'the production in the ranking being closed in manner foresaid, the Lord Ordinary in the ranking shall assign a day to the common agent to make up a state of the interests produced, mentioning their rights and diligences, the sums claimed by the respective creditors, the order of their respective preferences, with such objections as occur to him either to the legality or to the justice of the several claims, or to the extent of their debts, or to their preferences, notwithstanding the apparent priority of their security or diligence.' And again, section 8 of the same Act provides, that 'after the state of the claims is made up as aforesaid, and reported to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship shall assign a day to the common debtor, and to the creditors producing as aforesaid, to make such other objections to the interests produced as they shall think proper, and to lodge them in writing with the clerk of the process against the day so assigned; with certification that all objections that shall be omitted to be proponed either by the common debtor or the common agent, or by the creditors, against the day so assigned, shall be held to be passed from by all parties concerned; and it shall not be competent to them, or either of them, thereafter to propone the same in the course of the ranking, or in the division of the price of the bankrupt's estate, unless such objections shall arise from facts newly come to their knowledge.' While, by section 7 of the Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1794, it is declared, that 'the common agent, after his nomination is confirmed by the Lord Ordinary, shall take the most effectual steps for ascertaining the nature and extent of the subjects belonging to the common debtor, together with the encumbrances affecting them, in order to which he shall, if necessary, cause search the public registers, and apply to the Lord Ordinary for letters of first and second diligence against havers.'

"These regulations may perhaps be viewed as proceeding on the assumption that the titles are in process, as, without them, full effect could not in general be given to their requirements. It is, however, for the Court to judge whether they render it a matter of necessity to order their production in every case.

"On the other hand, looking to the production of the titles as a matter of expediency, the question may be considered either in a general light, or with reference to this particular case.

"Regarding it as a general question, the reporter would merely remark, that if, on the one hand, the Court lay it down as a fixed principle, that in every case, without regard to circumstances, should any of the creditors require it, the titles are to be brought into process if they are accessible, there must necessarily occur many instances of individual hardship which the Court otherwise would be inclined to prevent. But then again, on the other hand, unless a fixed principle be adhered to, this evil must result, that in every case such as the present a door is thrown open for raising a question of circumstances, and the procedure becomes embarrassed with discussions and investigations. And further, it will, in most instances, come to be a matter in a great measure dependent upon the way in which a single creditor (the pursuer of the action) may think himself interested in the production. It may be very much against the interests of other creditors that the titles should be taken up; but if the pursuer wish it, he can in general force them into process, subject to such claims as may attach to them under the diligence for proving the rental, &c., that is, at a stage of the proceedings when none of the other creditors whose interest it may be to oppose the production, have for the most part appeared in the process.

"If, again, the question is viewed as one of expediency with reference to this particular case, its determination must depend very much upon the party whose interest may be looked upon as deserving chief consideration in the circumstances.

"There are here involved four different interests, viz., 1st, Colonel Findlay's, the holder of an active security for £1000, though purchased, it is true, at an undervalue. 2d, The agents', the holders of an indirect and passive security to the extent of nearly the same sum. 3d, The personal creditors', who have a material interest in having every means given for scrutinizing the heritable debts, and, if possible, reducing them, so as to throw the price of the subjects open for general division; and, 4th, The common debtor's who is clearly entitled to see that his property brings as large a price as possible, and that his debts are proportionally reduced either to one creditor or another. Whatever the subjects may sell for less than they would otherwise bring if sold with a complete title, is of course just so much lost to him.

"Such being the state of parties, it follows, from the statement already given of the probable value of the subjects, that Colonel Findlay's interest stands opposed to that of the agents, the personal creditors, and the common debtor. If, on the one hand, the titles are not taken up after the first heritable creditor is paid, there may remain a surplus from the price to meet a portion of Colonel Findlay's debt, the second heritable security. If, on the other hand, the titles are received under the hypothec in place of Colonel Findlay, an heritable creditor, the agents' profit, though at the same time the interest of the personal creditors is so far consulted as that a means not otherwise accessible is afforded of testing the validity of the heritable debts, and of making, if possible, the balance of the price available to the general body of the creditors, while the common debtor has the benefit of obtaining the full value of his property, and the consequent diminution of his debt. It is for the Court to determine as to these conflicting interests."

The Lord Ordinary (Cuninghame) pronounced the following interlocutor:

"21st June 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the motion of the personal creditors, that the titles of the subjects under sale shall be required from Mr Alexander Grant, formerly agent for the common debtor, and latterly trustee in the sequestration, under the usual reservation of his right of hypothec,—In respect that the present is a question of considerable importance in practice, and that it occurs in a process of ranking and sale, entitled to summary despatch, makes avizandum with the case to the Lords of the Second Division, and appoints printed copies of the common agent's report to be boxed quam primum, that it may be reported.

"Note.—The present process of ranking and sale is brought by a creditor who holds a second security for £1000 over the chief estate under sale. This security it is said he purchased lately, for the trifling sum of £60 Sterling.

"The property in question is rented at only £90 per annum, and there are four securities on it, extending in all to £4500. If these be unobjectionable, they will obviously far more than exhaust any probable price to be got for the lands, and leave no reversion to the personal creditors.

"In this view, the second heritable creditor states that he does not wish to recover the titles, as, if he took them out of the hands of the agent, unto whom they are hypothecated, the price would be subjected to a deduction, amounting to nearly £1000 Sterling, for the law accounts claimed by the agent. He therefore insists that this ranking and sale shall proceed without any exhibition or examination of the common debtor's titles to the subjects under sale.

"This appears to the Lord Ordinary to be a novel and very questionable form of proceeding. Lord Murray (acting for the Lord Ordinary during his indisposition) very properly directed the common agent to make a report as to the circumstances of this particular case, bearing on the question. A very distinct report by him accordingly has been put in, and it is now for the Court to determine whether they can sustain the motion made by the pursuer, to allow this process of judicial sale to proceed without the titles.

"The general rule is supposed to be clear, that in a process of ranking and sale the title-deeds of the whole properties under sale must be produced in an early stage of the cause. The reason for this is well explained by the common agent in his report, and is manifest on a short consideration. The titles of the common debtor are absolutely necessary, not merely for the satisfaction of purchasers, but for enabling the common agent and the Court to adjust the subsequent order of ranking. Till exhibition of the titles, non constat that any of the securities are unobjectionable. The titles of the common debtor afford the only satisfactory means of ascertaining the validity of the real creditors' security who pursue a ranking and sale, as, if there be any flaw in the debtor's title, it may affect every security that he has granted. Accordingly, it is expressly provided by the Act of Sederunt, 23d November 1711, § 3, 'That after a process of sale is raised, the pursuer shall have diligence granted him against all holders of the writs of the debtor and bankrupt's estate and lands, to the effect the same may be timeously exhibited in the clerk's hands.'

"The customary and regular mode of conducting such processes being thus fixed, the next question which occurs is, whether the pursuer is entitled to make an exception of the present case, and to have the sale carried through under the authority of the Court, without exhibition of the titles? The grounds on which the pursuer has urged this demand deserve consideration.

"1st, He brings into view the great amount of the accounts claimed by Mr Grant, and alleges that these will absorb nearly the whole free balance left for him as a secondary creditor. There is reason to think, from the common agent's report, that the amount of the balance which the hypothec will cover is considerably exaggerated by the pursuer. But, be it great or small, it is obvious that if the production of titles be dispensed with in the present case, a similar course must be sanctioned in every future case, where any creditor pursuing a ranking and sale finds it convenient to ask it. The Lord Ordinary therefore doubts if a rule of Court, salutary and proper for the protection of the public in perhaps nine-tenths of the cases in which processes of this sort are resorted to, ought to be departed from, because it may be attended with some hardship in an isolated case, on the holder of a postponed security.

"2d, The pursuer next referred to the case of Bell against Gordon's Trustees in 1838 (16 Shaw's Report, p. 657), in which it was found that a creditor might proceed to sell subjects extrajudicially under a clause of sale in his bond, without exhibition of the titles, which, as here, were hypothecated for a large account to intending offerers; and the pursuer added that he also had a clause of sale in his bond under which he could have sold the subjects extrajudicially. But the reference to that precedent appears to the Lord Ordinary to afford one of the strongest pleas against the pursuer in the present case. If he could have exposed these lands to sale extrajudicially under a special clause in his bond, why did he not take that course?

He must evidently have supposed that the judicial process of ranking and sale gave him some great and peculiar advantage; and, indeed, it is not easy to anticipate or to calculate what may be the extent of that advantage. It may be that the estate will sell for a fourth, a third, or one-half more on the title given in a process of ranking and sale, than what it will fetch when exposed by a bondholder without a process of writs.

"By the operation of a decree in a ranking and sale all prior encumbrances are wiped off,—the grounds of debt, in so far as legally preferable, are assigned to the creditors in corroboration of their title,—and posterior securities are extinguished—none of which advantages are obtained in an extrajudicial sale by a bondholder; and the short question which the Court have to determine is, whether the Court will give a creditor the great advantages thus conferred by a decree in the process of judicial sale, without a strict compliance with all the salutary rules of Court framed for the purpose of expiating the titles, both of debtor and creditors, and of insuring an ultimate appropriation of the price to those whose securities are legally unimpeachable?

"The Lord Ordinary must add, that if the rules of Court regulating the forms of this important process are to be dispensed with in any case, he has great doubt if a party like the pursuer, who confessedly acquired his claim for a mere trifle, after the bankruptcy of the debtor, should be viewed as a creditor entitled to such a boon."

At advising (16th July),

Lord Justice-Clerk said, that he had considered this question very attentively, and the opinion he had formed of it he had written down in such a form, that if it coincided with the views of their Lordships, it might form the interlocutor for the disposal of the case. He would, with the permission of their Lordships, read his opinion. His Lordship then said,—1st, That the common debtor does not in this case appear to state any objection to the non-production of the titles. 2d, That the titles of the heritable property included in the ranking and sale were in the possession of the personal creditors and of the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the common debtor for several years before the said process of ranking and sale was instituted, and that they had thus a full opportunity of considering the state of the said titles, and of bringing forward any objections thereto, by which the preferences of the heritable creditors might have been set aside. 3d, That, on the report of the common agent, it appears that the value of the estate, at the highest computation, will not pay off the heritable securities affecting the same. 4th, That no statement has been made that there exists any objection to the common debtor's titles by which the personal creditors could derive any benefit from their production, or be enabled to reduce any of the heritable securities. 5th, That the effect of ordering production of the titles would in this case only be to enable the trustee in the sequestration, who has a hypothec over the same, and who is stated to have a right of recourse against the personal creditors as his employers in the business for which he holds the titles to be hypothecated, to obtain payment out of the price of the lands, at the expense of the heritable creditor, who is the pursuer of the ranking and sale, and that such result would, in the circumstances of the case, be unjust to the said pursuer, Colonel Findlay. 6th, That Colonel Findlay has, by a minute lodged in process, guaranteed that the estimated value of the lands under sale, mentioned by the common agent in his report, being £2585, should be offered therefor, if the same are exposed to sale without production of the titles, and that the pursuer was willing to consign in the Royal Bank, or in such other bank as the Court might appoint, the said sum of £2585, being the amount of the said estimated value, in order to secure that a sum to this extent shall be available in the ranking. 7th, That, according to the report of the common agent, it appears that the estimated value of the estate is not likely ever to pay off the debts to which Colonel Findlay is in right, and that in such circumstances, the pursuer of the ranking and sale insists that he shall be allowed to proceed in the process, although the titles are not produced, and, lastly, in respect that there is no incompetency in allowing the sale to proceed, although the titles are not produced, Find it to be unnecessary to pronounce any opinion on the general point to which the report of the common agent relates: Refuse to pronounce any order for the production of the titles of the common debtor; ordain the ranking and sale to proceed, and the articles of roup to be framed in such terms as not to imply any obligation to deliver or make forthcoming the titles: Reserving, in the event of the estate not being sold, to the parties interested again to apply to the Lord Ordinary, if they can show that the sale has failed owing to the non-production of the titles; and reserving all other questions which may arise after the sale between Colonel Findlay and the personal creditors."

Lord Medwyn concurred in the opinion now read. It was just his view, and he regarded this as entirely a special case. His Lordship observed, that in pronouncing a judgment in these terms, he did not consider that the Court were deciding any general question. He thought the opinion might just form the interlocutor for the case.

Lord Moncreiff.—If this had been the ordinary case, he could not have got over the Act of Sederunt. But it was a special case altogether, in which it was but plain justice to approve of the case proceeding without production of the titles. His Lordship concurred in the terms of the opinion read by the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I take it for granted that the pursuer will give in a minute offering the value stated in the report.

Dean of Faculty stated, that a minute would be given in before the rising of the Court.

The Court intimated that it was unnecessary to ask expenses, as their Lordships were agreed against allowing any.

Of this date (20th July) a minute was given in, making offer of the upset price; and the Court pronounced an interlocutor in the terms, within quotation, in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lords Ordinary, Murray and Cuningbame.—Act. Dean of Faculty (Wood); J. and W. Jollie, W.S., Agents.—Act. Inglis, for Mackenzie of Dundonnell; T. Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.—Shand, for Grant and Roy; John Shand, W.S., Agent.—James Gardiner, W.S., Common Agent.—[G.D.F.]

23d September 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 280.—SIR JAMES GIBSON-CRAIG, Bart, Appellant, v. SIR THOMAS JOHN COCHRANE, Bart, and OTHERS, Respondents.

Superior and Vassal—Liferent and Fee—Held competent for a superior, uninfest, to dispose the fee of the superiority to one party, and the liferent to another, with power to the latter to enter vassals; and the entry of a vassal by the liferenter in the exercise of this power held to be effectual.

Superior and Vassal—Circumstances in which the title of a vassal was sustained, who had entered with a superior whose title was defective, but had subsisted on record, unimpeached, for nearly forty years,—had been twice declared by the Court of Session to be valid, and acquiesced in as such by parties having an adverse claim to it.

The superiority of the estate of Murdieston was part of the entailed estates of the dukedom of Hamilton, and the dominium utile was possessed in fee-simple by Alexander Inglis, who in 1719 executed an entail of the lands (alleged to be defective in one of the prohibitions) in favour of his nephew, Alexander Hamilton Inglis, and a series of substitutes. On the entailor's death, Alexander Hamilton Inglis, the institute, made up titles, and was duly infest under the entail; and on his death in 1712 (leaving four sons, Alexander, Gavin, James and Walter), his eldest son, Alexander, entered with the superior as heir of entail by precept of clare constat, and was duly infest. In August 1772, Douglas Duke of Hamilton expedé, upon his own procuratory, a charter of resignation of the superiority of Murdieston and others, in favour of himself and the heirs of entail of the dukedom; and on 22d September 1772, his Grace's commissioners, upon the narrative of the Act, 20 Geo. II., c. 50, empowering the sale of the superiorities of their lands to vassals, sold and disposed to Alexander H. Inglis the superiority of Murdieston—the Duke and his heirs of entail being taken bound to infest Inglis therein, and the Crown-charter and unexecuted precept being assigned to him for infestment. No infestment passed in favour of Inglis under this disposition, and on 24th September 1772, he sold and disposed one-half of the superiority to his younger brother, General James Hamilton Inglis, in liferent, and Duke Douglas and his heirs and assignees in fee; and the other half to his next brother, Walter Inglis, in liferent, and Duke Douglas and his heirs and assignees in fee, with full power to the liferenters in both halves to enter vassals, receive compositions, &c. These dispositions contained assignation to the still unexecuted precept in the Crown-charter of resignation by Duke Douglas; and infestment accordingly passed upon it in favour of the two liferenters, and Duke Douglas, the fiar. Walter Inglis then died, which cleared the Duke's title to the one-half of the superiority liferented by Walter; and in 1786 Alexander Hamilton Inglis died, and was succeeded by his immediate younger brother, Gavin. Gavin made up his title by taking infestment, in June 1787, as nearest and lawful heir of tailzie to his brother, Alexander, upon a precept of clare constat in his favour, granted by General James Hamilton Inglis, the liferenter, and the commissioners of Duke Douglas, the fiar, of one-half of the estate liferented by General James, and lawful superiors of the other half.

Duke Douglas died in March 1801, and was succeeded in the dukedom and entailed estates by Duke Archibald, who was not, however, his heir-at-law. Under a general trust-disposition by Duke Douglas, of all his unentailed estates for the benefit of his natural daughter, Mrs Westenra, and Mrs Harriet Pye Esten, these parties, on being vested by the trustees with the superiority of the whole lands of Murdieston, sold it to Sir Alexander Inglis Cochrane. Meantime, Duke Archibald proceeded to make up his title to the superiority of Murdieston, as if the charter 1772 had been open, and the precept on it had not been exhausted. He expedé in 1801 a service as heir-male of tailzie of Duke Douglas under the charter 1772, and thereon took infestment, inter alia, in the superiority of Murdieston. On Gavin Inglis Hamilton's death, his succession was taken up by his brother, General James Inglis Hamilton, who proceeded to make up his titles to the estate, first, in regard to that portion of the lands of which he previously held the liferent superiority, by expeding in his own favour a precept of clare constat, which designed him as "immediate lawful superior in the liferent of the lands, &c., after mentioned, with power to enter vassals," &c., and bore under the usual heads,—

"(1.) That Gavin Inglis Hamilton, Esq., late of Murdieston, my brother-german, died last test and seized as of fee, &c.:

(2.) That I, bearer hereof, am immediate younger brother to the said deceased Gavin Inglis Hamilton, last of Murdieston, and nearest and lawful heir of tailzie to him in the said lands, &c. (3.) That the lands are holden immediately of and under me in liferent, and the said deceased noble duke (Duke Douglas), his heirs or assignees, in fee."

On this precept General Inglis Hamilton was infeft in June 1802. To the other portion of Murdieston, of the superiority of which his brother Walter Inglis had been liferenter, and Duke Douglas fiar, the General did not immediately make up a title, and while still on apperency as to this portion of the estate, and proceeding on the alleged defect in the entail of 1719, he, in June 1802, executed an entail of the whole estate of Murdieston in favour of his natural son, Captain, afterwards Colonel James Hamilton, and his heirs male and female, whom failing, to the late Sir Alexander Inglis Cochrane—thus altering the destination in the entail 1719. In compliance with the provisions of this new entail, General Inglis Hamilton was, in September 1802, served and retoured heir "in special and of line" to his brother, Gavin Inglis, and thereafter, Archibald Duke of Hamilton, or the heir of Duke Douglas whoever he might be, was charged to obtain himself entered and infeft as heir of the deceased Duke Douglas in the superiority, and being so infeft, to grant all onecessary writs for completing the General's titles to the lands, after the form and tenor of his special retour as heir to Gavin. Duke Archibald accordingly granted a precept of clare constat to the General for infefting him. This precept contained a reference to the entail 1719, but did not contain the destination, nor describe General Inglis Hamilton as heir under the conditions of the entail. On this precept the General was infeft in November 1802, and on his death, Colonel James Hamilton, the institute under the new entail, succeeded, and was infeft in 1803, and possessed till his death, without issue, in 1815. Sir Alexander Inglis Cochrane succeeded, and was served heir of tailzie and provision to him in November 1815.

In 1816, Duke Archibald brought a reduction-improbation against the trustees and beneficiaries under Duke Douglas's trust, Lord Stanley, his Grace's heir of line, and Sir Alexander Cochrane, on the ground that the sale of the superiority of Murdieston, under 20 Geo. II., c. 50, was carried through in contravention of the Statute and of the Hamilton entail, and calling for reduction—(1.) of the disposition of the superiority by Duke Douglas's commissioners; (2.) of the disposition by Alexander Inglis to his brothers in liferent, and Duke Douglas in fee; (3.) of their several infeftments; (4.) of the trust-disposition executed by Duke Douglas; and (5.) of the conveyance to Mrs Westenra, and any contract or other title obtained by Sir Alexander Cochrane.

Sir Alexander Cochrane, the defender's father, and Miss Hamilton (afterwards Mrs Westenra), appeared in the action, and in June 1817, the Lord Ordinary (Pitmilley) sustained the reasons of reduction, &c. Several representations were lodged against this judgment, which were refused, and before a reclaiming petition to the Inner-House, lodged in September 1818, could be heard, Duke Archibald died in February 1819. In June 1819, the defenders, by a minute, withdrew from the litigation, and on 11th June 1819, the Court, without Duke Alexander being sisted as pursuer in place of the deceased Duke Archibald, "adhered, of consent, to the interlocutor complained of" (Lord Pitmilley's).

In July 1820, Sir Alexander Cochrane was infeft on a precept of clare constat by Duke Alexander, as heir of tailzie and provision to Colonel Hamilton, the institute in the entail 1802. On Sir Alexander's death, his son, Sir Thomas John Cochrane, succeeded, and entered as heir of tailzie and provision to his father, by a precept of clare constat by Duke Alexander, on which infeftment followed in May 1832. Some time after Sir Alexander's death, Duke Alexander attempted to cure the defect in the decree of 11th June 1819, by having it reduced, and the process in which it was pronounced awakened and revived in his own name; and after some procedure, the same judgment which had been pronounced on 11th June 1819, was repeated in the awakened process.

In 1833, Sir James Gibson-Graig, as adjudging creditor of Dr Ramsay, the heir of entail of the dominium utile of Murdieston under the entail 1719, brought a reduction of the precept of clare constat by General Inglis Hamilton to himself, and sasine thereon; the brieve and retour of service of the General to his brother Gavin; the precept of clare constat by Duke Archibald to the General, and sasine thereon; the General's deed of tailzie 1802, and sasine thereon; and the writs and sasines under which the titles of the succeeding substitutes of that tailzie had been made up. The grounds of this action, and the pleas of Sir Thomas John Inglis Cochrane in defence, are fully reported ante, Vol. XI. pp. 5 and 6, and are also fully referred to in the following opinion of Lord Cottenham.

The Court of Session, on 10th July 1838, sustained the defences; and an appeal being taken by Sir James Gibson-Craig,— Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, in this case it appears that the entail of 1719 not having been properly fenced, General Inglis Hamilton, who became entitled under it to the property in question, in 1802 created a new entail, under which the defender claims. The pursuer, who claims under the entail of 1719, does not pretend that that entail was incapable of being destroyed, but contends that it was not effectually destroyed by the act of General Inglis Hamilton in 1802, upon the ground that the supposed superior, through whom it was effected, had not at that time a proper feudal title so as to enable him to give effect to it. This objection was, in the course of the cause, attempted to be supported upon various grounds, which have been since abandoned, and with good reason, as the answers given upon those points were conclusive. I propose, therefore, to confine my observations to those points which were still insisted upon in the cases before this House, and by the arguments of counsel at the bar. The superiority which had belonged to Douglas Duke of Hamilton was by him conveyed to Alexander Inglis, who conveyed it, as to one moiety of the lands, to General Inglis Hamilton for life, and to the Duke of Hamilton in fee; and as to the other moiety, to Walter Hamilton for life, and to the Duke in fee. General Inglis Hamilton completed his title under a precept of clare constat granted by himself as superior; and the first objection to his title was, that being a liferenter by constitution, he had no power to enter vassals. Had he been merely a liferenter by constitution, without more, the objection might have been good; but it has no application to the present case, for it was not in that character that he assumed the power, but under an express grant and conveyance from Alexander Inglis Hamilton, in whom the whole superiority was vested, "of full power to him, General Inglis Hamilton, during his life, to enter and receive all vassals in the said lands, and receive the composition due by law therefor, fully and freely in all respects, without the consent of the Duke and his foresaids, the far of the said lands,"—Alexander Inglis by the same deed conveying the superiority to him, General Inglis Hamilton, in liferent, and the fee to Douglas Duke of Hamilton. That the owner of the superiority might dispose of that part of it which consisted in the right of entering vassals to such persons and for such interests as he might think fit, is not disputed. It was therefore competent for him to convey it to the liferenter. To say that it would not pass as incident to the conveyance of the life estate, proves nothing, and no authority has been referred to for the purpose of proving that the owner of the superiority could not so grant this power; and if it was competent to him so to deal with, and dispose of this power, he, beyond all doubt, did so dispose of it in favour of General Inglis Hamilton by this deed. This objection, therefore, wholly fails. That Alexander Inglis was not himself enfeoffed, is not insisted upon as affecting his right to pass any interest in the estate to which he had a personal title, as with such interest he conveyed the means of obtaining the proper feudal title; but it is urged by the appellant, upon the supposition that General Inglis Hamilton's power of entering vassals was in exercise of a right vested in Alexander Inglis, and so exercised by virtue of an authority from him for that purpose; and as he, not being himself enfeoffed, could not enter vassals, it is urged that he could not delegate that power to others; all which reasoning assumes that General Inglis Hamilton acted, not by virtue of an interest or estate in the superiority vested in himself, but by virtue of a power delegated to him by Alexander Inglis, by virtue of the superiority remaining in him, Alexander, which was not the fact; and yet upon this misapprehension the whole of the first reason of the appellant's case is founded. The second reason stated in the appellant's case was, that James Inglis Hamilton had no power to grant a precept of clare constat in his own favour as nearest and lawful heir of tailzie to Gavin Inglis, without establishing, in the first place, the death of Gavin, and the extinction of his heirs, in terms of the entail of 1719. That Gavin did in fact die without issue, entitled under the entail, and that General Inglis Hamilton was at the time entitled, as next heir of tailzie under that entail, is not disputed, and that he made up his title as such, is proved by the retour of his special service of the 7th of September 1804, printed in the 82d page of the appellant's case, which states the death of Gavin, and that James Inglis Hamilton was the proprius et legitimus hæres tailzie, and the other documents referred to in the appendix to the appellant's case. He stands, therefore, upon the record as nearest heir of tailzie, which character it is not disputed that he in fact holds. As to this portion of the estate, it appears to me that the objections raised to the respondents' title are not maintainable. As to the second portion of the estate, as to which, in September 1772, the superiority was conveyed to Duke Douglas in fee, and Walter Hamilton in liferent, the objection was, that Archibald Duke of Hamilton had not made up a legal title to the superiority when he granted the precept of clare constat in favour of General Inglis Hamilton, and that it was therefore null and void; and the objection to Duke Archibald's title is alleged by the appellant to consist in this, that the precept of sasine contained in the Crown-charter of 1772 was exhausted by the sasine taken in favour of Duke Douglas in fee, and Walter Hamilton in liferent, and consequently that the enfeoffment taken by Duke Archibald in 1801 upon the same precept, was inept and null. The facts appear to be, that Duke Douglas, holding the superiority in tail, under which Duke Hamilton was heir, was not justified in taking to himself the fee in 1772, and consequently, in 1801, Duke Archibald procured himself to be served as heir of entail, and took enfeoffment accordingly under the precept in the charter of 1772, which was in favour of Duke Douglas and his heirs of entail. The enfeoffment thus taken by Duke Archibald was in conformity with the precept and the charter, which the enfeoffment of Duke Douglas was not; and in 1802, when General Inglis Hamilton made up his title under the clare constat from Duke Archibald, he the Duke appeared upon the record as regularly enfeoffed of the superiority; but this is not all, for as if to remove all possibility of error, General Inglis Hamilton previously obtained letters of horning against superiors, directed to the heir of line of Duke Douglas, to the trustees under his trust-settlement, and to Duke Archibald, calling upon them severally to obtain himself entered and enfeoffed, and to complete the title of him, General Inglis Hamilton, to the dominium utile. Neither of the former parties made any claim under this proceeding, but permitted Duke Archibald to take enfeoffment as before stated, and thus to become feudally vested in the superiority, and so he continued enfeoffed up to the time of his death, and those who claim after him under the same title so continued enfeoffed up to the present time. The vassal, therefore, in this case, did all that could be done to ensure his own title; and if, after all this, any objection can be raised to such title through any supposed defect in the title of such superior, it is obvious that it will be impossible in many cases for vassals to obtain unimpeachable titles. Apprehensions are expressed on the part of the appellant, of the grounds upon which the Court of Session proceeded upon this point, but such apprehensions appear to me to be wholly misplaced. Not only danger to property, but necessary insecurity would arise from the Court having recognised the doctrine contended for by the appellant. This question, indeed, does not appear to have been decided for the first time in the present proceeding, for in 1817, Duke Archibald raised a process of reduction and declarator for reducing the title made up by Duke Douglas in 1772, and separatim for having it found and declared that Duke Archibald, by the aforesaid title completed in 1801, had the only right and title to the property, which included the superiority in question, and that the title so made up in 1801 constituted the only good right and title; and in that process decree in terms of the conclusions of the libel was pronounced by Lord Pitmilley, and adhered to by the Court; and owing to some alleged informality in those proceedings, a decree has since been pronounced in terms of Lord Pitmilley's interlocutor. It appears, therefore, that the title to the superiority under which General Inglis Hamilton made up his title in 1802, and under which the respondent now claims, has not only been the title upon record for nearly forty years, but that the Court of Session has twice declared that it constitutes the only good right and title to such superiority; and in this title, all persons who could have claimed the superiority by adverse title have acquiesced. By the English law of copyholds, the copyholder can only complete his title through the intervention of the Lord, but the act of the Lord is considered as merely ministerial; and if the title of the copyholder was capable of being affected by any defect in the title of the Lord, this tenure, now sufficiently inconvenient, would become perfectly intolerable. This is a case of purely Scotch conveyancing, in which this House would, under any circumstances, be very unwilling to act in opposition to the unanimous opinion of the Judges of the Court of Session by whom the case was decided. I have, however, in this, as in all other such cases which have come before this House, thought it my duty to examine the authorities cited, and the arguments urged against the judgment appealed from, and I have had much satisfaction in finding so much of reasoning and authority in support of a judgment which I consider of the highest importance to the security of property in Scotland. I therefore move your Lordships to affirm the interlocutor appealed from, with costs.

Interlocutor affirmed, with costs.

First Division.—Lords Ordinary, Cockburn and Cuninghame.
—George Webster, Appellant's Solicitor.—Richardson and Connell, Respondents' Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

23d September 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 281.—ELIZABETH IRVINE or DOUGLAS, Wife of Lord William Robert Keith Douglas,—the said LORD W. R. KEITH DOUGLAS, and MISS CHRISTIAN CHARLES IRVINE, Appellants, v. JOHN KIRKPATRICK, Esq., Respondent.

Passive Titles.—Where three sisters were served as heiress-portioners of their father, for the purpose of conveying Scotch estate to the trustees of the marriage-settlement of one of them, in which settlement the father provided the heiress in one-third of his estate (subject to his power of disposal, legacies, &c.)—Held that the service inferred a legal representation of the father by all the sisters, and liability for his debts,—the other sisters having joined in the service, and in conveying the Scotch estate in implement of a direction in the father's general settlement, from which they took benefit.

Jurisdiction—The Court of Session held to have jurisdiction, ratione contractus, over an heiress-portioner domiciled in England, and personally cited during a residence in Scotland of less than forty days, in respect she was liable for the debts of her father on the passive titles, as having been served to a Scotch estate, for the purpose of conveying it away in implement of her father's general settlement, from which she took benefit, and as possessed of a mid-superiority alleged to be of little value.

Process—Parties called—Held to be no objection to a process against heiress-portioners, for making them liable on the passive titles for the ancestor's debts, that the trustees under the ancestor's settlement, who were resident in England, and vested by the settlement with a right to take up and administer the ancestor's whole estate, real and personal, had not been called.

Mr Charles Irvine, for many years a planter in Tobago, died in Scotland in 1798, leaving a widow, two brothers, Walter and Christopher, and four sisters. By deeds of sale or assignation, executed in December 1798 and June 1800, Walter, the heir of Charles in heritage, purchased from his brother Christopher, and his sisters, and from the widow, the shares of Charles's executry to which they were respectively entitled. The present pursuer is the only child of Isabella Irvine, one of these sisters, and the residuary legatee of the other two sisters, Anne and Margaret, both deceased, and as such brought the present action in 1837 against the defenders, Lady Douglas and Miss Irvine, as co-heiresses and representatives of their deceased father, Walter Irvine, concluding for reduction, on the ground of fraud, of the foresaid transaction by which Charles's executry was purchased by Walter, and for payment of £50,000, or such other sum as should be found to be the value of that executry. Lady Keith Douglas was domiciled in Scotland at the date of the action, but the other defender, Miss Christian Irvine, when personally cited in Scotland, had been there less than forty days, on a visit to her sister, and had her domicile in England.

In the circumstances now to be mentioned, the defenders pleaded—1. That they were not their father's representatives; and, 2. In regard to Miss Irvine, that she was not amenable to the Scotch Courts.

Walter Irvine died domiciled in England. On the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth, the defender, with Lord Douglas, he by indenture became bound to devise and secure to the marriage trustees one-third of the free real and personal estate he should die possessed of (after payment of annuities and legacies, and subject to a power of disposal during his lifetime), for the purpose of paying over to the defender, Lady Douglas, exclusive of her husband's control, the yearly rents and profits of the said third of his estate during the subsistence of the marriage,—the said yearly rents and profits, on the death of either of the spouses, to be paid by the trustees to the survivor, and on the death of the survivor, the whole capital and income to be distributed by the trustees in a certain order and manner among the children of the marriage. It was expressly stipulated in the indenture that Lady Douglas should accept of the said provision in lieu and full satisfaction of all dower, third, or other legal claim. Walter Irvine died in 1823, having previously executed in England a will and settlement in the English form (incapable of conveying Scotch heritage), by which he conveyed and made over to certain persons, as his trustees and executors, his whole heritable and personal estate, wherever situated, for certain purposes; inter alia, 1st, he directed his daughters to make up titles to, and convey to the foresaid marriage trustees, in fulfilment of the provisions of the marriage indenture in favour of Lord and Lady Douglas, the testator's heritable estate in Fifeshire (believed to amount to about one-third of his whole estate); 2d, he directed the testamentary trustees to set apart, and hold in trust, two sums of £35,000 each, for behoof of the testator's two unmarried daughters, Christian (defender), and Catherine (since deceased), and their families,—the trustees holding the capital sums in trust, and paying over to the Misses Irvine the annual income during their lives. The residue of the property, after the purposes of the trust were provided for, was appointed to be held in trust by these trustees for the three daughters, under similar conditions to those attached to the specific bequests in their favour.

On Walter Irvine's death the trustees and executors accepted and took possession of his property. The daughters, in July 1824, were served and retoured heiresses-portioners of line in special to their father, and proceeded, sine beneficio inventarii, to make up titles to his Scotch heritable property, 1st, by taking infestment in the Fifeshire estates on a precept from Chancery proceeding on the foresaid retour; 2d, by expediting a Crown-charter of resignation, upon which they were infest in certain lands, to the superiorities of which their father had only a personal title, although infest in the dominium utile; 3d, by thereafter taking up the dominium utile of these lands by precept of clare constat granted in their own favour, on which they were infest; and, 4th, by taking up certain lands held by their father under subject-superiors, by precepts of clare from these superiors, on which they were infest. They thereafter, along with the trustees under the will, disposed and conveyed, with a double holding, to the foresaid marriage trustees, in implement of the direction in the marriage indenture, the testator's lands in Scotland thus taken up by them. On the precept in this disposition these trustees were base infest, and never having obtained confirmation of their title from the superior, the mid-superiority of the lands remained in Walter Irvine's daughters.

In these circumstances the defenders maintained the pleas in defence, fully stated ante, Vol. X. pp. 303 and 522.

The Court, by interlocutors on 17th February and 23d June 1838, sustained their jurisdiction, and repelled the preliminary defences as to both defenders.

The defenders appealed.

Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, this appeal is upon preliminary defences only, and does not touch the merits of the question between the parties; but as the relative situation of the parties is material to the consideration of these preliminary defences, a short statement of the transactions impeached is necessary to explain the opinion I have formed on these defences. Walter Irvine had a brother, Charles, and several sisters. Charles died domiciled in Scotland, and his property thereupon became divisible between Walter and his sisters. Walter entered into arrangements with his sisters, by which he purchased their shares in Charles's property. This took place in 1800. The respondent (the pursuer) represents the sisters, and impeaches this transaction as fraudulent; and the object of the suit is to reduce and set aside this transaction, and to obtain payment of the property of Charles, received by Walter, which, but for this transaction, would have come to the sisters. The deeds in question were executed in Scotland, and Walter had an estate in Scotland which he did not dispose of according to the forms of the law of Scotland. He died domiciled in England, and left three daughters, the appellants, Elizabeth, the wife of Lord William Douglas, and Christian Irvine, and Catherine, who has since died unmarried. The domicile of Lord and Lady William Douglas was in Scotland, and as to them there is no question of jurisdiction, but the domicile of Christian was in England. She was, however, at the time process was served upon her, in Scotland, upon a visit to her sister, Lady William Douglas, but she had not been there forty days. Walter's will was proved in England by Lord William Douglas, and two other executors; but although Lord William Douglas is a defender, the summons does not seem to seek to make him liable in that character of executor, but is addressed to the daughters of Walter Irvine as his heirs-portioners, or otherwise served "and retoured to him, or as otherwise representing him on one or other of the passive titles known in law." It appears, that upon the death of Walter, his three daughters, the two appellants, and Catherine, deceased, were served and retoured heirs-portioners of Walter, and that they completed their feudal titles as such to part of the property. Walter was also entitled to the superiority, and other parts he held under other superiors; and the heirs-portioners completed their title to the superiority to which Walter had been so entitled, as well as to the dominium utile of the whole. Upon this statement of the facts, if there had been nothing else in the case, there would not, I apprehend, have been any doubt of the liability of these heirs-portioners to answer to any creditors of the deceased, they having so taken possession of his estates and made up their titles without any inventory or protection against such liability. It was, indeed, said, that the pursuer was not for this purpose to be considered as a creditor, because it was necessary for him, in the first instance, to reduce and set aside the assignment which Walter had obtained from his sisters. But the object of the suit is to obtain from those who represent Walter, those parts of the funds of his brother, Charles, which by law devolved to his sisters. If the right to those funds be established, the claim of the pursuer will be strictly that of a creditor. Why, therefore, is he to be deprived of the mode of obtaining payment of his debt, which the law of Scotland allows to other creditors, because a preliminary question must be decided in his favour before his title as a creditor can arise. Every disputed debt requires an adjudication establishing it, before the title to the remedy can be applied. No case has been cited to establish this distinction between the present claim and the claim to any other debt; and there does not appear to be any ground for it upon principle. It was there said, that if the pursuer was entitled to the ordinary remedy of a creditor, the defenders, as heirs-portioners, are in nowise liable to be sued for such debt; and the reason assigned was, that they took nothing from the debtor whose estate they inherited. This was attempted to be made out from the provisions of the settlement made upon the marriage of Lady William Douglas, by which Walter Irvine, her father, covenanted that she should have, for the purposes of her settlement, one-third in value of the property he might be possessed of at the time of his death, but subject to an absolute power of disposition in his lifetime, and a power by will to charge the property with such legacies and annuities, and other charges, as he might think proper, to any extent. This one-third in value would only be what should remain after payment of his debts. If, therefore, his real estate in Scotland was subject to the present claim, it was so subject in preference to any claim under the covenant. Walter, by his will, directed that his Scotch estate should be settled on the trusts of Lady William Douglas's settlement, in execution of his covenant, and he gave £35,000 to each of his other daughters, and the residue equally between the three; and so well aware was he that he had no power by such will to dispose of the Scotch estate, that he directed that all his daughters should concur in the disposition of it, and if they refused so to do, that the principle of election, according to the English law, should be applied to them. Upon his death, the daughters, as heirs-portioners, became entitled to the Scotch estate, and they and each of them might have held and enjoyed it, or her portion of it, as such heirs-portioners, but they could not do so, and at the same time claim the benefit of the provision intended for them by their father's will. They therefore concurred in carrying his intentions into effect, and in conveying the estate to the trustees of Lady William Douglas's settlement, that is, they sold their interest in the estate for the benefits provided for them by the will, and then it is said, that they were not lucrati by the inheritance to which they succeeded. Had they merely succeeded to this inheritance, or elected to enjoy the estate as heirs-portioners, they would have been lucrati to the value of their shares; but, responsible for their father's debts, are they to escape from this responsibility, because, instead of being lucrati to the amount of their shares, they are enabled, by conveying such shares for the purposes of Lady William Douglas's settlement, to procure for themselves the benefits provided for them by the will, which probably exceeded the value of such shares. The cases referred to, in which heirs having no beneficial interest in the estate make up their titles only for the purpose of conveying it to those who are beneficially entitled to it, can have no application to this case. The appellants, therefore, are heirs-portioners lucrati, who have made up their titles, and entered as such without the benefit of inventory, and so become liable to the pursuer's suit. It was said that the trustees of Walter Irvine, that is, those who proved his will in England, ought to have been parties, but independently of the answer, that none of them except Lord William Douglas were in Scotland, the objection assumes, that an heir who has incurred the passive representation by his mode of dealing with the estate, cannot be sued by a creditor without also suing the personal representative, for which there does not appear to be any authority. The remaining ground of the appeal is, that the appellant, Christian Irvine, was not liable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, because her domicile was English, and she had not been in Scotland forty days before service of the process. But this domicile, after forty days, for the purpose of jurisdiction only, does not seem to apply where the Court had original jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and certainly does not apply where the party served is sought to be affected by virtue of property in Scotland. In the present case, the subject-matter of the suit is the property of Charles, the brother of Walter Irvine, who was a domiciled Scotchman. The deeds sought to be set aside were executed in Scotland, and respected that property; and the liability sought to be attached upon the defenders, the appellants, depends upon their mode of dealing as heirs-portioners with a Scotch estate. The forty days are required where the jurisdiction is assumed ratione domicilii; but if Christian Irvine was subject to the jurisdiction at the time she entered upon and made up her titles to the land, can she escape from that jurisdiction (being personally served), upon the ground that her domicile was English and that she had not been forty days in Scotland, and was there only upon a visit? If jurisdiction once attached ratione contractus, it continues to operate although the defender has her domicile elsewhere. If it were necessary, in order to support the jurisdiction, to show that she had immoveable property in Scotland at the time the citation was served, it appears that the fact is established that she is still possessed of the superiority of part of the estate. It was said, indeed, that it was of no value; but that does not appear. The appellants' argument seems to assume, that if a person not domiciled in Scotland incurs a passive representation by dealing with the estate of the debtor, and therefore becomes liable to the jurisdiction of the Courts in Scotland, so long as he continues to hold such estate, he can escape from such liability, and bid defiance to that jurisdiction, if he sells the estate, though personally served with process, if he has not resided forty previous days in Scotland. No authority has been referred to in support of such proposition, and there does not appear to be any reason to support it. If a Court have jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and the party against whom the claim is made be properly brought before it for the purpose of resisting it, there does not appear to be any reason for the Court declining to exercise such jurisdiction. Such is the rule in this country, and I see no ground for extending a contrary rule in Scotland beyond what the established practice of the country has laid down. With respect to the other parties alleged to be proper parties to this litigation, none of them appear to be in Scotland, and no authority has been cited to show that the suit cannot, under such circumstances, proceed in their absence. In the courts of equity of this country, suits proceed in the absence of parties out of the jurisdiction, who, if within it, would be necessary parties to the suit, except in cases where the decree cannot be carried into effect in their absence. For these reasons, I move your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, with costs.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary.—A. Gordon, Appellants' Solicitor.—Richardson and Connell, Respondent's Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

6th October 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 282.—ROBERT LAIDLAW, Appellant, v. JOHN SMITH (Garden's Trustee), Respondent.

Diligence—Arrestment, Breach of—Bona Fide Payment—Principal and Agent—Statute 1581, c. 118—Where an arrestee transmitted funds to his agent, who therewith paid the original creditor in bona fide, both being, at the time of such payment, ignorant that any arrestment had been used against him, such arrestment having been executed in his absence at his dwelling-house previous to the payment—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that he was not liable in second payment, as for breach of arrestment.

Mr Robert Dunlop, W.S., had a claim against the sequestrated estate of H. W. Garden, merchant in Glasgow, on which estate the respondent was trustee, arising from his, Dunlop's, employment as law-agent in Edinburgh by Messrs Cuthill and Turnbull of Glasgow for Garden, their client; which claim was secured by hypothec over Garden's title-deeds in their possession. After the bankruptcy, a correspondence took place as to Dunlop's claim, which was finally transacted through Messrs Dundas and Wilson, C.S., the agents in the sequestration in Edinburgh.

On 14th May 1831, Messrs M'Grigor Murray and M'Grigor, the agents in the sequestration in Glasgow, wrote to Messrs Dundas and Wilson in these terms:

"We have had repeated letters from Mr Dunlop, urging very earnestly a partial payment to account of his claims against Garden's estate. We have written him, that as the matter is in your hands, we decline interfering, but that we have remitted you such a sum as we trust will cover the utmost extent of his claim—leaving it to you to dispose of it as you may think proper. We accordingly send you prefixed an order on Mr Smith's account with the Royal Bank for £200 Sterling, which will enable you, we hope, to settle with Mr Dunlop. It will be desirable, we think, to make one work of all, and to make no partial payment. But in this you will act as you think proper."

On 19th May, Mr Wilson wrote to M'Grigor Murray and M'Grigor:

"I have had several conversations with Mr Dunlop on the subject of his claim against Garden's estate, and he has this day offered to settle it, by receiving £210 as in full of all demands. In the whole circumstances of the case, I think the trustee would do well to compromise the claim, by paying Mr Dunlop £200 or 200 guineas. I shall be glad to hear from you on the subject."

On the 20th, M'Grigor Murray and M'Grigor wrote to Mr Dundas in reply:

"We leave the settlement of Mr Dunlop's account entirely to yourself; and unless there are charges in it which you think would, on an appeal to the auditor, be cut down, you may pay him the sum he has agreed to take in full thereof. We will remit you through the bank, to-morrow, the balance required to enable you to pay the amount."

Several partial payments had been made to Dunlop, but a sum of £130 was still unpaid, when on 19th May, the appellant, having raised letters of arrestment on the dependence of an action against Dunlop, arrested the funds due to him by the respondent, by leaving a schedule of arrestment at his dwelling-house in Glasgow. The respondent was absent from Glasgow at this time for a few days, and did not receive the schedule till his return on the evening of 21st May.

On 21st May, the following letter was written by Wilson to M'Grigor Murray and M'Grigor:

"Mr Dunlop mentioned a few days ago that an arrestment had been raised against him, and he seemed to think it possible that it might be for the purpose of arresting the money due to him by Garden's trustee. Could you ascertain from Mr Smith this evening, whether any arrestment had been laid in his hands, and let me know by Monday morning, when I suppose Mr Dunlop will be here for his money. Mr Smith would probably have informed you of any arrestment, but, in case of accidents, it is better to ascertain that there is none."

To this letter the following reply was given on the 22d:

"Mr Smith, the trustee on Garden's estate, had been from home for some days, and returned only last night—but not in time to enable me to write to you by the evening post. It has so happened that an arrestment was used against Mr Dunlop during Mr Smith's absence, and, therefore, no farther payment can be safely made to him until it is loosed."

Before this last letter was received, payment of the £130 had been made to Dunlop, in the circumstances mentioned in the following letter of Mr Wilson to M'Grigor Murray and M'Grigor, of 24th May:

"After I wrote to you on Saturday morning, Mrs Dunlop, Mr R. Dunlop's wife, called here with a letter from her husband, addressed to her, authorising her to receive the balance of £130 due to him from Garden's estate, in which he says:—'Luckily, on calling for Mr Smith and Mr Murray, I found my fears, as to an arrestment, quashed. They never heard of such a thing, and Mr Murray, on my explaining my fears, at once dictated a letter to Mr Dundas, which he will get to-morrow, desiring him to pay me the £130;' and, as you had mentioned nothing about arrestments, and as I understood from Mr D.'s letter that he had seen Mr Smith, the money was paid to Mrs Dunlop; and I am sorry to find, from your letter of the 22d inst., that the arrestment had been previously executed in Mr Smith's hands."

The appellant having obtained decrees in his action against Dunlop for the sum of £450. 3. 6., then raised the present action of furthcoming against him and the respondent, libelling on the payments made to Dunlop, after the arrestment had been served, as a breach of arrestment on the part of the respondent. Against this the respondent pleaded on the merits—That there were no grounds on which he could be made liable as in breach of arrestment, he having, before the diligence was raised, remitted to the place of the creditor's residence funds specifically appropriated for the discharge of the debt—the debt having been paid and extinguished in ignorance of the arrestment, and in the due execution of the arrangement under which that remittance was made; and the defender, without any blame imputable to him, having had no personal knowledge of the arrestment till the creditor had actually received payment of the debt.

The Lord Ordinary, on 12th May 1836, sustained the defence above stated, for reasons assigned in a relative note subjoined, ante, Vol. X. p. 222.

The Court thereafter refused a reclaiming note presented by Mr Laidlaw, on which he appealed.

On 16th July 1840,

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, I certainly feel some difficulty in this case, on account of the obscurity in the papers as to the question of fact. I see in the reasons of the appellant he states that the Court below have proceeded to adjudicate upon some facts which were not proved, but I cannot find, upon looking into the proceedings, that any such objection was raised there. Undoubtedly, if the appellant has adopted the course of taking the opinion of the Court below upon an assumed state of facts, and not asking that Court to adopt a course enabling him to prove his own case, and disprove that of his opponent, and taking the opinion of the Court on an assumed state of facts, he has come now to complain of the conclusion to which the Judges have come, it would be attended with the greatest possible injustice to the respondent to permit him to avail himself of that course of conduct. But, my Lords, I cannot at this moment state how far that may appear, upon the papers before your Lordships, to have taken place, and I shall therefore look over the papers, and if I find the argument below proceeds upon an assumed state of facts, I think that your Lordships will be doing great injustice to the respondent if you permit the appellant to open the case before your Lordships upon that ground. I shall be glad to receive information upon that, and upon the mode in which the learned Judges dealt with it. They appear to have assumed that the fact is as stated in the letters; and the Lord Ordinary has stated, that if he had been asked to direct a trial of the question of fact, he should have done it. Now, then, I assume that no such application was made to him, and that they were not willing to take the opinion of a jury upon the facts. At the same time, the letters were not evidence to prove the facts on behalf of the parties who produced them, but it is not inconsistent that the appellant may not have precluded himself from going into the case by taking the opinion of a court of law. This difficulty cannot occur in this country, because the proceedings here are so well framed as to separate the question of law and of fact, and there cannot be any of that confusion which seems to exist in this case. My Lords, if that part of the case is brought to a satisfactory conclusion, I shall have no difficulty in advising your Lordships upon the question of law, for nothing can be more monstrous than that if a party who is trustee, who has been guilty, as is admitted, of no breach of trust, holding the sum for some other person—having a letter or a message of arrestment left at his house under circumstances under which he could not know what was contained in the document, and who pays it away to the party entitled to it,—if he, under those circumstances, is to be compelled to pay that money over again to some other person who has left the notice at his house, under circumstances in which it could not regulate his conduct. That is a state of the law which I am sure your Lordships would lament if it existed, and your Lordships, I am sure, will feel greatly gratified if it is held not to exist, upon the authority of the case of Scott against Fludyer. There was an expression of the Judge in that case that such was not the law of Scotland; and such not being the law of Scotland, it seems fit to consider whether there is that degree of negligence, which, according to the law, would render him liable for the consequences, if he was guilty of that negligence. Now that makes the detail of the facts material; and looking to the detail of the facts, I can affix no meaning to them except from the letters; and if the party has so dealt with them in the Court below as to make them conclusive, then the only question to be considered is, whether, upon the faith of the letters, there appears to be such a case of negligence as, in the absence of an actual knowledge of the arrestment, would subject the trustee to responsibility. Now, looking to the letters, certainly, I think they do not state any such case of negligence; because, what they state is, that he was absent at the time it was left, and that he never came back until after the money was actually paid, and of course, he did not know what took place in his absence; nor can I consider that what took place on the part of his agent (for to a certain extent he was his agent,) amounts to negligence. In the first place, there is no culpable negligence on his part, namely, in not acting for him as trustee; but the circumstances which, the appellant says, shows the negligence, is the act of those who were acting at Edinburgh. Now they were, no doubt, for a certain purpose, agents for the trustee, for it was through their hands that the money was directed to be paid; but it does not follow that any want of caution is to bind a person who does not employ an agent in the general management of his affairs, but only in the one particular act. But even as to that act, all which was in the information of Mr Dunlop was, that there had been some arrestment from somebody. Now, on the 21st, the same day in which the information was received, he was informed that no such arrestment had taken place; and that is no fiction, because it appears that Mr Dunlop had caused inquiries to be made at Mr Smith's house, and no person there knowing what had taken place, there was no information at that time communicated to any one that this arrestment had taken place. There was a report of there being an arrestment, and an application was made to ascertain the truth of it, by applying to those who were likely to know the names of the agents in Glasgow, at the house of the trustee himself, but no person having any information at that time of the arrestment having been made, because Smith, the trustee, had not returned—he acted upon that same day on which he ought to have received information of the arrestment being made, and paid the money. All this was in ignorance, as it respected all the parties, of there being such arrestment, but upon these facts a claim is made against Smith to repay the money which he has once paid over. Now, my Lords, unless I find a difficulty in disposing of the case upon the question of fact, I shall take the facts as assumed by the Judges in the Court below, and I shall have no difficulty then in advising your Lordships to affirm the decree of the Court below. If there was a miscarriage in point of fact, the question is, what statement the appellant will make to this House to entitle himself, as against the other party, to a trial of the issue? If he cannot make such statement, then the course to be taken is obvious. If, on the other hand, the party answers that the case is in such a state that it is still open to him to try the question of fact, the question is, whether the circumstances are such as to entitle him to do so? and perhaps the counsel can state that to me now.

Mr Anderson.—I am afraid I cannot take upon myself that responsibility, but I would refer your Lordship to a passage in the respondent's case. It is the fifth reason in page 16: it is in these terms:—"V. Hitherto the defender has confined himself to the consideration of the pure abstract question of law, whether, where an arrestee pays his original creditor in bona fide, being confessedly, at the time of such payment, utterly ignorant that any arrestment has been used against him, the mere production of an execution, valid on the face of it, to show that such an arrestment had, though unknown to him, been in fact executed in his absence at his dwelling-house, shall per se be held sufficient to subject him in second payment, as a person guilty of breach of arrestment? And upon that question he humbly trusts he has satisfied your Lordships that such an arrestee is not so liable. Having done this, the defender does not know that it is at all incumbent upon him, at least in hoc statu, to go further. For any further question must plainly resolve itself into matter of fact, and of course, whatever ground it may afford for sending the case to a jury, it would seem altogether out of place, in an argument which the defender understands your Lordships to have directed with a view to settle the law. In truth the case, as it comes before the Court under the Lord Ordinary's judgment, has only been decided by his Lordship as a case of law, and it would be, hoc statu, premature to dispose of it upon any other view." It goes on to state his understanding upon the question of relevancy, assuming the facts to be as stated, but not upon an admitted state of facts. On the contrary, it would be improper to argue it upon an admitted state of facts, and then go to a jury.

Lord Chancellor.—The course the Court of Session had was to dispose of the case upon the facts, and I do not find it made a ground of objection that it was irregular in that state of the case to adjudicate finally.

Mr Anderson.—The judgment was given upon the papers; and one of the reasons given by us is, that the facts were admitted. If they were not, the Court ought to have entered further into the question of fact, and to have adopted some mode of investigation of the facts.

Lord Chancellor.—There is a distant allusion to that I see.

Mr Pemberton.—Not an allegation, my Lord, that the proof ought not to have been received, and that the Court ought not to have decided upon the proof that existed; but what they say is, that we have not sufficiently established our claim.

Lord Chancellor.—Their 5th reason is, “because there is no specific averment on record stating where the respondent was at the date of the arrestment, or in what manner he was engaged, or any other data given towards disclosing whether the cause of the alleged absence was necessary or excusable.” That raises the question here in the reasons, but I cannot find any such ground taken in the Court below.

Mr Anderson.—Your Lordship sees we could not state it. Their own case is, that the Court could not then dispose of the facts, but only of the abstract question of law; and the proper way to do that, would have been to send it to a jury. The first opportunity we have of stating that is in the reasons. We could not state it after what the respondent had pleaded.

Mr Pemberton.—What they could have done would have been to have stated that the Lord Ordinary had no right to dispose of the facts on the evidence before him.

Lord Chancellor.—What is done is generally complained of.

Mr Pemberton.—I do not think there is any statement that the Lord Ordinary had admitted the facts as alleged by them.

Lord Chancellor.—The claim in the petition does not specify the particular ground of objection.

Mr Anderson.—No, my Lord.

Lord Chancellor.—The proof, by their letters, is a sort of incidental proof.

Mr Pemberton.—I believe, my Lord, there is no question about the facts.

Lord Chancellor.—There is no reason to suppose those letters are fabricated.

Mr Anderson.—There is a case behind that, my Lord; the letters may be true, and yet they may not prove the contents.

Lord Chancellor.—They were used on both sides—by the pursuer as well as by the defendant.

Mr Anderson.—They were used in argument; but if your Lordship will read the papers, we shall be satisfied.

Lord Chancellor.—I should be glad to be informed on Monday morning, in the event of the House not being of opinion that the facts are established, after what has taken place, whether you would ask for an opportunity of proving them.

Of this date, (6th October 1841),

Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, the first, and for the reasons I shall presently give, the only question, in my opinion, in the present case, is as to the proposition of law raised by the first plea of the respondent, which may be shortly stated to be, whether the arrestee of a debt, paying it bona fide to the common debtor after a regular arrestment, but, in ignorance of it, can be compelled to pay it over again to the arrester? In considering this question, I shall assume the facts to be as stated by the Lord Ordinary. Independently of authority, the proposition that the arrestee is subject to such liability, would be one which it would be impossible to support upon principle. The law of Scotland allows the power of arrestment of property belonging to the debtor for the benefit and security of the creditor; and it would be most unjust to enforce that right to the prejudice of others. To the arrestee, who owes the debt or possesses the property arrested, it must be matter of indifference to whom he pays or renders it. If the dealing between his creditor and another give to that other the right to recover the debt, the law, in carrying that right into effect, ought carefully to protect the person owing it. In other transfers of debt and liabilities it does so, and imposes no responsibility upon him to the person becoming entitled, until he has distinct personal notice of such transfer. Many instances of this are mentioned in the respondent's case. What creates the liability in any case to pay the debt over again to a person originally a stranger to the party paying? Clearly the having paid it to the person with the knowledge that another was entitled to it; which amounts to this, that a payment mala fide shall be considered as no payment at all. It was for the appellant to show why this general principle of law and justice is not applicable to cases of arrestment. The Statute of 1581 prescribes the mode of making arrestments; and following the directions of that Act, the arrester is entitled to all the benefits of his arrestment as against the property or debt in medio—that is, as against his debtor and other competitors; but there is nothing in that Act making the prescribed service at the dwelling-house the ground, without more, of personal liability in the arrestee, who, in ignorance of the arrestment, pays the debt bona fide to his original creditor. The assignment of a debt gives to the assignee a title to the debt, but not to recover the amount from the debtor, who, without notice, has paid it bona fide to the assignor. If the arrestment give such a right to the arrester as against the arrestee, it must be by a positive rule of law, independent of particular circumstances; and if so, it must operate in the cases put by the Lord Ordinary, in which no caution on the part of the debtor could possibly protect him. Such consequences may not prove what the law is, but in deciding between conflicting authorities, may be permitted to weigh powerfully against those from which they must flow. If, then, this liability be inconsistent with this rule of law in other cases, and be not enacted by Statute, and if it be contrary to the principles of justice, it can only be supported by the weight of legal and judicial authority. Only two cases have been referred to in which the question has been discussed—that of Blackwood in 1703, and that of Fludyer in 1770. It is true that the first is mentioned by Mr Erskine, B. III. t. 6, § 14, and apparently with approbation. But the latter case was decided after Mr Erskine's death in 1768, though before the first publication of his work in 1793. It does not appear how the case of the office, referred to by Mr Erskine in the same passage, could have arisen, as neither the arrestee nor the property were within the jurisdiction. It appears to me, however, that Blackwood's case is a very distinct authority in favour of the appellant's proposition, but it is of an old date, and does not appear to have been followed; for nothing can be more explicit than the opinion of all the Judges who decided the case of Scott v. Fludyer on the 8th of March 1770. The appellant attempts to get rid of the weight of this case, by stating that the arrestment against Tait was clearly void; but all the Judges concur in considering it as regular and valid, but that it had ceased to have any operation by his bona fide payment before he had notice of the arrestment. This, then, is a much later decision than that of Blackwood, and is in conformity with the rule of law in all similar cases, and is consistent with the principles of justice, which the former decision was not. I cannot, therefore, hesitate to approve of the judgment of the Judges of the Court of Session, who preferred adhering to this decision rather than to establish the rule as laid down in Blackwood's case. It was, however, argued, that the facts of this case, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, did not raise this question; because, although Smith had no personal notice of the arrestment, his agents, Mr Wilson and Mr Murray, had, and that all were guilty of so much negligence; that notice of the arrestment ought to be assumed, or rather, that Smith ought not to be at liberty to say that he had not notice. So far as affects Smith personally, the alleged negligence is the having left home without appointing some person to act for him in the event of an arrestment being served in his absence. There is no attempt to show that his absence was from any improper motive with respect to the arrester, or that he had any reason to expect that there would be any arrestment. The proposition therefore, is, that every person owing money to another is bound, under the penalty of personal liability, before he leaves his own house to appoint some person who, in his absence, may deal with any arrestment of the debt which may be served. The general operation of this proposition would be alarming, when it is recollected how large a proportion of the inhabitants of Scotland must necessarily be liable to debts and obligations to others, none of whom, according to the proposition of the appellant, could safely, or without being guilty of a neglect of duty, leave their houses for any time whatever without appointing an agent, and leaving orders to provide against the possible event of some arrestment of such debt or obligation being served during his absence. But it was said that Wilson, the agent at Edinburgh, and Murray, the agent at Glasgow, had sufficient intimation of the arrestment, to make the payment of the debt on Monday, the 21st, an act of negligence which ought to subject the principal, Smith, to this liability. To this the short but decisive answer is, that Wilson and Murray were not Smith's agents for this purpose. Wilson's authority was only to settle the amount of Dunlop's debt, and to pay the sum agreed upon, which had been remitted to him for that purpose. If the money in Wilson's hands was not to be treated as still in the hands of Smith, then at the time of the arrestment, the property was no longer in medio, and if it was to be so considered, then the agency of Wilson cannot be extended beyond the real nature and object of his employment, and notice to him of the arrestment would not be of any effect to subject Smith to responsibility. If, indeed, he had had any such notice, which he had not, he would properly have suspended the execution of his orders till he had communicated with Smith, but his not doing so would not have affected him. Such is the recognised rule of law in this country respecting principal and agent, and which the security of mankind requires; and the case of Campbell, referred to in Erskine, B. III. t. 6, § 4,—edition by Mr Ivory, Note 310 to § 14,—proves that the same rule prevails in the law of Scotland, and is applicable to this particular subject of arrestment. I therefore think that the judgment of the Court of Session, upon the proposition of law raised by the plea of the respondent, is correct. The principal difficulty I have had in this case is as to the facts; for although there seems to be no reason for doubting that the facts as collected and stated by the Lord Ordinary, are the real facts of the case, I cannot find in the proceedings any admission or proof that they are so; and it is, in my opinion, so essential to the due administration of justice, and so important to the science of the law that the facts of a case should be clearly ascertained by either admission or proof before the rule of law is applied, that I have been anxious to discover, if possible, some judicial ground for assuming that the facts are as stated by the Lord Ordinary, and I was for some time disposed to advise your Lordships to send the case back to the Court of Session for that purpose; but looking to the provisions of the 6th George IV. c. 120, and particularly the 14th section, upon this subject, and the manner in which the appellant brought his case before the Inner-House, in which I do not find any complaint made of the Lord Ordinary having proceeded to adjudication upon the merits without a proper previous ascertainment of the facts, and that it formed no part of his application there that directions might be given for that purpose, I think that the appellant cannot now object to the interlocutor upon that ground. I must assume that all parties were aware of what the facts really were, and were desirous of having the opinion of the Court upon an admitted state of facts. I therefore propose to your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from, with costs.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Lord Moncreiff, Ordinary.—Deans and Dunlop, Appellant's Solicitors.—Richardson and Connell, Respondent's Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

6th October 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 283.—WILLIAM ALLAN, Esq. of Glen, Appellant, v. PETER M'CRAW, Collector of the Poors' Assessment for the Parish of South Leith, and a COMMITTEE of the HERITORS of the said PARISH, Respondents.

Poors' Rates.—Liability.—Statute 7 Geo. III. c. 27.—Construction.—Annexation.—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that by the Statute 7 Geo. III. c. 27, for extending the royalty of the city of Edinburgh, the lands of Hillside, thereby disjoined from the parish of South Leith and annexed to the parish of Saint Giles, in the city of Edinburgh, remain liable in payment of poors' rates to the parish of South Leith, and that not only on account of the solum, but also for the buildings erected thereon.

The lands of Hillside, now the property of the appellant, formerly belonged to the Governors of George Heriot's Hospital, who, in January 1756, granted a feu-charter of that property in favour of James Grant, after which period the lands were called "James Grant's Feu." The subject is described as situated in the barony of Broughton, parish of South Leith, and sheriffdom of Edinburgh. The charter, inter alia, contained the following clause:

"And also, that in case the royalty of Edinburgh shall at any time hereafter be extended, so as to comprehend the grounds now feued, the said Mr James Grant and his foresaids, or the proprietors of the said ground for the time, shall not only be subjected to build such houses as they shall build thereon, agreeable to the plan to be concerted by the Town-council of Edinburgh, and other managers for the time, but likewise, the houses to be built thereon shall be subject and liable to pay the same public burdens as the other inhabitants of the city are subject and liable to pay."

By Statute 7 Geo. III. c. 27, entitled, "An Act for extending the royalty of the city of Edinburgh," the royalty was extended over a variety of lands specially named, among which were the subjects of James Grant's feu, under the conditions on which they and the others had been feued out by the Governors of the Hospital, viz., "the said houses to be built thereon shall be subject and liable to pay the same public burdens as the other inhabitants are subject and liable to pay."

The Statute then has the following clause:

"And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the said Magistrates and Town-council of the city of Edinburgh shall have full power to appoint stent-masters to levy from the proprietors and possessors of all such houses as are built, or shall hereafter be built, upon the foresaid grounds hereby annexed to, and comprehended within the said royalty, an equal portion of the cess, annuity, poors'-money and watch-money payable by the city of Edinburgh, in the same way and manner as the same are now levied within the present royalty."

The Act farther provides,

"That the several lands hereby annexed to the royalty of the city of Edinburgh shall, besides the cess to be levied by the collector of the town, for and in respect of the houses and buildings, remain liable, and be subjected to the payment of a rateable proportion of the cess and land-tax, and other public taxes imposed, or to be imposed on the shire of Edinburgh, for and in respect of the ground, to be levied in the same manner as formerly, any thing in this Act to the contrary notwithstanding."

By another clause of the same Statute it is enacted,

"that the foresaid grounds hereby annexed to, and comprehended within the royalty of the city of Edinburgh, shall be, and they are hereby for ever after disjoined from the parish of Saint Cuthberts or West Kirk and South Leith, and are hereby annexed to the parish of Saint Giles, within the city of Edinburgh; provided always, that the lands hereby disjoined from the parish of Saint Cuthberts and South Leith, and the heritors thereof, shall remain liable and be subjected to the ministers' stipends and other parochial burdens, and that the tithes payable out of the lands hereby annexed shall be, and the same are hereby saved and reserved to the owners thereof, in the same manner as if this Act had never passed."

The royalty of the city was subsequently extended over a portion of the parish of St Cuthberts in 1809, by Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 21. In that Act certain arrangements were made in regard to a sum of poors'-money being paid by the Magistrates of Edinburgh to the parish of St Cuthberts. The lands disjoined from South Leith parish by the 7th Geo. III., were however allowed still to stand on the footing prescribed by that Statute.

The royalty was farther extended in 1813, by the Act 53 Geo. III. cap. 77, and the same conditions as contained in that of 7th Geo. III. were again inserted. This Statute, however, does not disjoin from the parish of South Leith the lands to be acquired under it, or annex them to any parish within the city of Edinburgh.

In 1823, the appellant's father began to erect buildings on the lands of Hillside, which had formerly been possessed as a villa and grounds, and in 1830, the boundaries of the property, within the royalty, were fixed by the Sheriff in terms of a clause in 7th Geo. III., by which he was authorised to do so. Up to this last date these lands had always been assessed for the poors'-rates of South Leith parish, but when the boundaries of the royalty were now fixed, the appellant refused to pay poors'-rates to the parish of South Leith, on the grounds that he was liable to be called upon for poors'-rates on the part of the Magistrates of Edinburgh; that his property, so far as consisting of Grant's feu, was annexed to the parish of St Giles in that city, and that he was not liable for parochial burdens to two parishes.

The present action was then brought by the respondents, the collector of poors'-rates for South Leith, and a committee of the heritors. The summons contained a declaratory conclusion for payment of £70. 6. 11., being poors'-rates and cholera assessment due for property belonging to the appellant, forming part of what was formerly styled James Grant's Feu,—also for £4. 3s. 9½d., as his share of the expense of a process relative to Restalrig burying-ground, and it also concluded for payment of £53. 19. 3½. for poors'-rates, &c., on houses belonging to the appellant in the parish of South Leith, but not upon James Grant's feu, and £1. 7. 7½. for his share of the expense of the same process, effeiring to his other property.

It was pleaded in defence—1. According to the sound and legal construction of the Statute libelled, the defender, or his property, can only be liable for one poors'-rate or tax, and it is contrary to public law, as well as the true construction of the Act, to assess the same property twice for the same tax; and, 2. At least, according to the proper construction of the Statute, the defender is only liable in poors'-rate to the parish of South Leith for the ground or solum, and is not liable for any poors'-rate on account of the houses erected on the ground—these, by the annexing Statute, having become burdened with taxes or assessments due to the town of Edinburgh.

The pursuers contended—1. In virtue of the Statutes founded on, the property mentioned in the libel, as united to the royalty of the city of Edinburgh, remains liable in poor-rates to South Leith, according to the express terms, as well as the true intent and meaning of the Statute; and, 2. The distinction suggested by the defender is not made in the Statutes, or in practice, between a house and the ground on which it stands. The amount of assessment is measured by the rental or value of the property built or not built upon.

The Lord Ordinary, on 15th November 1838, repelled the defences, and decerned in terms of the libel, with expenses,—the grounds of his judgment being fully detailed in a note subjoined to his interlocutor,—

SCOTTISH JURIST.

See ante, Vol. XI. pp. 340, 341. On a reclaiming note the Court adhered.

Mr Allan appealed.

Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, I think the interlocutors appealed from in this case ought to be affirmed. The question is, whether the lands of the appellant are liable to the payment of the poor-rate to the parish of South Leith, which depends altogether upon the construction of the Act of 7 Geo. III. c. 27, under which they have been taken within the royalty of the city of Edinburgh. The lands were situate within the parish of South Leith; and by section 10, all houses built and to be built upon the lands in question are made subject to an equal portion of the cess, annuity, poor-money and watch-money payable by the city of Edinburgh, as the same was then levied within the then royalty. By section 12, the land, besides the cess to be levied by the collector for the town for and in respect of the houses and buildings, is to remain liable, and be subjected to a rateable proportion of the cess and land tax, and other public taxes imposed or to be imposed on the shire of Edinburgh for or in respect of the ground, to be levied in the same manner as formerly. By section 15, the lands are declared to be, and are for ever after, disjoined from the parish of South Leith, and are thereby annexed to the parish of St Giles, within the city of Edinburgh; and by section 16, it is declared, that the lands thereby disjoined from the parish of South Leith, and the heritors thereof, shall remain liable, and shall be subjected to the ministers' stipends and other parochial burdens, and that the tithes payable out of the lands thereby annexed shall be, and the same are hereby saved and reserved to the true owners thereof, in the same manner as if the Act had never passed; and by section 18, all rights and interests (other than the extension of the royalty) of all person or persons which they had, have, or may have in the lands thereby annexed, are saved. So that the lands in question are disjoined from South Leith by one section, which, if there had been no other provision, would have exempted them from the liability to pay poor-money to the parish; but by another section they are to remain liable, and be subjected to the parochial burdens of South Leith, as if the Act had never passed. If, therefore, the poor-money be a parochial burden, and if the property in question would have been liable to such poor-money if that Act had never passed, the case comes within the very terms of the Act. It was argued, that the poor-rate is not a parochial burden. It is a rate to be paid by the heritors or owners, and by the occupiers of lands within the parish. It is therefore parochial, and that it is a burden will not be disputed; and the 16th section accurately describes it as a parochial burden, to which the lands and the heritors thereof were before the passing of the Act liable, and were to remain so after it had passed. If the Act had never passed, the lands in question, and any houses built upon them, would have been liable to this rate. If the same lands and the houses built upon them are not now liable to it, how is the provision of the Act carried out, which declares that the lands shall remain liable to it in the same manner as if the Act had never passed? The argument, however, that though the land may be liable, the houses are not so, does not require this comment upon the terms of the Act to refute it. A distinct parliamentary enactment might, no doubt, subject the land upon which a house is built, and the house itself, to different rules and liabilities; but in this case there is no such distinct parliamentary enactment, and the general rule of law must therefore prevail, which considers the house as an accretion to, and as part of the land upon which it is built. This appears to me to be so clearly the true construction of the Act, that I cannot but think that the question would not have been raised, had it not been for the case of M'Craw v. Cunningham, reported in 2d Shaw and M'Lean, 773, upon which there was a great difference of opinion. The question in that case did not turn upon the same Act of Parliament as the present, but upon an Act of 54 Geo. III. c. 170, under which the lands there in question were included in the royalty of the city of Edinburgh. It is true that that Act declared that the extension of the royalty over the lands there in question, was made under all the clauses, provisions, declarations, exemptions and reservations in favour of his Majesty and others, which are specified and contained in the Act of 7th Geo. III. Whether that decision was right as to the extent to which the latter Act incorporated the provisions of the former, is not material, because it was assumed; and indeed the decision proceeded upon that ground, that the provision of the Act of 7th Geo. III., as to disjoining the lands from South Leith, and holding them, nevertheless, liable to the parochial burdens of that parish, did not apply to the lands taken into the royalty under the 54th Geo. III.; and in deciding that case, the Judges of the Court of Session assumed, that if the case had been under the 7th Geo. III., the lands would have been clearly liable to the parochial burdens of South Leith; and I do not find any thing in the speech of the noble and learned Lord who moved the judgment of this House throwing any doubt upon that proposition. The case of Burns v. Ewing, and the Magistrates of Glasgow, is also inapplicable to the present. That case arose under another Act of Parliament which separated the lands there in question from the parish of which they had formed part, but there was no provision as to their remaining liable to the parochial burdens of that parish. The question was, whether such liability was to be inferred from a clause compelling the city of Glasgow to relieve the occupiers of poor-rates payable by them, as having been part of the parish before the passing of the Act. The holding that, under such circumstances, the liability continued, would be a strong authority in favour of the respondent in the present case; but the holding that it did not, would be no authority in favour of the appellant, who has not an inference to contend with to be deduced from other provisions of the Act, but a positive enactment, as to the construction of which I do not see any room for doubt. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from are correct, and I move your Lordships to affirm them, with costs.

VOL. XIV.—No. XLIII.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—Spottiswoode and Robertson, Appellants' Solicitors.—Archibald Graham, Respondents' Solicitor.—[W.H.D.]

6th October 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 284.—MRS CHRISTIAN STEWART or MENZIES, and CATHERINE MENZIES and JOHN MENZIES, Appellants, v. JOHN MENZIES, Esq. of Chesthill, Respondent.

Marriage, Constitution of.—Husband and Wife.—A gentleman addressed the following letter to his housekeeper: "You and I having lived together as man and wife for some time, I hereby declare you to be my lawful wife, in the event of a child being born, in consequence of the present connexion betwixt us." The letter was dated 1826, but not delivered till 1828, at which period a child had been born—the gentleman's averment being, that he had antedated and delivered the letter for the purpose of making a third party, to whom he had promised marriage, believe that he could not fulfil his promise—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that the letter was not sufficient, either per se or with reference to the facts proved, to constitute a marriage.

Marriage.—Husband and Wife.—Proof.—Parole.—Held competent for the defender in a declarator of marriage to prove the purpose for which, and the circumstances under which, a written declaration of marriage was given by him to the pursuer.

Proof.—Adminicle.—A memorandum, made by, and found in the repositories of a deceased country gentleman, of a conversation with a female about the real purpose of a letter intended to be used by her in a declaration of marriage, about which she had come to consult him—held competent evidence.

The appellants brought an action of declarator of marriage between the respondent and the first appellant, on the narrative, that about the month of April 1825, while housekeeper to the respondent at his house in Duneaves, he professed the greatest love and affection for her, and in consequence of his repeated addresses and solicitations, and his promise to marry her, she accepted him as, and admitted him to all the privileges of a husband: That in consequence of the said promise and subsequent cohabitation, they became married persons: That on 25th March 1836, the respondent gave the appellant the following letter, acknowledging and declaring the marriage:

"Duneaves, 25th March 1826.

"CHRISTY,—You and I having lived together as man and wife for some time, I hereby declare you to be my lawful wife, in the event of a child being born, in consequence of the present connexion betwixt us.—And I am yours truly."

(Signed) "JOHN MENZIES of Chesthill."

That both previous and subsequent to the date of this letter the respondent acknowledged, on various occasions to various persons, that he was married to the appellant: That the other appellant, Catherine, was procreated of the said marriage on 10th June 1827, and the other appellant, John, on 18th November 1829: That subsequent to the said marriage, the respondent treated, acknowledged, and cohabited with the first appellant as his wife, and acknowledged the other appellants as his lawful children; and that in these circumstances, the respondent and first appellant were married persons, and the other appellants lawful children. There was an alternative conclusion for damages as for seduction, which was based principally on the correspondence of the respondent, particularly a letter addressed by him to the clergyman of the parish on the birth of the second appellant, containing the following passages:

"I am so annoyed and hurt at the business, that I can scarcely say or tell you any thing." "I will pay all the fines and things that are requisite, by your letting me know as soon as possible all the different things and fines, and what would be the amount expected. I beg of you not to bring her before any session, or thing of that kind, as I was myself the transgressor." "I feel for the poor woman more than it is in my power to mention, when I think of the mischief I have done in destroying her character for ever."

In another letter, addressed to the appellant herself during her second pregnancy, the respondent expressed himself as follows:

"I am sorry that I cannot be able to go to see you to-night, but I send you a letter which I had been intending to do long ago, and before I ever expected or understood that you were again with child,—a circumstance which I can assure you gives me most distressing ideas, as I am alone the person to blame, and on whom I trust all the blame will be laid. I have every inclination and feeling to take you to myself, but there are just two things to be considered; one is, that all my respectability and connection with my equals will be at an end; and another, that I will lose all the respectability which my inferiors at this time pay to me; but that won't be a sufficient excuse for my destroying you."

He further offered in this letter to settle an annuity on the appellant, and a sum on the children, provided she would remove to some distance from his property.

In defence, the respondent denied the statement of facts founded on as implying marriage or seduction, and averred that the pursuer had, after the date of the letter of 25th March 1826, continued in his service as a menial servant, and the children had been treated and baptised as bastards; and with regard to the granting of that letter, he averred that it had been written and given by him to the appellant in 1827, or early in 1828, to enable him to mislead the relations of a young lady, to whom he had promised marriage, into a belief that it was not in his power to enter into that state, of which fraud the appellant was cognisant and participant; and in point of law he pleaded—1. The promise of marriage contained in the letter libelled on, being qualified by the condition, that a child should be born in consequence of the illicit connexion which is stated to have then subsisted between the parties, the presumption that an agreement to marry was interchanged at the time of the subsequent copula, is necessarily excluded. 2. An express declaration on the part of the defender, that the pursuer was his wife, would not have constituted a marriage, if it could be proved that, at the time when it was made, neither of the parties intended that it should have that effect. 3. As the defender did not seduce the pursuer, he is not liable to her in the damages which she alleges that she has sustained in consequence of her seduction.

In a proof before answer of the defender's averments, evidence was adduced by him to show that the children were, with the mother's acquiescence, baptized as bastards, and that they were universally reputed as such; that the principal appellant never claimed the rights or title of a wife; and that, previous to raising this action, she had gone to consult a Mr Stewart of Crossmount, on whose property she had originally resided, as to the course she should follow, and in her interview with him she had admitted that the letter of 25th March 1826 had been written and delivered in the circumstances, and for the purpose alleged by the respondent;—of this conversation Mr Stewart had made a memorandum at the time, which was found in his repositories after his death, and admitted in evidence. There was other evidence to the same effect. The direct testimony on the part of the appellant of her near relations (sisters and brothers-in-law) was rejected, as inadmissible, by the Lord Ordinary (9th December 1834), and subsequently by the Inner-House,—the Lord Ordinary, in a note subjoined to his interlocutor, intimating, inter alia, that he would have disallowed such evidence without difficulty, if the attempt had been to prove a marriage by open marital cohabitation, and mutual habitual acknowledgments, but that he had some difficulty in rejecting it in a case like the present, where a temporary concealment of the marriage from the public was intended, and was influenced in rejecting it (which, in dubio, he held to be the least unexceptionable course), by the great extent to which her examination of stranger witnesses had already gone, and by some strong expressions both in the summons and condescendence. The proof of the appellants' allegations as to acknowledgment or open marital cohabitation failed.

The Court (4th February 1836) adhered to an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Jeffrey) sustaining the defences against the declaratory conclusions of the action for marriage and legitimacy; and on 27th June 1837, the Court adhered to an interlocutor of the same Lord Ordinary assailing the defender from the conclusion for damages as for seduction.

Against these judgments the pursuers appealed.

Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, a considerable portion of the voluminous papers in this case is occupied in the discussion of a question raised by the appellant, which was most properly abandoned at the bar of this House by the eminent counsel who appeared for the appellant. The point discussed in the papers, and abandoned at the bar, was, that it was not competent for the respondent to adduce evidence to show the circumstances under which, and the purposes for which, the letter dated 25th March 1826 was written and delivered to the appellant. This point was attempted to be supported by reference to a principle to which it has no application, and in the face of several authorities. It is unnecessary further to notice this point. The main question, which is that of the status of the appellant—whether she is to be considered as the wife of the respondent—turns principally upon the effect of the letter of the 25th March 1826, with reference to the law of Scotland upon the subject of marriage—first, taken per se, and, secondly, taken with reference to the facts proved. It is an admitted fact that cohabitation preceded and followed the date of that letter, and the time at which it is admitted to have been delivered to the appellant. The letter is dated 25th March 1826, and is in these words:—"Christy, you and I having lived together as man and wife for some time, I hereby declare you to be my lawful wife, in the event of a child being born, in consequence of the present connexion betwixt us. I am yours truly, JOHN MENZIES." The summons puts the alleged marriage upon two grounds—1st, a promise of marriage previous to any cohabitation cum subsequente copula, of which no proof was given; and, 2dly, upon this letter, as being an acknowledgment and declaration of the marriage; but it does not put the case upon this letter as being a promise to marry cum subsequente copula,—consent de presenti is essential to marriage; and marriages established upon a promise cum subsequente copula are so established upon a fiction, that the consent de presenti was mutually given by the parties in consequence of the anterior promise; but if the promise be conditional upon the happening of a future event, there is no room for any such fiction. The copula cannot be the perfection or consummation of the prior contract, neither can this letter constitute a marriage by consent. It is not an acceptance by the parties of each other for their lawful spouses. By contemplating a future status of marriage upon a certain event happening, it negatives all the essentials of a marriage by consent expressed; neither can it be considered as a declaration constituting habit and repute that the cohabitation is that of husband and wife. The contemplation of such a relationship arising upon the happening of a future event, negatives the habit and repute which it is referred to as proving. It did not require the cases of Macdonald v. Macdonald, and M'Innes v. Moir, to prove this. The letter, therefore, taken per se, does not support any of the grounds upon which a Scotch marriage can be supported. The very able counsel for the appellant felt this so strongly, that he rested his client's case principally upon this—that the letter, though dated in 1826, was not delivered to the appellant till late in 1827 or early in 1828, after the birth of the child, and therefore ought to be considered as a positive declaration of present marriage,—the condition having at that time been performed. This would indeed be doing what the appellant properly insisted cannot be done; that is, construing a written document by extraneous evidence of intention. But if the fact of the letter not having been delivered till 1828 be resorted to, so must all the other evidence connected with the same matter, and which proves the reason for its having been delivered at that time, with the date of 1826, and the purpose for which it was so delivered; and which evidence so resorted to, and which, it is now not in dispute, was legally admissible, amply proves that the parties did not intend that the letter should constitute a present marriage, or operate as a promise of marriage, but that it was written in pursuance of a scheme of the respondent, acquiesced in by the appellant, to commit a fraud upon a third person. The cases of Kennedy v. Campbell, in 3d Shaw and Wilson, 135; M'Innes v. Moir, in Ferguson's Rep., App. pp. 125, 128; Taylor v. Kello, Morr. Dicty., 12,687; Grant v. Mennons, Ferguson, Rep., App. p. 110, and many other cases, prove, what indeed required no such proof, that to constitute a contract of marriage there must be contracting parties, and that the expressions used, though of themselves sufficient words of contract, are of no avail, if not intended by the parties to have that effect, but are used for some collateral purpose. This in no respect infringes upon the principle of not construing a written contract by extrinsic evidence of intention,—the question being, not what the written contract imports, but whether it is to be treated as a contract at all. I have already observed, that in order to construe the letter dated in 1826 according to the circumstances which existed at the time it was delivered in 1828, extrinsic evidence must be resorted to; but that proves that the parties must have had some design in antedating the letter. To construe it, therefore, as if dated in 1828, would be to defeat the proved object of the parties, and to construe a written document distinctly expressing one purpose as importing one totally different upon evidence debors the instrument itself, and that not proving such to have been the intention of the parties, but that their intention was that the letter should be construed according to the literal terms used, that is, a promise made in 1826, subsequently consummated by the birth of a child, and therefore, as they supposed, in point of form binding. This alone would have answered the purpose of imposing upon the third party. The position, therefore, attempted to be maintained by the learned counsel for the appellant is wholly untenable. If then this letter be inoperative for the purpose of constituting or proving a marriage, the case of the pursuer fails altogether. There is no other evidence deserving of observation; and the other points in the case are of no difficulty. The rejection of the evidence of the pursuer's near relations, according to the law as it then stood, was clearly right; and there is no reason to suppose that their evidence, if given and believed, would have benefited the pursuer, seeing what was the real history of the transaction, as proved by unquestionable evidence. The course adopted with respect to the conclusion for damages upon the alleged seduction, was also, I think, strictly proper. The pursuer had a choice of proceeding at once in an action for that purpose, in which case the jury would have been the constituted tribunal to try the question; but she chose to conjoin the claim for damages with the action of declarator of marriage; and after proofs in such suit, complaints of the Court assuming jurisdiction as to the case of seduction. The evidence does not establish a case of seduction. It proves, indeed, conduct in the defender highly discreditable, as it leaves no doubt of his having been a party at least to the ruin of the pursuer, whom, as being in his service, he was in honour bound to protect; but that by no means establishes, per se, a title to damages for seduction; and the time during which the intercourse continued, without complaint, is an important feature in a question of this kind. For these reasons, I have no hesitation in advising your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from. A question important, I fear, to the pursuer, remains to be considered—the costs of the appeal. Looking at the conduct of the defender throughout the transaction in evidence, and particularly to his treatment of the woman he had ruined, and the children she had borne to him, and the probably distressed circumstances of the appellant, I should have been glad to have found grounds upon which I could have advised your Lordships not to fix upon the appellant the costs of this appeal. Such reasons probably operated upon the Court below, in refusing to the defender the expenses of the suit,—but it is, I fear, to the practice as to costs in this House having formerly been so imperfect and uncertain, that the number of frivolous appeals, particularly from Scotland, is to be attributed. Nothing can be more important to the interests of suitors than to discourage such expensive and useless litigation. It has, I have reason to hope, been much checked of late years by the altered system as to costs; and I have always felt it my duty, in considering the question of costs in each particular case, to look to the effect which the course to be adopted might have upon this general question; and in this House and in the Court of Chancery, I have thought that benefit would arise from adhering more closely than had been done by some of my predecessors to the principle of making the question of costs follow the result of the suit upon the merits, particularly when the question depended upon matters of fact and the conduct of parties. I have been assured, and I have reason to believe, that this course has materially checked useless litigation. Acting upon this principle,—although I think that the respondent will acquire some redeeming credit by not exacting costs from the appellant—I cannot do otherwise than propose to your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors appealed from, with costs.

Lord Brougham.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in this case, which I heard the greater part of with him. It is a case subject to the observations which he has made, and it is therefore with some reluctance that I have come to the conclusion I have arrived at.

Interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—Alexander Dobie, Appellants' Solicitor.—Richardson and Connell, Respondent's Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

6th October 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 285.—ROBERT HILL and OTHERS, Appellants, v. WILLIAM PAUL, Respondent.

Trust—Construction—Title to Sue—Assignment of Patent Office—Alimentary Office.—A party executed a trust-deed, by which he conveyed, for behoof of creditors, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and without prejudice to the generality, certain heritable and other subjects specified in the deed, and he bound himself to grant such deeds thereafter as the trustee should think necessary for the more effectual execution of the trust. The truster, at the date of the trust, held the office of keeper of a local register of seigns by patent under the Crown, but no mention was made in the trust-conveyance of the emoluments or right to the office. The trustee having brought an action to compel the truster to account for the emoluments—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), on a construction of the trust-deed, that neither the office nor emoluments were carried by the deed, and consequently, that the trustee had no title to pursue.—Opinion, That the clause as to granting other deeds was merely to render the trust more effective in its execution, so far only as the subjects actually conveyed by the principal deed were concerned.

Pactum Illicitum—Public Officer—Question, Whether, where an office under the Crown is not itself assignable, the emoluments may legally be assigned or conveyed for behoof of creditors?

In 1826, Mr Robert Hill, W.S., granted a general conveyance of his property, funds and effects, to the respondent, as trustee for behoof of creditors.

The dispositive clause conveyed

“All and sundry superiorities, lands and heritages, debts heritable and moveable, and whole goods, gear, sums of money, and effects, and, in general, my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, of whatever nature or denomination, or wherever situated, presently belonging to me; and in particular, without prejudice to the said generality, all and whole these parts and portions of the lands and estate of Auchindinny,” &c.; “together with the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, and whole pertinents of the baili foresaid lands, with all right, title and interest which I have, or can pretend, to the said whole lands, teinds and others, or to any part or portion thereof in time coming; which lands and others last mentioned were latterly acquired by me from Laurence Hill, writer in Glasgow, liferenter, and James Hill, my eldest son, fiar thereof, conform to disposition dated the 1st day of April 1811 years, and recorded in the books of Council and Session the 21st day of October 1812 years, and instrument of sasine in my favour, dated the 5th, and registered in the Particular Register of Sasines, &c., at Edinburgh, the 8th days of April 1811 years, with the bail parts, pendicles and pertinents thereof; together with all right, title and interest, claim of right, property and possession, petitory and possessory, which I, my predecessors or authors, had, have, or any ways may have, claim or pretend, to the lands and other heritages, and others generally and particularly above disposed, or to any part or portion thereof, surrogating and substituting the said trustees in succession in my full power, right and place of the whole heritable and moveable estates and effects above disposed and assigned, with full power to uplift and discharge the rents and feu-duties of the said lands and others for crop and year 1826, in so far as the same are still outstanding, and all future crops and years, and also all arrears of rents and feu-duties due for bygone crops and years, to intromit with the personal estate hereby conveyed, compound, transact and agree, or enter into arbitration concerning the said lands and estate, real and personal, or any part thereof, and generally to do every other thing requisite and necessary for making the same effectual which I could have done before granting hereof."

Then followed this declaration :

" Which conveyance is granted in trust always, for the uses, intents and purposes following, viz. :—To the end that the said William Paul, whom failing, as aforesaid, the said Lindsay Mackeray, whom failing, any other trustee or trustees who shall be named in manner after mentioned, may and shall enter into the immediate use and possession of my whole estate, heritable and moveable, means and estate above conveyed, with power to the said William Paul, or other trustee acting for the time, to sell and dispose of my said lands and others, or such parts and portions thereof as to the said trustee acting for the time shall appear proper and expedient, and that either by private sale or public voluntary roup," &c.

After an enumeration of the purposes, and statement as to the manner of carrying out the trust in regard to the subjects conveyed, the deed contained the following clause :

" And farther, I bind and oblige myself, and mine aforesaid, to grant and to execute, at any time when required, such farther deed or deeds as may be judged necessary by my said trustee or trustees, or by a majority in value of my said creditors, for the more effectually carrying the purposes of the present trust into full and complete execution."

The precept of sasine contained the following clauses :

" Moreover, I do hereby make and constitute my said trustees in trust, for the uses and purposes foresaid, and their disponees, my cessioners and assignees, not only in and to the whole writs, rights and evidents, title-deeds and securities, old and new, concerning the said lands and others above disposed, with the whole clauses of warrandice, and other clauses, tenor and contents thereof, and all that has followed, or is competent to follow thereupon ; but also in and to the rents, mails and duties, customs and casualties due or payable for or forth of the said lands, for crop and year 1826, and all arrears of preceding crops and years, and in and to the tacks of the said lands, and whole prestations therein contained incumbent on the tenants thereof, and all diligence and execution of the law competent to follow thereupon ; surrogating and substituting my said trustees in my full right and place of the whole premises, with full power to them to do everything requisite for completing and establishing the absolute right and property of the said lands and others, and titles to the same, in their persons, and for making the rents thereof effectual, in the same manner, and as fully and freely in all respects as I could have done myself before granting these presents : Which lands and others above disposed, with this disposition thereof, and resignation and infestments to follow hereupon, and assignation to the writs and evidents, I bind and oblige me and my heirs to warrant to my said trustees, for the uses and purposes foresaid, and to their assignees, at all hands, and against all deadly, and the assignation to the personal estate, and the rents, mails, and duties of my said lands, from my own proper facts and deeds only ; and I specially empower the said William Paul, or other trustee acting for the time, to call for and receive the whole foresaid writings and evidents from all persons whatever, in whose custody and keeping the same may be. And I consent to the registration hereof," &c.

At the time of executing the trust-deed, Mr Hill, as alleged in the summons in the present action,

" was keeper, or joint keeper, along with the deceased Frederick Fotheringham, W.S., of the Register of Sasines for the shire of Renfrew and regalities of Glasgow and Paisley, under a certain commission or appointment made by the Crown in favour of the said Robert Hill and Frederick Fotheringham, or one or other of them, and the survivor of them : That the said Robert Hill drew the fees and emoluments, as sole keeper of the said register, after the death of the said Frederick Fotheringham, which happened upon the day of ; and the said Robert Hill was entitled to, and applied the whole fees and emoluments for his own behoof, at least since the death of his last surviving sister Helen Hill, who died on or about the 1st day of March 1835, the brothers and sisters of the said Robert Hill having and claiming, during their respective lifetimes, some share or interest in the fees and emoluments arising from the said office."

An action was raised in 1837 by the trustee, in order to compel Mr Hill to account for the emoluments of the office, and the summons alleged,

" That the said Robert Hill contrived for some time to conceal from the pursuer and his creditors the fact that he held the said office, or at least that he had right to the fees and emoluments arising therefrom, which fees and emoluments he, the said Robert Hill, was uplifting and wholly applying for his own use and behoof, at least from the death of his said sister : That the said fees and emoluments have amounted, and did amount, during the period referred to, to about the sum of £1200 of free yearly income, after giving deduction for allowances to clerks, substitutes-keepers, and other charges."

The summons proceeded to allege, that having discovered the fact, the pursuer by letter requested the defender to state the amount of the emoluments from the date of his sister's death, but that this was refused. It went on to aver,

" That the pursuer having, some time after the date of the said letter, obtained intelligence which led him to suspect that some improper arrangement was contemplated, or was in progress in regard to the said office, the pursuer caused inquiry to be made on this subject in London, and at the public offices, about the end of August or beginning of September 1836 : That it now appears that the said Robert Hill, after the date of the foresaid requisition from the pursuer, and on or about the day of August 1836, renounced or surrendered his right to the said office, and gave up his commission, but under a promise or understanding that a new commission was to be forthwith granted by the Crown to and in favour of Thomas Grahame, writer to our Signet, who is a near relative of the said Robert Hill, and Thomas Hill, son of the said Robert Hill : That accordingly a warrant under his Majesty's sign-manual was issued on or about the 10th of August 1836, reciting that the office of keeper of the register of sasines within the city of Glasgow, for the sheriffdom of Renfrew, and regalities of Glasgow and Paisley, was vacant by the resignation of the said Robert Hill, and directing a writ or grant to pass under the Privy Seal of Scotland, nominating the said Thomas Grahame, and the said Thomas Hill, keepers, or joint keepers, of the said Register of Sasines, the said Robert Hill to be paid £300 a-year out of the fees and emoluments arising from such office ; or at least a letter or order for a writ, of the above or similar effect, was issued at or about the time specified : That a commission from the Crown has accordingly been obtained by the said Thomas Grahame and Thomas Hill to the said office, dated on or about the 24th August 1836, following upon the surrender or resignation of the said Robert Hill : That the said Thomas Grahame and Thomas Hill, or one or other of them, and in virtue of, or under pretence of said commission, are now drawing and uplifting the whole fees and emoluments arising from said office."

It also contained allegations that the arrangement set forth in the summons was collusive and fraudulent on the part of Robert Hill, Thomas Grahame, and Thomas Hill, for the purpose of defeating the trust granted by Robert Hill, in so far as the emoluments of the office were concerned. And it concluded, that Robert Hill should account for the emoluments drawn since his sister's death, and likewise that his son and Grahame were bound to pay over the emoluments they had hitherto drawn, and in time coming.

Defences were lodged for Robert Hill, Thomas Grahame, and Thomas Hill.

In his defences, Mr Robert Hill denied that the emoluments of the office, or the right to it, was carried, or intended to be carried by the trust, which, he averred, contained no allusion, far less any assignation to them. He averred that it was well and publicly known at the date of the trust, that, along with Fotheringham, he held the office, but that he paid his share of the emoluments, by a family arrangement, to his brothers and sisters so long as they lived; that after the death of Fotheringham, and of Helen his surviving sister, he entered upon the office, and received the emoluments; but about 1836, he stated that his health had become so broken that he felt obliged to resign. He accordingly did so in favour of his son Thomas and Mr Thomas Grahame, who, as a condition of their appointment by the Crown, were specially bound, as appeared on the face of their commission, to pay him an annuity of £300 for life. He further stated, that he tendered his resignation at the exact period he did, in the hope of benefiting his son, and securing this provision.

He pleaded—1. That the pursuer had not instructed, and did not possess any right or title to pursue the present action, in respect the trust-deed contained no conveyance of the office, or of its emoluments: 2. That viewing the true nature of the present action, which involved a challenge of a Crown appointment, the summons was not aptly framed for a trial of the question, and the proper parties were not in the field: 3. That as the office of keeper of the register was not adjudgable, nor capable of being assigned, and was not de facto adjudged from, or assigned by the defender, he was entitled to exercise the office, and to receive the emoluments, in so far as the office was not held by him in trust for others: 4. That, in so far as the action concluded for payment of fees drawn prior to the death of Miss Helen Hill, it could not be maintained, seeing that these fees were paid over to parties to whom the defender was under an obligation to pay them: 5. That in so far as the action applied to fees and emoluments derived from the office after the death of that lady, it could not be legally maintained, seeing that these fees belonged to the defender, and were not conveyed by him to any party, nor attached by any legal diligence: 6. That the defender was entitled to resign the office, and on the conditions attached to the resignation; and that the charges of fraud and deceit founded on that resignation were entirely groundless.

Separate preliminary defences, and on the merits, were lodged for the other defenders, but it is unnecessary at present to enter upon them, farther than to mention that the preliminary defences were directed against the relevancy of the action as applied to these defenders, and those on the merits to the effect that the parties now in possession of the office held it in respect of a sufficient title from the Crown, which was not called in question by any reduction.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"10th March 1837.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the preliminary defences, repels the defence or objection to the title of the pursuer, founded on the allegation that the trust-deed in his favour did not convey any of the profits or emoluments of the office then vested in the truster, which accrued subsequently to the date of that trust-deed; and, 2do, In respect that all the other defences pleaded as preliminary, either depend on disputed matters of fact, or are involved in the merits, reserves and supercedes the consideration of them till the cause comes to be discussed on the closed record: And, in respect the defenders state they do not mean to acquiesce in this judgment, finds them liable in expenses, allows an account to be given in, and remits the same to the auditor of Court for his taxation and report."

To this interlocutor his Lordship added the following

"Note.—The question of title is not without difficulty. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defender Hill being, at the date of the trust, vested in a life office, which he executed by deputy, and which yielded large, though fluctuating annual profits, is to be regarded as the owner of a life annuity, which, he apprehends, would clearly have been carried by the general conveyance of his whole moveable property and estate of every description, to his trustee: That he was under a previous obligation to account for a part, or even the whole of these profits, to his sisters during their lives, would not bar the effect of this conveyance, as the radical right to them was still in his person, as incident to the office itself, of which he was the only holder. If such previous obligation was onerous and unchallengeable, it was still but a temporary burden upon his primary right; and that, being onerously conveyed to his trustee, such conveyance would take effect as soon as the burden was worked off, just as the conveyance of a fee under the burden of a liferent would vest the radical right in the disponee from the first, though its actual enjoyment must be postponed till the liferent was run out. If the whole profits were not so pledged to the sisters, or, if their right was not onerous, the form of the action seems sufficient to make the defender Hill still account for them to the pursuer.

"With regard to the other preliminary defences, the Lord Ordinary inclines to think that the summons would have been better if it had rested the case against the new patentees, on a positive averment of their having been actually participant in the fraud charged against the defender Hill, without any alternative, and had either embraced reductive conclusions on this ground, or put the claim against them expressly as for damages, the measure of which might, no doubt, have been the whole amount of their actual intromissions. But, even as the libel is framed, and with a view to the more detailed averments which may yet be made in support of it, he is not prepared to say that it is incompetent, or such as the defenders are now entitled to have dismissed, or even amended.

"As against Hill, where there is an unconditional averment of fraud, and also an express conclusion for damages, he thinks the libel is clearly relevant and sufficient; and even as to the patentees, it is to be observed, 1st, That fraud is also distinctly charged against them, although with an alternative, and that it is not clear that it would be necessary or expedient to make any finding, hoc statu, as to the relevancy of the other alternative ground of conclusion, if this primary one, which may be ultimately sufficient for the determination of the cause, be clearly sufficient. But, 2d, It is expressly stated in the summons that these patentees were one of them the son, and the other a near relation, of the original holder, and the summons is otherwise so expressed as to make it competent for the pursuer to allege more specifically, in a condescendence, that these conjoint persons are truly to be regarded as drawing the profits of the said office in trust for the said defender Hill, and bound, consequently, to account for them to the pursuer, for behoof of his creditors; and, 3d, To the extent of the £300 per annum which the said patentees are bound, by the terms of their commission, to pay over to the said Robert Hill, the Lord Ordinary thinks there is no doubt that the claim of the pursuer is irrelevantly and insufficiently libelled, and as this is a part, and may by possibility be the whole of the profits and emoluments actually drawn by them, in the first instance, under their said commission, the conclusion for the whole of the said profit is, generically and technically, competent, and the question, whether it should be limited to the said £300, or to any other particular amount, less than the whole, is a question upon the merits, and as to the quantum for which decree should be issued, and not as to the relevancy of the action, or the sufficiency of the grounds of conclusion libelled.

"As to the objection raised on the terms of the Act of 49th Geo. III. c. 126, as to the sale or brokerage of offices, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that it has no application to such a case as the present. The provisions in the 11th section of that Act are plainly referable only to the case of a party stipulating for a share (or the whole) of the profits of an office which, by his resignation or instrumentality, is obtained or secured for another, and not to that of one, who, like the present pursuer, is seeking to vindicate for their true owners, profits actually drawn by persons who, in law and justice, are bound to account for them to others. At all events, this is a question upon the construction of a public Statute, which must form, if insisted on, an important part of the discussion on the merits of the case, and could not be, with any propriety, disposed of as a preliminary and exclusive plea."

The two Hills and Grahame reclaimed to the Court, when their Lordships ordered cases "on the question, whether to any, or to what effect and extent the emoluments of the office were, or could be carried by the trust-conveyance to the pursuer libelled on."

Thereafter the Court (Vol. XI. p. 59) adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. See supra for what took place at advising.

Against this judgment the defenders appealed.

The appellants pleaded—1. The trust-deed did not convey the office nor its emoluments, and it was proved by the summons that the trustee was not aware of Hill's right to it at the time. This was founded on as indicative that it was not within the meaning of parties at the time of the execution, though Hill averred that it was well known. An arrear of fees might pass under the general words "means and estate;" but there were no arrears at the date of the deed. General words of conveyance joined to particulars, could not apply to particulars different from those enumerated: Ersk. III. 4. 9. Cuninghame, M. 11,660. Ross, M. 14,948. Peebles, M. 5019. Fife, M. 2325. Fraser, M. App. Clause, 2. Waddel, M. 5022. 2. The obligation to grant other deeds was merely in order to render the trust more easy of execution, not to grant conveyances substantially of new subjects. 3. If it were held that such an office came within the words of general conveyance, then such office was not adjudgable: Wilson v. Falconer, M. 165; and if it could not be conveyed by judicial transference, it could not be so voluntarily: Davis v. Marlborough, 1 Swanst., 79. 49 Geo. III. c. 136. As the office could not be transferred, so neither could the emoluments: 49 Geo. III. c. 134. Palmer v. Bate, 6 Moore, 28, and cases there cited. 4. As to the other defenders, while the patent was unreduced, their title was clear.

The respondent pleaded—That the emoluments and office would have been carried by the deed, had the office itself been saleable, as the words of conveyance were so general. And it was not sufficient to say that the emoluments could not pass, because the office could not be attached. It did not follow that what was not attachable was not assignable. There was authority the other way: Hunter v. Gardner, 5 W. and S., 616. The intension was to convey every thing for behoof of creditors; and to attempt to limit the deed, was to frustrate the meaning of parties. Besides, the obligation to grant such deeds as the trustee considered necessary, implied an obligation to grant supplementary conveyances as particular estates came into view, because the object of the deed was a conveyance of every estate.

Lord Cottenham.—My Lords, I have considered this case with much anxiety, and am unable to concur in the judgment of the Court of Session, upon the point which four out of five Judges decided in favour of the pursuer; and am also of opinion, that the judgment cannot be supported upon another ground, which does not appear to have been the subject of much consideration below. The decision having been taken upon the preliminary defences, the statement in the summons is to be strictly attended to. It states that Robert Hill was, at the date of the trust-deed, keeper of the Register of Sasines for the county of Renfrew, under a commission or appointment by the Crown, and that he drew and applied the whole fees and emoluments for his own behoof, at least since the death of his sister Helen, in 1835,—his brothers and sisters having and claiming, during their respective lifetime, some share or interest in the fees or emoluments arising from the said office. It also sets out a letter of the 22d July of 1836, in which the pursuer demands of the defender an account and payment of what he had received from the office from the period of the death of his sister, Helen Hill. The pursuer's title is under a trust-deed for creditors, dated the 26th of October 1826. It appears from this statement, that at the date of the trust-deed in 1826, Robert Hill was entitled for life to the office, but that the profits of it were, to a great extent, if not the whole of them, applicable to other purposes, and that his prospects of any considerable income from it were expectant upon the decease of his brothers and sisters in his lifetime. The first question, and that upon which the case was decided below, is, whether the trust-deed included the profits; and it is competent, in putting a construction upon that deed, to consider the circumstances in which the defender and his property were placed at the date of it. There is not in the deed any mention of the office; and it is matter of dispute, whether the pursuer and the creditors of Robert were aware that he held it. It is not very probable that the persons with whom he was so connected were ignorant of it, but still there is no proof that they knew it. Had their knowledge of it appeared, it would have been impossible for the pursuer to contend that there was any intention of affecting the future profits of the office by this deed. The peculiar circumstances of the property so intended to be affected, would necessarily have called for, and produced very special and peculiar provisions in the deed. But still, although the creditors might know nothing of this property, and therefore have entertained no intention respecting it, the terms of the deed might have been so general and so calculated to include it, as to have been binding upon the defender, if there were no objection in law to his so dealing with the future profits of his office. In that case, the general intention of passing all that the defender then had, or might at any time become entitled to, if expressed in the deed, would have supplied the want of any particular intention with respect to the office in question. Now, it is not in dispute that the office itself, being held under the Crown, and for public purposes, was not assignable; and the question is, whether the future profits are included in the terms of the deed; for whether the defender was entitled to any part of such profits in possession, or was, as to the whole, in expectancy only until the death of the survivor of his brothers and sisters, the whole which could have been the subject of assignment consisted of profits thereafter to arise, and not any property in possession. But the terms of the deed are,—“and in general, my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, of whatever nature or denomination, or wherever situated, presently belonging to me.” If the office had been assignable, it might have been included in these terms,—it would have been “means and estate presently belonging” to the author of the deed, and of course, all future profits of the estate would have passed as part of it. But as the office did not pass, how can these words be made applicable to profits thereafter to arise from the office, which, it is admitted, continued with the original holder? Suppose there had been from this general description some particular property excepted, could it have been contended that future profits arising from such property were included? The office must be considered as excepted, because it was not by law assignable, which the parties must be supposed to have known. If it were necessary to resort to other parts of the deed to aid this construction of the terms used in describing the property intended to be included in it, the particular enumeration which follows may most properly be used for that purpose. In fact, all the trusts and provisions of the deed are inapplicable to the future profits of the office. The trustees are to enter into "immediate possession and use of the whole estate and arrears above conveyed, and to sell the same;" and it contemplates the completion of the trust within two years; and in speaking of future "rents, prices and produce," it confines itself to "rents, prices and produce of my said estate and effects." Whereas the office, that is the estate which was to produce the profits in dispute, is admitted not to be included in the deed, and therefore formed no part of the truster's "said estate and effects." It seems, indeed, to have been felt that there was great difficulty in bringing the future profits within the terms used; but it was said that the deed contained a provision for the trustees to grant such further deeds as might be necessary; which obligation, it was said, "perfected the general one, although there was no specific conveyance of the emoluments of the office." It appears to me that the provision in question cannot have any such effect,—it is merely a clause for further assurance of what was intended to be included in the prior grant, and was not intended to affect any property not included in it. If the description included the profits in question, no further deed could carry it further; and if the former description did not include it, this provision has no reference to it. The further deed is "for the more effectually carrying into execution the purposes of the present trust." If the only question had been what I have hitherto considered, I must have adopted the opinion of Lord Medwyn, opposed as it is to the high authority of Lord Jeffrey (the Lord Ordinary), Lord Glenlee, Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Meadowbank; and finding upon this point sufficient ground for reversing the interlocutor appealed from, the point which I am about to observe upon, must not be considered as the ground of the judgment of this House, which I am the more anxious to have understood; because, as it does not appear to have been the subject of consideration below, I should regret that the decision of this case should, under those circumstances, preclude discussion in Scotland, if it should hereafter arise, upon a point as to which this House had not had the benefit of the judgment of the Court of Session. The point to which I allude, is the legality of assigning the future emoluments of this office. It is a public office granted by the Crown for the benefit of the subject, to which, or to some other for the same purposes, a large class of the subjects of Scotland must resort, and are compelled to pay certain sums for the duty performed, which constitute the profits of it. The parties resorting to this office not only have an interest in the due performance of those duties, but have a right of action against the holder of the office, if from any neglect of his they sustain damage. Whether the emoluments exceed what may be considered necessary for the due performance of those duties, and to meet this responsibility, cannot be matter of inquiry in this suit. It must be assumed that the public are not taxed higher than is necessary to secure to them the due performance of the duties of the office, and his responsibility in case of any demand arising against him. What then would be the effect of this deed if it included the future profits of the office? Certainly to deprive him of all the profits of it, after discharging the necessary expenses; for the Court cannot have any right to restrict the generality of the terms used by an implied exception of what may be necessary for the officer's subsistence. That such an assignment would be held to be illegal and void in England, is not the subject of doubt. No two cases can be more similar than this case and that of Palmer v. Bate, in 2d Broderip and Bingham, 673. The cases there cited supersede the necessity of my referring to others, except that I may mention Lord Eldon's observations in Davis v. Duke of Marlborough, 79, as I do not find them referred to in the former case. Is there then any difference between the laws of the two countries upon this subject? The rule is established upon principles of public policy applicable equally to both,—but where is the decision that establishes that all the future profits of an office which cannot itself be assigned, may be transferred by the holder of the office to his creditors? Erskine, in B. II. t. 12, § 7, says, that offices of trust conferred during pleasure, or for life upon personal regards, cannot be appraised or adjudged; and in B. III. t. 6, § 7, he says,—the King's pensions are not arrestable, because they are alimentary; and indeed all salaries annexed to offices, in so far as they amount to no more than a reasonable allowance for the decent support of those who are named to them, ought, upon the same ground, to be accounted alimentary. The principle, therefore, upon which the English decisions have proceeded, is to be found in the law of Scotland, as might well be expected; but it happens that the very case now under consideration has received a judicial decision by the Court of Session. In Wilson v. Falconer, on 7th of December 1759, reported in Morrison, 165, it was decided, that the office in question was not adjudgable by creditors, and the effect of the decision was totally to repel the creditor's claim. Lord Kaimes indeed seems to have thought, that an adjudication of the emoluments would have been competent. The decision, however, did not recognise that declaration; and the principle upon which it was founded is as applicable to the emoluments as to the office itself. I will not pursue this subject further, because it is not the ground upon which I intend to propose to the House to reverse the judgment of the Court below. What I have said will, I hope, secure attention to the point, if it should hereafter arise for decision. I therefore move your Lordships to reverse the interlocutors appealed from,—to sustain the preliminary defences, and dismiss the action, and to find the appellant (the defender) entitled to the expenses of the suit below.

Interlocutors reversed.

Lord Jeffrey, Ordinary.—Archibald Grahame, Appellants' Solicitor.—[W.H.D.]

INDEX.

CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

A

ACCOUNTING—See Debtor and Creditor. Process.
ACQUIESCENCE—See Friendly Society. Personal Exception.
ACT OF GRACE, 1696—See Cessio.
ACT OF SEDERUNT—See Process.
ACT OF PARLIAMENT—See Statute.
ADVENTURE—See Partnership.
ADVOCATION—See Process. Proof.
ADULTERY—See Divorce.
AGENT AND CLIENT—Auditor's Report—Objection, p. 216.

—— CONTRACT—PROOF, p. 444.

Responsibility—Reparation—Consequential Damage—

Terce—A widow, who had repudiated a postnuptial contract which she had accepted in lieu of her legal claims, and been served to her terce, having brought an action of damages against agents whom her husband had employed, several years before his marriage, to infest him in certain lands, because an erasure in the instrument of sasine had proved fatal to the infestment, and so excluded the terce,—the agents were assoilzied, p. 571.

—— See Competition. Expenses. Process.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—See Diligence. Process.

AGREEMENT—Contract—Construction—In regard to a written agreement, by which a party was bound to supply certain commission-agents "with one puncheon of whisky per week," "the same to be delivered free at D., in puncheons, hogsheads and half-hogsheads: it being understood that not more than one half-hogshead per week shall be required"—Held that the true construction was, that the obligant was bound to deliver the whisky at the rate of one puncheon per week, p. 419.

ALIMENT—Parent and Child—Filiation—Bastard—Semi-plena Probatio—Proof—Evidence held insufficient to constitute a semiplena probatio, p. 390.

—— Pupil—Where a pupil, seven years of age, had a free income of about £490, arising from the interest of money left him by his father, who had lived in a comparatively humble station, the sum of £150 yearly was awarded to his mother as his aliment during pupillarity, p. 258.

—— See Cessio. Parent and Child. Parish. Poor. Prescription.

ANNUITY—See Husband and Wife. Parent and Child.

ANNUITY-BOND—See Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 40.

APPEAL—See Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 54. Process.

ARBITRATION—Decree-Arbitral—An attempted reduction of a decree-arbitral, as ambiguous and ultra vires compromissi, repelled, p. 446.

—— Judicial Reference—Process—Observed by a majority of the Court, that the award of a judicial referee has the privileges of a decree-arbitral, and cannot be opened up on the ground of error, p. 57.

—— Reduction—Circumstances in which, where there was a written reference to two valuers, an award by an oversman appointed by the referees was opened up: the material objections being, 1st, that the referees, and then the oversman, acted without hearing parties; and, 2d, that there was not legal evidence of the appointment of the oversman, or consent of parties to his nomination, p. 551.

ARRESTMENT—See Bankrupt. Diligence. Process. Small-Debt Act.

ASSESSMENT—See Process.

ASSIGNATION—See Bankrupt. Bill of Exchange Catholic. Creditor. Landlord and Tenant. Settlement.

AUGMENTATIONS OF STIPEND:—

CARLUKE, Presbytery of Lanark, p. 27.

DURRISDEER, Presbytery of Penpont, p. 281.

KIRKMICHAEL and GARRELL, Presbytery of Lochmaben, p. 423.

LANGHOLM, Presbytery of Langholm, p. 258.

LESMAHAGOW, Presbytery of Lanark, p. 192.

NIGG, Presbytery of Tain, p. 258.

TWEEDSMUIR, Presbytery of Peebles, p. 73.

B

BANK—See Bankrupt. Stamp Act, 55 Geo. III. c. 184.

BANKRUPT—Act, 2 and 3 VICT. c. 41, § 40—Annuity-Bond—Valuation—The widow of a bankrupt applied to the Sheriff to value an annuity provided to her by her husband, in an annuity-bond. Objections being stated to the validity of the bond, the Sheriff found that "thereby she had acquired right to an annuity of " and valued the same at — The Court recalled the former finding, but adhered to the valuation, p. 320.

—— 2 and 3 VICT. c. 41, § 54—Sequestration—Trustee

—Review—Appeal—A competitor for the office of trustee on a sequestrated estate lodged with the Sheriff-clerk a notice of appeal against the deliverance pronounced on the same day by the Sheriff-substitute, and, three days thereafter, lodged a bond of caution subscribed by himself and cautioner — Held that the appeal was incompetent, p. 66.

—— § 4—Deceased Debtor, p. 215.

—— Dividend—Trustee, Liability of—Held that no part of the expenses incurred by the trustee and the general body of creditors in unsuccessfully litigating a claim, can be charged or allocated so as to affect that claim; and that the trustee, having once had sufficient funds to answer the claim, is liable, first as trustee, and then if necessary personally for its amount, p. 33.

—— Reduction—Statute 1696, c. 5—An heritable bond by a party within sixty days of bankruptcy, in favour of a creditor who had made prior advances on the faith of the security being granted, not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5, p. 584.

—— Sale—Rejection on Insolvency—A party, considering himself insolvent, refused to receive a quantity of goods, and sent them back to the carrier's quarters. Thereafter he directed them to be taken to C and D, to be kept by them for behoof of the vendors; but some of his creditors complaining, he ordered C and D to send them to his own premises—Held, in the circumstances, that the rejection was final, and could not be recalled, p. 202.

—— Sequestration—Competition—Bank—Mandate—Letter of Credit—In a competition between the trustee of a sequestrated bankrupt and a bank, for the proceeds of a letter of credit, "payable after the 7th" by another bank,—the bank having cashed the letter on the 2d, on the holder's indorsement, and the sequestration having been awarded on the 6th—The bank was preferred, p. 194.

BANKRUPT—Sequestration—Composition—Observed, That after a composition has been carried through on the understanding that the debts were justly ranked, the bankrupt is not entitled to impugn the ranking on grounds which must have been known to him when the ranking was made, p. 52.

—Sequestration—Act 1621—Landlord and Tenant—A landlord, five years previous to his bankruptcy, authorised his factor to give his tenants a deduction of twenty per cent. for the bygone year, and to acquaint them that the deduction would be continued during the currency of their leases—Found that the abatement of rent was in the fair and bona fide administration of the estate at the time, and could not be objected to by the trustee of the landlord under his sequestration, p. 89.

—Sequestration—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 41—Diligence—Arrestment—Assignment—Competition—In a process of multiplepointing, the trustee in the sequestration of a deceased debtor preferred to a creditor who had used arrestment, and obtained an assignment in security in the debtor's lifetime, p. 128.

—Sequestration—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41—Composition—Offer, Notice of—The cautioners proposed by a bankrupt as security for a composition, which the creditors had agreed to accept at a meeting duly called for that purpose, declined to sign the bond of caution. Thereafter the bankrupt proposed an individual cautioner, of whom the creditors, at a meeting called only by advertisement, approved—Held that, in terms of the 113th section of the Statute, this second meeting ought to have been called by letter as well as by advertisement, and that the omission to do so was fatal to the composition-contract, p. 389.

—Sequestration—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 5 and 7—A native of Scotland, who was a partner of a foreign company, received a charge for a company debt, and retired within the Sanctuary. After the lapse of sixty days, a petition for sequestration of his estates was presented by his creditors, but without his own consent—Held that, not having had a dwelling-house or place of business in Scotland within a year before the date of presenting the petition, he was not liable to be sequestrated, p. 107.

—Sequestration—Trustee, Claims to Vote for—1. Where separate sequestrations were awarded of two firms carrying on business at different places, but in both of which the same individual was sole partner—Held that but one and the same estate was to be disposed of in their sequestration. 2. Held unnecessary, under the new Bankrupt Act, that the accounts of creditors claiming to vote should be signed. 3. Acknowledgment of debt by the bankrupt on the eve of bankruptcy, and sworn to by creditors, not sustained as a good title to vote in the election of trustee, p. 587.

—Sequestration—Trustee, Liability of—Interest—A trustee on a sequestrated estate, who had been found liable first as trustee, and then, if necessary, personally, in a principal sum, found further liable in bank interest on the sum, but not in interest annually accumulated, p. 393.

—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110—Assignee, Judicial—Real Estate, Vesting of—Held that the vesting order in Act, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, comprehends the real estate of the bankrupt situated in Scotland, and, being registered in the General Register of Seisins, excludes an action of adjudication at the instance of a creditor competing with the judicial assignee, p. 332.

—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41—Clause—Construction—Found that the estates to which a deceased debtor had right, were sufficiently vested in a trustee under the Bankrupt Statute, by the act and warrant of confirmation, to enable him to grant a disposition to a purchaser, p. 425.

—Statute, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 51—Affidavit—Construction—Clause—Citation—Prescription—Where a creditor applied for sequestration of the estate of a deceased debtor, and in the affidavit set forth his debt as due by various accounts, and that "the estates of the said" X "is still justly indebted and owing to this deponent the foresaid sum," "together also with interest, being the aggregate amount of principal sums due to the deponent, as contained in the said account-current," "and that no part of the said debt has been paid, or compensated, or extinguished in any manner of way, and that the deponent holds no security for the same, or any part thereof, except the several vouchers of debt enumerated and set forth in the foresaid inventory"—Held that that was not a proper compliance with the 9th section of the bankrupt Statute,—Questions raised, whether a sequestration sleeps?—as to citing the next of kin besides the heir, and how obviated? and as to the effect of prescription alleged to arise on the debt set forth in the affidavit? p. 588.

BANKRUPT—See Debtor and Creditor. Process. Sale.

BASTARD—See Aliment of. Parent and Child. Prescription.

BILL-CHAMBER—See Process.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—See Jury Cause.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—A competition between the drawer and acceptor of a bill for possession of the document, after payment by the acceptor, partly out of his own funds, and partly out of a composition obtained from other bills ranked on the drawer's estate—decided in favour of the acceptor, p. 52.

—Blank Stamp—Notice—A party signing and delivering a blank bill becomes responsible, as acceptor, for any amount that the stamp will cover, and is not entitled to notice either of the amount for which it has been filled up, or of its not having been duly retired, p. 67.

—Indorsation—Assignment—Obligation—Stamp—The drawer of a bill of exchange discounted it at a bank, and thereafter retired it with the proceeds of another bill discounted by the bank. He afterwards transferred it to the bank agent, with an acknowledgment indorsed upon it that it had been retired with the funds of the bank agent, for repayment of which he, the drawer, bound himself with the acceptor. In an action by the bank agent against the acceptor—Held that this was not an indorsation to the bank agent, but a separate obligation, which, 1st, was not binding on the acceptor, in respect he was not proved to have authorised the drawer to grant it; 2d, was not, as an obligation, receivable in evidence, or actionable, in respect of not being duly stamped; 3d, not being a document in re mercatoria, could not prove its own date; and 4th, could not be regarded, and was not libelled, as an assignment, nor stamped as such, p. 534.

—Indorsation—Designation—Alteration—Suspension—A bill was indorsed by several parties, and when it passed out of the hands of the last indorser, no designation was attached to his own signature or to those of the prior obligants. A charge given by the holder to the last indorser was brought under suspension, on the ground that the designations subsequently given to some of the prior indorsers were erroneous—The Court repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the letters orderly proceeded, p. 25.

—Proof—Circumstances held sufficient to prove that a bill, bearing to be for rent of grass-parks, was granted for the accommodation of the drawer, deceased.—Observed, That verbal statements made by the drawer to the bank agent and to his own trustees, acknowledging that the bill was for his accommodation, were irrelevant and inadmissible, p. 37.

—Suspension—At a roup of certain tolls of several lines of road, managed under different Acts of Parliament, a party took the lease of one of the bars, and granted his bill for the rent. On the averment that he had taken the lease on the supposition that the tolls on the different lines were managed together, and for joint behoof, and that nothing would be done by the trustees on the one line to affect the traffic on the other, but that the understanding had been broken through by the trustees, who had injured his bar by taking compositions and lower tolls on one of the lines,—he prayed for suspension of a charge on the bill, and for interdict against the trustees taking compositions or lower tolls—Note refused, in respect the Road Acts were distinct and separate in their provisions, and that the one set of trustees had no control over the management of the others, p. 523.

—Suspension—Cessio—A suspension was presented, without caution or consignation, of a charge on a bill by an obligant therein, inter alia, on the ground that until the funds and effects conveyed to the trustee under a decree of cessio, obtained by him after the date of the bill and the period of payment, were exhausted, to which process the chargers were parties, they were not entitled to use diligence to attach any funds and effects now belonging to him.—The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the note, on the ground, principally, that the chargers disclaimed any intention of using personal diligence, and explained, that it was with the view to sequestration of the suspender under the Bankrupt Statute, p. 421.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—Vitiation—Process—Proof—Reduction of a bill having been brought on the ground that the date was vitiated or erased, the Lord Ordinary found that one figure in the date was erased, but that it was competent for the defender to prove, prout de jure, that the erasure was made prior to the issue and discount of the document; and afterwards, on a proof, found that the proof was affirmative of the question of fact remitted to probation.—The Court, on a reclaiming note, reduced, decerned and declared in terms of the libel, in respect the defender had failed to prove that the vitiation on the bill was made with the knowledge or consent of all parties thereto, p. 444.

—See Debtor and Creditor. Deposit. Prescription. Process.
BONA FIDE POSSESSOR—Circumstances in which the purchasers of an entailed estate, afterwards evicted from them, were found entitled, under deduction of the annual payments affecting the estate, to appropriate the rents as bona fide possessors, up to the date when the decree of eviction was affirmed by the House of Lords, p. 492.

BRIEVES, ADVOCATION OF—See Service.

BURGH—Customs—The petty customs levied by a corporation under their charter, "for the public good of the burgh," are not liable to be attached by creditors, p. 11.

—Disfranchisement—Managers, Appointment of, p. 177.

—MANAGERS OF—Lease—Statute 3 Geo. IV. c. 91

—The managers of a disfranchised burgh are bound, in letting the burgh property, and in all their other proceedings, to conform themselves to the rules and regulations that would be binding on the magistrates and councillors, p. 263.

—Road—Police Act, 7 Will. IV. c. 32—Held, that under the Edinburgh Police Act, the Sheriff or Dean of Guild has a judicial power to determine the situations in which foot-pavements are required, p. 548.

—See Jurisdiction. Obligation. Process. Superior and Vassal.

BURSARIES—See Mortification.

C

CASH-ACCOUNT—See Caution. Diligence.

CATHOLIC CREDITOR—Heritable Security—Assignment—Payment—A creditor made a loan to a widow on an assignment by her of her liferent interest in an heritable subject vested in family trustees. He then made another advance to the trustees themselves on an heritable bond, with a power of sale, over the same subject, to which the widow was a direct party, as the holder of the liferent. The creditor having proposed to sell, the widow tendered payment of the second advance by her son-in-law, one of the beneficiaries under the trust, and insisted on an assignment to the bond—Held that the creditor was not bound to grant the assignment, to the prejudice of his first security, p. 255.

—See Ranking and Sale. Trust.

CAUTION—Prescription, Septennial—Statute 1695, c. 5—A B, by his daughter's marriage-contract, conveyed certain heritable properties in name of tocher, in favour of certain trustees. Having failed to fulfil his obligation, an action at the instance of the trustees was raised against him, and inhibition used on the dependence. Sequestration supervened; and the cautioners for payment of his composition, in consideration of the action and inhibition being discharged, became bound with him for the sum of £1830 Sterling as an equivalent for the value of the properties conveyed in the contract, binding themselves "as cautioners, sureties, and full debtors with and for the said A B," "the said principal sum" being "payable within seven years after the term of Martinmas 1808, and at farthest, on the term of Martinmas 1815." No demand for payment having been made until 1827—found that the cautionary obligation was extinguished by the septennial prescription, p. 58.

CAUTION—Relief—Obligation—Cash-Account—Rei interventus—A letter of relief, addressed to a cautioner in a cash-account, enforced for all the sums paid by him under his cautionary obligation,—the letter having been dated the 28th January, and the bond of credit, though signed by him on the same day, not having been signed by the other cautioner till the 5th, nor operated upon till the 6th of February, p. 173.

—See Diligence. Process.

CESSIO—Act of Grace, 1696—Aliment—A party found entitled to cessio, on condition of assigning £5 of his wages for behoof of his creditors, having refused to make the assignation, was incarcerated on the warrant under which he petitioned. An application thereafter for aliment under the Act of Grace, or alternatively for liberation, refused, p. 335.

—See Bill of Exchange. Process.

CHARGE—See Diligence.

CHURCH—Jurisdiction—On the application of the majority of a presbytery deposed by the General Assembly, but reponed by the Court of Session—Interdict granted to prohibit the members chosen by the minority of the Presbytery from sitting in the General Assembly, p. 415.

—Manse—Statute 1663, c. 21—Where a manse has once existed, the repair or rebuilding of it falls under the second branch of the Statute 1663, to which the restriction of the expense to £1000 Scots does not apply, p. 7.

—Patronage—Jurisdiction—Process—Certain parishioners having complained that a majority of the presbytery of the bounds had inducted a minister into the parish in violation of the Act on Calls, in disregard of a tender of special objections, and pending appeals to the higher church courts, the Commission of the General Assembly interdicted the presbytery from officiating, and authorised the members of presbytery, not complained of, to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish—A note of suspension of this sentence passed, and interdict against the execution of it granted by the Court of Session, p. 347.

—Patronage—Vacant Stipend—Statutes, 1592, c. 117, and 54 Geo. III. c. 169 (Ministers' Widows' Fund)—Where a presbytery had rejected a presentee on the veto, and refused to proceed with his trials after it had been found that they were still bound to do so—Held that, subsequently to the date of the citation in an action of declarator directed against all having interest, the stipend falling due during the life of the presentee belonged not to the trustees for the Ministers' Widows' Fund, but to the patron, p. 597.

—Quoad Sacra Ministers—Jurisdiction—Interdict—A presbytery having resolved to serve one of their members with a libel—Interdict, prohibiting the Presbytery from proceeding in the matter, granted, on the ground that one of the alleged members of presbytery was a quoad sacra minister, p. 414.

CITATION—See Bankrupt Statute. Process.

COAL AND LIMESTONE, RESERVATION OF—See Superior and Vassal.

COMMISSION AND DILIGENCE—See Process. Service.

COMMON—See Property.

COMMONTY—See Parish.

COMPENSATION—Retention—Concursus debiti et crediti—A copartnership were found liable in a sum of money to X, a creditor, who had previously executed a trust-deed for behoof of creditors. Thereafter, one of the partners, when the firm was dissolved, acquired right by assignation to a debt due by X, and attached the same by arrestment in the hands of the company, and of the individuals who had constituted the firm. In a competition for the company debt between this partner and X's trustee—Circumstances in which held that the partner was preferable to the trustee: the main ground being, that the trust-deed merely conveyed the trustor's heritage as a fund of payment to his creditors, p. 403.

—See Landlord and Tenant.

COMPETENT AND OMITTED—Circumstances in which a party, who, as a residuary legatee, was decerned to pay a sum of money nominatim to the parties claiming it, against whose title a valid objection was said to exist, and the decree was allowed to go out and be extracted in their name, was held not entitled thereafter to urge the objection, to the effect - of compelling them, or those through whom they claimed, to make up a title by confirmation, which, it was alleged, was necessary to cure the defect, p. 403.

- COMPETITION—Diligence—Preference of Ancestor's Creditors—Statute 1661, c. 24—A creditor of a party deceased having constituted his debt by decree, and attached the estate of his debtor within three years from the period of his death—Held that a bond granted by the heir of the debtor within year and day of his death, was reducible under the Act 1661, c. 24, although averred to have been granted for the purpose of paying debts due by the ancestor, p. 284.
- Statute 1661—Inhibition—Agent and Client—Writer's Hypothec—Held, 1. That inhibition is not a sufficient diligence to establish a preference under the Act 1661: 2. That a writer's hypothec is not struck at by an inhibition, though used previous to it, p. 101.
- See Bankrupt. Diligence. Husband and Wife. Process.
- COMPOSITION—See Bankrupt. Superior and Vassal.
- CONFIDENTIALITY—See Process.
- CONSIGNATION—See Process.
- CONSUEITUDE—See Process.
- CONTRACT—Arbitration—Submission—Railway Statute 6 and 7 Gul. IV.—Construction—A proprietor of land through which a railway passed, entered into an agreement and submission, by which he allowed the company to take possession of the ground prior to the ascertainment of its value, and stipulated that that point should be ascertained by arbiters, with power to name the time from which interest was to run on the price and damage when fixed. The company entered to possession under the agreement, but the submission fell from failure to prorogate. A jury having been summoned under the Statute to fix the value and damage, assessed the price of the land at a greater sum than the company offered both for value and damage, but found nothing for damage—Held that the claims of the parties fell to be regulated, not by the Statute, but by the original agreement; and that the company having entered to possession at Martinmas 1837, were bound in payment of interest on the sum in the verdict from that date, p. 622.
- See Agent and Client. Agreement. Obligation. Partnership. Proof.
- ANTENUPTIAL—See Husband and Wife. BREACH OF
- See Superior and Vassal. MUTUAL—See Obligation.
- CORPORATION—See Exclusive Privilege. Title and Interest to Sue.
- CULPA LATA—See Trust.

D

- DAMAGES—See Agent and Client. Jury Cause. Process. Reparation. Sale. Suspension.
- DEAN OF GUILD—See Jurisdiction.
- DEBITUR NON PRÆSUMITUR DONARE—See Proof.
- DEBTOR AND CREDITOR—Account—Submission—Circumstances in which a clerk to a submission obtained full payment of his account out of a fund consigned by one only of the submitters, p. 533.
- Donation—Bankrupt—Bill of Exchange—A party, after being discharged on a composition-contract, granted to one of his creditors, who had not claimed in the sequestration, a bill for the full amount of his debt. Suspension of a charge on this bill refused, in the absence of any averment that it had been obtained from the granter through fraud or concussion, p. 455.
- DECREE—See Process. ARBITRAL—See Arbitration. IN ABSENCE—See Process.
- DELECTUS PERSONÆ—See Obligation.
- DEPOSIT—Restitution—Bill of Exchange—A bill deposited in a bank having been inadvertently delivered to a third party who had a partial interest in it—Held that the bank were bound to restore the bill to the depositor, or pay the full amount of the proceeds, without deducting the partial interest of the third party, p. 514.
- DILIGENCE—Arrestment—Title and Interest to Object—Circumstances in which held, that the manager of a public company, in whose hands an arrestment had been used, which was alleged to be ex facie unwarranted and informal, was found entitled to resist the delivery of certain goods thereby attached, until the issue of a process which would determine the question as to the competency and validity of the diligence, p. 398.

DILIGENCE—Charge—Caution—Relief—Cash—Credit—A cash-credit bond was signed by three co-obligants, to be operated upon by two of them as a company. Under a previous arrangement, the first sums drawn under the bond were employed in paying a private debt due by one of the partners to his father, the third co-obligant—In these circumstances, held that the third co-obligant, who had paid up the bond and obtained an assignment to it, was not entitled to give a charge upon it to the other partner, p. 564.

—Charge—Process—A warrant to charge in name of a company, and the individual partners, is not sufficient to sustain a charge in name of the individuals only, without any mention of the company, p. 22.

—Execution—Charge—The charge given bearing to be by virtue "of an extract-registered protested note or bill of exchange," Question, Whether the inaccuracy was such as to make the charge inept? p. 12.

—Legal—Partnership—Foreign—A bill drawn by a foreign firm upon a firm in London, consisting of the same individuals, was dishonoured—A charge given upon the bill to one of the partners who had been found in Scotland, held to be competent; and a note of suspension, presented without caution or consignation, refused, p. 107.

—Mandate, Implied—Competition—The agents of a proprietor who had become insolvent continued, after arrestment of the rents by certain creditors, to make disbursements on the property, including payments of feu-duty, poor's-rates and insurance, and took the receipts as for behoof of the proprietor. In a competition between the agents, claiming the amount of these disbursements, and the arresters—the arresters were preferred, p. 98.

—Reparation—Guarantee—Agent and Principal—Liability—A creditor having obtained decree and diligence against his debtor for the sum of £102. 6. 9½, the agents of the debtor wrote saying—"We have now received authority to offer you, for an assignment of the debt and diligence, the sum of £85," which was accepted of. Eighteen days thereafter, the agents wrote, stating that the party expected to make the advance had found it impossible to give the money—Held that the agents were personally liable to implement the offer which they had made, p. 265.

—See Bankrupt. Competition. Process. Public Officer.

DISCHARGE—See Competent and Omitted.

DISPOSITION—See Property.

DIVORCE—ADULTERY, p. 233.

—See Husband and Wife.

DOMICILE—See Process.

DONATIO—See Husband and Wife. Debtor and Creditor.

E

ENTAIL—Act of Parliament, Sale of Entailed Lands, and Application of the Price, under—Clauses in a private Act of Parliament held to import, that the heir of entail in possession was not entitled to receive the interest of the money arising from the sale of certain parts of the entailed estate as a surrogatum for the rents, until the prices of the lands purchased equalled those of the lands sold, exclusive of the expenses, p. 193.

—A clause irritating "all the debts and deeds" of the heirs of entail, and also "all adjudications or other legal diligence" used upon the same, found to be an effectual irritancy, p. 527.

—Construction—The maker of an entail called to the succession a number of substitutes, reserving to himself the power to alter the succession, except as to the first five substitutions; as to which the said order of succession was declared unalterable by himself, or his son the institute, or by the heirs of tailzie above mentioned—Held that "the heirs above mentioned" denoted not merely the first five substitutions, but the heirs generally; and that the prohibition against altering the succession was binding upon the sixth and succeeding substitutes, p. 91.

ENTAIL—Factor loco tutoris—Lease—Authority granted to the factor loco tutoris of a minor in possession of an entailed estate to grant leases to endure for nineteen years—the next heir being abroad, and his agents declining to interfere, p. 192.

—Fetters—At the conclusion of a general resolutive clause there followed a directory clause as to the way in which the heirs succeeding upon a contravention may make up titles to the estate,—the direction to the next heir being to establish his right without respect to “any innovation, alteration or change, by the person contravening, or any acts of commission or omission, or any acts or deeds whatsoever, which may import any contravention of the above-written clause irritant.”—Held that this directory clause formed no part of the resolutive clause, and that the omission to enumerate therein sales or debts, did not exempt those acts from the prohibitions of the entail, p. 91.

—Fetters—An entail prohibited selling, disposing, contracting debt, “or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, or the persons above named,”—resolved the right of any heir who should “failzie herein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination and appointment,”—and irritated “all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination.”—Held that these fetters were effectual, p. 525.

—Fetters—An entail prohibited, inter alia, “to sell, alienate, impignorate or dispoine,”—resolved the right of the party contravening “the before-written provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, and others herein contained,” and further declared, that “in case any adjudication, appraising, or other legal diligence” shall be used against the estate “upon any debts or deeds” of the institute or substitutes, “not only shall such debts or deeds, with the adjudications, appraisings, or other legal diligence, be void and null,” but the contravener “shall ipso facto forfeit his or her right” to the estate—Held that the entail effectually excluded sales, p. 301.

—Fetters—By the prohibitory clause in a deed of entail it was declared, that it shall not be lawful to “contract debts, nor give bond or obligation, nor do any other fact or deed whatsoever, whereby the said estate may be appraised.” By the irritant and resolutive clauses it was declared, that if the heirs shall contravene by the “contracting of debts,” then the said “bonds and obligements” shall be null and void—Held that the irritant and resolutive clauses were not effectual against the contracting of personal debts, or the diligence of adjudication proceeding thereon, p. 206.

—Fetters—Title to Sue—The prohibitory and irritant clauses mentioned in the immediately preceding rubric, found to be an effectual bar against the trustees of the heir of entail pursuing a declarator with conclusions to have it found that the estate was liable for the debts of the heir, and consequently to be adjudged; and that they were entitled to give bonds and obligations for the debts whereby the estate might be adjudged, p. 206.

—Fetters—A prohibition to “burden or affect” the estate, in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money,” &c., held sufficient to prohibit the contraction of debt, p. 314.

—Fetters—Held that a power of sale was effectually excluded by an entail, which, after prohibiting “to sell, alienate or dispoine,” resolved the right of the party doing any thing “in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing,” without mentioning selling,—and irritated “the debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts” of the party doing any thing “in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing,” “or contracting debts,” “or by committing the crime of treason, or any species thereof, or any other crime or delict, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal,” p. 296.

—Heirs—Portioners—Representation—Service—An entail having been rendered ineffectual by the succession of heirs-portioners, while the destination in favour of a series of substitutes remained unexhausted—Held that the heir in possession previous to the succession of the heirs-portioners, was subject to the fetters of the entail,—that the estate was not affectable by his debts,—and that the heirs-portioners (his sisters) had not incurred representation to him by serving to him as heirs of tailzie and provision, p. 242.

—Precept of Sasine—In the precept of sasine there was no express mention of the resolutive clause—the mandate being merely to give sasine “with and under the burdens, provisions, and irritant clauses above mentioned”—Held that these words comprehend both the irritant and resolutive clauses, pp. 91, 206.

ENTAIL—Registration—A supplementary deed of entail referring in general terms to the fetters of the original deed, but not mentioning them specifically, held not to be duly recorded, in terms of the Statute, in the Register of Tailzies, p. 314.

—Statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51—Repairs, though made at once, if not more than sufficient for ordinary tear and wear, are not chargeable against the succeeding heir of entail, p. 104.

—Unrecorded, Powers of the Heir possessing under—A party possessing under an entail of lands situated in two different counties, obtained an Act of Parliament authorising a sale of those in the one county for the purchase of lands in the other, to be settled on the heirs of entail “in the same order and course of succession,” and subject to the same “restrictions and limitations, clauses irritant and resolutive.” Under the authority of this Act the lands were sold, and others purchased and entailed, and the entail recorded. Thereafter, the party who had obtained the Act, on the marriage of her son executed a deed, in which, reserving her own life-rent, she disposed to him, her “heir of tailzie,” and the other substitutes, as before, the whole of the lands of the original entail not sold, and those purchased under the Act, under the same fetters, but providing that he, his heirs and successors, should be bound to possess “by virtue of these presents.” On this deed infestment was taken, and possession followed for more than forty years—Held, 1. That this deed must be considered as an original substantive entail; and not having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, that it was ineffectual against creditors or purchasers; and, 2. That the heir in possession had full power to sell and use the price at pleasure, free from all claims whatever at the instance of the substitute heirs of entail, p. 177.

—See Parent and Child. Resting-Owing. Superior and Vassal. Testament.

ERROR—See Process.

EVIDENCE—See Process. Proof.

EXCISE LAWS—5 Geo. IV. c. 74; 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 63—

Agreement—Where a party agreed to supply another with one puncheon of whisky per week, the same to be delivered in puncheons, hogsheads, and half-hogsheads, and it was pleaded, that the agreement was null under the Excise laws, in respect the agreement should have been made by the imperial gallon, or by some multiple or aliquot part thereof—Held that the plea was not applicable, p. 419.

EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE—Corporation—Powers—The charter incorporating the Solicitors to the Supreme Courts proceeds on the narrative, that the society had collected a sum of money for a library and for the relief of poor members, widows and children, and gives full power to make by-laws, and do other proper and necessary acts for conducting the affairs, and administering the funds of the incorporation, provided always that these were not contrary to the laws of the country, and were reviewable by the Court of Session on the summary application of any party having interest—Held that the society were not entitled, under their powers, to vote away a sum from their accumulated funds, and a proportion of the annual contributions of members, and money paid by new entrants, to a widows' scheme—the benefits of which were restricted to the widows of those members who chose to become annual contributors, p. 134.

—Process—Issues—Patent—Reparation—In an action of damages for the violation of a patent granted for “an invention for the improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required”—Found that the pursuer was entitled to an issue, whether the invention described in the letters-patent and specification is not his original invention?—and that he was not bound to limit his issue to the question, whether he is the true and first inventor of the machinery and apparatus for which the letters-patent were granted? p. 174.

EXECUTION—See Diligence. Process.

EXECUTRY—See Parent and Child. Title to Sue.

EXPENSES—Auditor's Report—Fee, p. 86.

—Honorarium to Counsel—Process—Circumstances in which the fees of three counsel were allowed against a party found liable in expenses, p. 25.

—Process—A party who ultimately obtained a verdict in his favour, found liable in the expenses of a litigation, in which he endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to show that the cause was unfit for trial by jury, p. 104.

—Process—Record—Circumstances in which the Court, on cause shown, allowed the expense of a condescence which the Lord Ordinary held to be unnecessary, p. 16.

—Superior and Vassal—Agent and Client—A vassal found liable to the agent of the superior for the expense of preparing a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat, though, from the vassal's having afterwards resolved to enter in a different form, the deeds prepared were cancelled p. 96.

—See Inhibition, Recal of. Lis Alibi. Mandate. Parent and Child. Process. Statute. Trust, Latent.

EXTRACTOR—See Process.

F

FACTOR, JUDICIAL—See Process.

—LOCO TUTORIS—See Entail.

FILIATION—See Aliment. Parent and Child.

FOOT-ROAD, PUBLIC—See Servitude.

FOREIGN—Testament—Construction—A party who died domiciled in Grenada, where the bulk of his estate and effects were situated, executed a will there, having reference in its provisions to certain funds of the testator situated in Scotland—Held that the true import and effect of the will must be determined by the law of England, p. 576.

—See Diligence, Legal. Jurisdiction. Mandate. Process. Testament.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY—Forfeiture—Acquiescence—Proof—Mora—Under a regulation of a friendly society saving from forfeiture those members who could prove to the satisfaction of the society that they had been "prevented from paying up, either by imprisonment in a foreign country, or some other urgent necessity"—Held competent for a member, eight years after his forfeiture had been declared, to prove that he had been so prevented, p. 149.

H

HEIR-APPARENT—See Process.

HEIRS-PORIONERS—See Entail.

HERITABLE—See Jurisdiction. CREDITOR—See Property. AND MOVEABLE—See Parent and Child. Proof. Trust-Settlement.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Antenuptial Contract—Jus Mariti—In an antenuptial contract in which the wife reserved right to the whole property coming to her from her father and mother, and the husband's jus mariti, &c., was excluded, as also the rights of his creditors—Held, on the terms of the deed, that the jus mariti was excluded as to the annual profits thereof; but question raised, whether the wife was bound to contribute, out of the profits accruing ante matrimonio, to the current expenses of the family? p. 466.

—Donatio—Revocation—A husband, a number of years after marriage, executed a bond of annuity, in which, for the alleged purpose of supplying the want of a marriage-contract, he bound himself to pay to his wife, in satisfaction of her legal claims, an annuity of £200 during his life, and of £500 after his death, in the event of her survivance—Held that the annuity of £200 was revocable, as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, p. 229.

—Fee and Liferent—Provision—A husband having purchased certain heritable subjects exclusively with his own funds, took the conveyance to and in favour of himself and spouse "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor, and their heirs, assignees, or disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably"—Held, after the death of the husband, that the widow, as survivor, was the unlimited heir of the property thereby conveyed, p. 567.

—Jus Mariti—A sum of money, identified as the amount of a bequest to a wife, independent of her husband, not chargeable with his debts or engagements, and payable on her receipt alone, and lying in bank on a receipt in her name—Held to be her sole property, exclusive of the jus mariti, p. 528.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Liferent and Fee—Destination—Sale—Implement—Title—A feu-right of certain property was conveyed to and in favour of a husband and wife, and "to the longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage," "whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee, heritably and irredeemably." The husband having died leaving no issue of the marriage, the widow sold the whole property—Held that she could not give a valid title to the purchasers, p. 277.

—Marriage-Contract—Annuity—Competition—Trust-Deed—A wife, who was secured in an annuity by antenuptial-contract, followed by infestment in her husband's lands, which were sold by his trustee, held entitled to have her annuity fully secured to her out of the balance of the price, after payment of the preferable securities, p. 556.

—Parent and Child—Divorce—Circumstances in which the Court refused to remove a child from the custody of a stranger, on an application presented after the father's death in name of the mother, who had been divorced for adultery, and of her brother, p. 4.

—Parent and Child—Testament—Clause—Construction—Circumstances in which held, in reference to the whole clauses of a marriage-contract, that the deed formed a general conveyance of the whole heritage of the husband, for the purpose of division among the children in a certain way, and was not to be construed as limited to a conveyance merely of certain special heritable subjects separately enumerated in one of the clauses.

—Obiter by the Lord Ordinary, that the meaning to be put by law on a marriage-contract could not be affected by any statement as to its meaning or import by one of the spouses in a subsequent testamentary deed, nor could a declaration, even by them both, impair or alter the previously fixed rights of the children, p. 620.

—Proof—Statute 6 and 7 Will. IV.—In Consistorial causes, the proof must be led before a Commissary-Sheriff, p. 516.

—Surrogatum—Circumstances in which a wife was preferred to her husband's creditor for a sum of money which had been lodged by him in the hands of a third party for a special purpose, but which was held to be clearly traceable as part of the price of her heritable estate, p. 231.

—See Jury Cause. Process.

HYPOTHEC—See Landlord and Tenant. Process.

—WRITER'S—See Competition. Process.

I

INHIBITION, RECAL OF—Expenses—Circumstances in which an inhibition was recalled, with expenses, except those applicable to a correspondence on the subject, which was deemed unnecessary, p. 192.

—See Competition.

INTERDICT—Suspension—Competency—10 Geo. II. c. 28; 43 Geo. III. c. 142—Theatrical Entertainment—Construction—The lessee of the Glasgow Theatre, established by letters-patent, held entitled to an interdict, to the effect of preventing another party enacting within the city of Glasgow or suburbs, all tragedies, comedies, operas, plays, farces, interludes, melo-dramas, burlettas, and all other entertainments of the stage of any description whatever, whether the same were licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or not, or any part or parts thereof, p. 591.

—See Church. Lis Alibi. Process.

ISSUES—See Exclusive Privilege. Process.

J

JUDGMENT, POSSESSORY—See Property.

JURISDICTION—Burgh—Dean of Guild—A party pulled down, and proceeded to rebuild in a certain form, a gable between his own premises and those of his neighbour, both situated within burgh. The neighbour instituted a process against him before the Bailie Court, and obtained a decret ordaining him to restore the gable, as far as practicable, to its original state—Held that the Court of the Magistrates was competent to entertain the action, and that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild was not privative, p. 48.

JURISDICTION—Foreign—Question, Whether the Scots Courts have jurisdiction over a foreigner, where the forum originis, locus contractus, and locus solutionis are Scotch? p. 129.

—Sheriff-Court—Heritable—Superior and Vassal—A superior feued out certain stances for street building in Edinburgh, according to a plan which delineated the size and position of the feus with reference to one another, and to the street and other buildings, but owing to some error, the line of street, as delineated on the plan, came afterwards to be shifted eight or ten feet backwards from the line drawn thereon; the consequence of which was, that if the feuar was obliged to build according to his agreement, his buildings would now encroach on, and stand eight or ten feet within the line of street as laid out and completed subsequent to the date of agreement, and before these particular feus had been built on. The superior brought an action in the Sheriff Court, under the penalty clause in the agreement for neglecting to build, to have the feuar ordained forthwith to erect his buildings, and he made offer to give the feuar the exact superficial area he had bargained for, by substituting an additional piece of ground behind—Held that the circumstances of the case raised a question of heritable right and title, which could not be competently discussed in the Sheriff-Court, p. 493.

—See Church. Process.

JURY CAUSE—Damages—Patent, Infringement of—Jury question, in an action of damages, as to the infringement of a patent for an improved application of air to produce heat in fires, forges and furnaces, where bellows or other blowing apparatus are required, p. 626.

—New Trial—Husband and Wife—Expenses—Circumstances in which a new trial granted on the motion of the defender, generally, on the ground that the verdict was not sufficiently warranted by the evidence, but on condition of the defender paying the pursuer the expenses he had incurred in the first trial, p. 503.

—See Agreement. Exclusive Privilege. Process. Proof.

JUS MARITI—See Husband and Wife.

JUSTICES OF PEACE CLERK—See Reparation.

L

LANDLORD AND TENANT—Compensation—Claim, Liquid and Illiquid—A landlord who, on the expiry of the lease, took delivery of his tenant's stock at a price fixed by mutual valuers, held not entitled to withhold payment, on the allegation that the tenant was liable to him in certain illiquid claims, p. 423.

—Hypothec—Miscropping—Penal Rent—A lease prescribed a certain system of cropping, and stipulated for payment "of £5 Sterling of additional rent yearly for each acre or part of an acre" that should be cropped differently—Held that a claim by the landlord for this additional rent fell under the right of hypothec, in the same way as a claim for the ordinary rent, p. 443.

—Lease—A tenant in an agricultural subject, held not entitled, without the landlord's consent, to erect upon it a shed for public stabling, and that at a short distance from an inn belonging to the landlord, p. 585.

—Lease—Assignment—Retrocession—A lease, not assignable without the landlord's consent, was assigned, and the landlord consented by a writing to that effect indorsed on the assignment—Held that the assignee (a bank), though alleging that the assignment was only in security, was substituted for the original tenant, and could not retrocess him without a new consent from the landlord, p. 152.

—Lease—Missive—A tenant entered into possession on a letter, which gave him liberty "to alter the buildings on the ground at his own expense, to suit his own convenience, but bound him" at the expiry of the lease, "either to leave the subjects as altered, or restore them to the state in which they were when his possession commenced"—Held that the tenant was not entitled to insist, where a regular lease was drawn out between the parties, that it should contain a clause entitling him to take down and carry away any erection which he has or may put up on the premises, with the option, at the expiry of the lease, of leaving them as altered, or restoring them to their original state, p. 424.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—Lease—Police Statute—Construction—Tenement of Land—Held that the words "tenement of land," occurring in certain clauses of the Dundee Police Act, 1837, mean, and are applicable only to, a single or individual building, although containing several dwelling-houses, with, it may be, separate means of access, but under the same roof, and enclosed by the same gables or walls, and that they do not extend to, or comprehend any square, range, or angle of buildings consisting of several houses completely divided from each other by party-walls and separate roofs, whether the same belong to one individual or body of individuals, or to many, p. 121.

—Lease—Partnership—Proof—A joint lease of a farm is not per se a proof that the tenants are joint proprietors of the crop and stocking, p. 46.

—Lease—Proof—Condition—A landlord having intimated to a tenant possessing a croft on a verbal lease, the particular terms on which he was willing the tenant should remain, and these terms not having been rejected by the tenant within the period allowed for that purpose by the landlord—Held that the tenant must, by continuing in the farm for another year, be held to have remained on the terms stipulated by the landlord, p. 518.

—Rent, Consignation of—Process—Circumstances in which, after defences were lodged, but before the record was closed, consignation was ordered, to a modified amount, of arrears of rent alleged to be due, p. 419.

—Sequestration—Assignment—Process—A landlord is not bound to assign his right under a sequestration to a third party, on offer of payment of the rent due by the tenant. A bill of exceptions sustained, on the ground that the presiding Judge had declined so to direct the jury, p. 325.

—Sequestration—Pro indiviso Proprietors—Circumstances in which sequestration of the whole crop and stocking on certain lands, at the instance of a proprietor, pro indiviso, of two-thirds, with the concurrence of a party holding right by decree of mails and duties to the rent of the other third, held not incompetent, p. 245.

—See Bankrupt. Personal Exception. Process.

LEASE—See Bankrupt. Burgh, Managers of. Entail. Landlord and Tenant. Obligation. Settlement.

LEGACY—See Proof. Testament.

LEGITIM—Parent and Child—Personal Exception—A parent executed a general settlement in favour of his son, of all his personal and heritable property, under burden of an annuity to his daughter. The deed contained no exclusion of the legitim, and the daughter was in consequence found entitled to draw it—Held, in a separate action to recover the annuity, that though the right to legitim was not excluded by the settlement, the deed necessarily imported an intention to exclude it; that this intention was thwarted, and the settlement itself in so far frustrated by drawing the legitim; and that the daughter having thereby impugned and repudiated the settlement, could not maintain any claim under it for the annuity or otherwise, p. 395.

LIEN—See Process.

LIFERENT AND FEE—See Expenses. Husband and Wife. Provision to Children.

LIQUID AND ILLIQUID—See Landlord and Tenant. Process.

LIS ALIBI—Process—Expenses—Interdict—A party presented an application to the Sheriff for interdict, and the Sheriff, after hearing parties, refused interim interdict, but ordered service and answers in fourteen days. The complainer then applied to the Court of Session for an interdict nearly in the same terms; and thereafter, by a note on the Inferior Court process, stated that he had abandoned that process, reserving all other remedies, but tendered no expenses—Held that this was no bar, as a lis alibi, to the application for interdict in the Court of Session, p. 591.

M

MAGISTRATES—See Process.

MANDATE—Process—A mandatory held sufficient, because in station and circumstances equal to those of the party, p. 95.
— See Bankrupt. Diligence. Process.

MANSE—See Church.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT—See Husband and Wife.

MASTER AND SERVANT—Wages—Where services are rendered, the presumption of law, in the absence of circumstances sufficient to exclude it, is, that wages are due, p. 240.

MESSENGER—See Public Officer.

MISREPRESENTATION—See Sale.

MORA—See Friendly Society.

MORTIFICATION—Bursaries—Prescription—A contract between a patron of bursaries and the university where they were to be enjoyed, agreeing to create a new bursary for every £20 additional obtained from the mortified lands, reduced, after subsisting above forty years, on the ground of its being a violation of the original deed of mortification, which limited the number of bursaries to three, p. 457.

N

NOBILE OFFICIUM—See Process. Title and Interest to Sue.

NEGLIGENCE—See Public Officer.

NEW TRIAL—See Jury Cause. Process.

O

OATH—DE FIDELI—See Proof. FORM OF—See Reparation. IN REFERENCE—See Proof, Presumption. IN SUPPLEMENT—See Parent and Child.

OBLIGATION—Contract—Condition—Life-Policy—In security of a loan the debtor conveyed to the lender certain policies of insurance on his life, and bound himself to advance the premiums to the lender, who was to keep up the policies, and to pay the premiums as they fell due. The debtor having become bankrupt, and fallen into arrear of the premiums—Held that the lender was entitled to sell the policies, and to apply the price in extinction of the premiums in arrear, and towards payment of the principal; and that the arrangement was at an end, p. 456.

— Contract—Proof—Parole—A party having made an offer for a lease of certain subjects, and given a reference as to his responsibility—Held that this was not a concluded agreement, and that parole evidence was inadmissible to prove that it was, p. 100.

— Contract, Mutual—Sale—Title, Delivery of—Price, Payment of—Statute 11 Geo. IV. c. 119—The magistrates of a burgh having, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, transferred their rights of harbour to certain statutory trustees, and accepted, in consideration thereof, certain bonds payable ten years thereafter; and that period having arrived—Held that the magistrates were entitled to withhold delivery of the disposition and conveyance until the trustees should pay up the sums contained in the bonds, p. 274.

— Delectus Personarum—Burgh—Privilege—A neighbouring proprietor granted to the magistrates of a royal burgh the liberty of certain quarries, not only for winning of stones to build a new pier, but also in all time coming for winning of stones to all the public works belonging to the said burgh,—they in consideration thereof granting to him, his heirs and assigns, the liberty of exporting the victual of the growth of all his lands free from the payment of shore-dues, imposed or to be imposed at the harbour. The harbour and its dues having been sold to parliamentary trustees for the purpose of being greatly enlarged and improved—Held that the privilege of quarrying stones was personal to the town-council; that the harbour trustees could not claim the privilege; and that the magistrates themselves having ceased to have any patrimonial interest in the harbour, could not exercise the privilege in regard to it, p. 203.

— See Bill of Exchange. Caution. Process. Sale. Superior and Vassal.

P

PACTUM ILLICITUM—See Title and Interest to Sue.

PARENT AND CHILD—Aliment, p. 191.

— Aliment—Process—The mother of a natural child having, for an onerous consideration, discharged all claims against the alleged father, and afterwards brought an action against him for inlying charges and aliment in usual form,—the action sustained only for aliment falling due after the date of the action, p. 264.

— Filiation—Proof—Semiplena, p. 516.

— Judicial Declaration, p. 146.

— Legitim—Annuity—Heritable and Moveable—Trustees, Duties of—Executry—Entail—Meliorations—Probate—Expenses—Multiplepoinding—Process—Question as to the charges which form proper burdens on the personal property of a parent, in estimating the amount of legitim, p. 439.

— Paternity—Illegitimate Child—Oath in Supplement, pp. 17 and 146.

— See Aliment. Husband and Wife. Legitim. Prescription. Provision to Children. Trust.

PARISH—Commonry—Aliment—Usage—Proof—In a question as to the settlement of a pauper—Held that the different portions of a common, allotted in a process of division, do not accresce to, and form part of, the parishes in which the different dominant tenements are situated, p. 271.

— Commonry—Title—Usage, p. 271.

PAROLE—See Obligation. Process.

PARTNERSHIP—Adventure—Contract—Clause—A manufacturer engaged to give the shipper one-fourth of the profit or loss on his goods, it being understood that he was to invoice them at the fair market price of the day; but in the event of loss on that price, to reduce it to prime cost. A trifling loss having been sustained—Held that the manufacturer was not bound to reduce the market price further than necessary to cover that loss, p. 583.

— Statute 6 Will. IV.—Railway Company—Proprietorship, p. 307.

— See Diligence. Legal. Landlord and Tenant.

PATENT—See Exclusive Privilege. Jury Cause. Process.

PATRONAGE—See Church.

PERSONAL EXCEPTION—Acquiescence—Reduction, p. 567.

— Landlord and Tenant—Circumstances in which a landlord held precluded, personal exceptione, from claiming a fixture, p. 583.

— See Legitim. Process.

PERSONAL AND REAL—See Succession.

POLICE ACT, 7 WILL. IV. c. 32—See Burgh. Landlord and Tenant.

POOR—Settlement—Statutes, 1579, c. 74; 1672, c. 18—

Aliment—Bastard*—In a question between several parishes as to which was bound to support a pauper lunatic, it was proved or admitted, as to one of them, that the lunatic had come within the bounds fourteen days after Martinmas 1823, and resided there till Martinmas 1826, being three solar years, less fourteen days—Held (1.) That this did not constitute a settlement in law, so as to subject that particular parish in support of the pauper: (2.) That the parish in which the mother of the pauper lunatic had acquired a settlement, was liable in the aliment and support of the pauper lunatic, in a question between that parish and the parish of the birth of the child, p. 610.

— See Process.

POORS' ROLL—Certificate under A. S., 16th June 1819—

1. Circumstances in which a certificate was sustained, though signed by the minister and elders on different papers. 2. The certificate does not require to be given in kirk-session, p. 148.

— See Process.

POSSESSION—See Process.

POWERS—See Exclusive Privilege. Trust.

PREScription—Act 1579—Parent and Child—Aliment of Bastard Child—Found that the claim for aliment of a bastard child does not fall under the triennial prescription, p. 286.

— Bill—Reference to Oath, p. 43.

* Note—Error in 2d portion of rubric, p. 610, for "bastard" read "pauper lunatic."

PRESCRIPTION, TRIENNIAL, p. 570.

— See Bankrupt Statute. Caution. Mortification. Process.

PRESENTATION, BOND OF—See Process.

PRESUMPTION—See Proof.

PROCESS—ACCOUNTING, p. 335.

— ADVOCATION—Bill-Chamber—Statutes 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, and 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 1-6—A. S., 11th July 1828, and 24th December 1838—Held that, in advocating against an interlocutory judgment of a Sheriff allowing a proof, the proper course is to present the note of advocacy to the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber, p. 582.

— Competency—A. S., 1825 and 1828—An advocacy of an interlocutory judgment, presented after the lapse of fifteen days, found competent, in respect the Act of Sederunt 1828, did not provide that advocations should be presented within a period of fifteen days, as prescribed by the previous Act of Sederunt, 1825, p. 622.

— ARBITRATION—Judicial Reference—Review—Landlord and Tenant—Held that certain objections to an award were irrelevant; that the Regulations, 1695, applied equally to a judicial reference as to a decree-arbitral; and that the notes issued by the referee could not be looked into in order to support objections not relevant to set aside the award, p. 109.

— BANKRUPT—Judicial Factor—Bond of Caution—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 14—The Lord Ordinary on the bills held entitled, where there was no balance due by a judicial factor appointed ad interim, in terms of the Bankrupt Act, on the estate of a deceased debtor, to declare the factor exonerated, and to order his bond of caution to be delivered up—the application being presented with concurrence of the trustee in the sequestration, p. 491.

— Sequestration—Statute 48 Geo. III. c. 151, § 16—Reponing, p. 107.

— Trustee—Bond of Caution, p. 491.

— BILL-CHAMBER—Extractor—It is incompetent for the Inner-House to decern for expenses in a case in the Bill-Chamber, p. 216.

— CALLING—Decree in Absence—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5—Circumstances in which a decree held to be in absence, and a charge upon it suspended simpliciter, without consignation of the expenses decerned for, in terms of the 1st and 2d Vict. c. 86, § 5, p. 47.

— CESSIO—Examination, p. 25.

— CITATION—Burgh—Magistrates—Where a summons, directed not against the provost, magistrates and councillors of a burgh generally, but framed on the principle of enumerating the members of council, omitted the name of one of the members, and citation was effected by executions against the parties named in the summons. The defect allowed to be remedied by a supplementary action against the members omitted, p. 423.

— Joint Obligation—Liquid and Illiquid, p. 310.

— Res Judicata—1. An edictal citation of "heritors, feuars, and others liable in the expense of a manse and offices," in a parish partly burghal and partly landward, is sufficient to include the magistrates and town-council of the burgh. 2. A suspension, by individual heritors, of a charge for their proportion of the expense of building a manse, does not form a res judicata as to the whole body of heritors, though the suspenders pleaded the general question of liability, and obtained a judgment finding that the minister's claim of a manse could not be sustained.—Question, What would the effect have been if these individual heritors had proceeded by declarator? p. 7.

— COMPETENCY—Parties not called—The commissioners of police of a royal burgh having let the fulzie of the burgh and suburbs vested in them by Statute, passed a resolution, declaring that they had no right to a part of the suburban fulzie—Held that the tenant was entitled to pursue an action of declarator of the extent of the subject let to him, without calling the suburban inhabitants, p. 122.

— CONJUNCTION OF ACTIONS—A patron and presentee raised, 1st, a declarator directed against the presbytery of the bounds, concluding to have it found that, on the refusal of the majority, a minority of the presbytery were entitled to SCOTTISH JURIST.

induct the presentee; and 2d, a suspension and interdict directed both against the Presbytery and a Special Commission of the General Assembly, to prevent the induction of any other party than the presentee—Circumstances in which held that the processes ought not to be conjoined, p. 550.

PROCESS—DECREE IN ABSENCE—Suspension, p. 72.

— DECREET—Reduction—Suspension—Advocation—A party presented an application for interdict to the Magistrates of a burgh, which was granted, and afterwards made perpetual, accompanied with certain findings, reserving to either party to take any competent course to have the judgment applied, and allowing extract as of an interim decret—Held that, after extract and payment of the expenses, a reduction of the interlocutor was competent, p. 328.

— EXECUTION—Statute 1672, c. 6—An execution, two lines of which only were written upon the summons, and bearing simply that the messenger had cited the therein designed A, defender, sustained; but expenses refused in relation to an objection to it, p. 310.

— EXPENSES—Petition to apply Judgment—Appeal—The expense of an application to the Court to apply a judgment of the House of Lords reversing an interlocutor of the Court of Session, allowed to the petitioner, p. 625.

— Poors' Roll—Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment—Adherence—A husband on the poors' roll, defender in an action of separation and aliment, and pursuer in an action of adherence, moved for absolvitor in the one, and decret in the other, in respect that the wife had failed to lodge her revised condescendence,—the motion was refused, in respect that he had failed to obtemper an order for payment of £10 towards her expenses. The Court admitted her to the poors' roll, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to receive the condescendence, and to proceed in the cause, p. 289.

— Suspension and Interdict—Church—Implied Condition—Where a party, duly cited in a process of suspension and interdict, allowed the interdict obtained therein in absence against him to become final, and the suspender did not ask expenses, but the respondent afterwards brought a reduction of the process and whole procedure—Held that the defender in the reduction (the suspender) was not bound to go into the merits of the reduction till the pursuer paid him, in the first place, the expenses he had incurred in the process of suspension, p. 532.

— INTERLOCUTOR—Error—Suspension and Interdict, p. 83.

— JURISDICTION—Burgh—Small-Debt Act—Public Officer—Found that the proceedings in the Small-Debt Court, held by the magistrates of a burgh as Justices of the Peace, must be regulated by the provisions of the Statute, 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, p. 39.

— Domicile—Lis Alibi Pendens—Foreign—Res Judicata—A testator, living in England, left a will in the English form, by which his trustees were directed to invest the residue in landed estate in England or Scotland, under the fetters of entail, on the same series of heirs as contained in a previous Scots entail of his property executed by him. The trustees invested part of the fund in land in Scotland as directed; but after their decease, A, an heir of entail, took measures in the English Court of Chancery to bar the English will, by orders from which Court he obtained possession of the balance, and thereafter bought land in Scotland, the titles of which he took in fee-simple to himself, without including the heirs of entail; and on his death, B, a domiciled Englishman, succeeded by settlement of A thereto, and was infeft. A challenge was then brought by an heir of entail succeeding to A, in the Court of Chancery in England, of the previous procedure had there by A, which was directed against A's executor, B; and concurrently therewith an action was raised against B in the Court of Session, with the view, by using diligence on the dependence, of attaching the Scots estate, alleged to have been purchased by the trust-funds, and to which B had now made up titles, and thereby acquiring a security which could not be obtained in England, intermediate to, and awaiting the issue of the challenge there—decret in the Scots action being craved conform to the order to be pronounced in the Court of Chancery—Plea in defence of lis alibi pendens repelled, and action sustained, in the circumstances, as relevant, and consequently the diligence used on the dependence. But observed, that the Court had the right to prevent the remedy being abused, by calling on the party to show the nature of the progress of the English suit; and that the diligence might be modified, altered or recalled, as the Court in the circumstances should see fit, p. 447.
VOL. XIV.—No. XLIV.

PROCESS—JURISDICTION—Heir-Apparent—Foreign—A foreigner having right, as heir-apparent, to an heritable estate in Scotland, is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, though he has neither taken possession nor made up any title, p. 129.

JURY TRIAL—Appeal, Leave to—Agent and Client—Reparation—Relief—An action of relief having been raised by a party to obtain from a law-agent repetition of a sum of damages, in which the pursuer had been subjected in respect of the use of an illegal border warrant, which had been obtained, as alleged, on the advice and employment of the defender as agent, the summons was found relevant. Thereafter an issue was approved of to try the case, but the defender applied for leave to appeal against the judgment finding the summons relevant. Leave granted, provided the petition of appeal should be presented on or before a (week) limited time, p. 653.

Application of Verdict—Salmon-Fishing, p. 54.

Application of Verdict—Servitude—Road—It being found that A had "possessed or used a cart-road" through the lands of B, to a certain point—Held, in respect of the special terms of the verdict, that A's right was sufficiently secured by a new turnpike-road, and a road from thence to the termination of the original road,—the new line being not more than twenty-two yards round, p. 54.

Issue—Salmon-Fishing—Statutes, 1318, c. 12; Robert I.; James I., 1424, c. 12; 1427, c. 6 or 116; 1429, c. 22 or 131; James II., 1457, c. 34 or 66; James III., 1469, c. 13 or 87; 1478, c. 6 or 73; James IV., 1488, c. 16; 1489, c. 16; 1503, c. 17 or 72; James V., 1535, c. 16; Mary, 1563, c. 3; James VI., 1579, c. 27; 1581, c. 3; 1685, c. 20; 1696, c. 35; 1696, c. 3; 1705, c. 12—A party having presented an application for interdict against a certain salmon-fishing, an issue was prepared in the usual terms, whether the defender has wrongfully fished for salmon by means of stake-nets or other fixed machinery placed in a situation or situations prohibited by law. The Court refused a motion for the defender to hear parties, prior to any jury trial, on the question of law as to the situation prohibited by the Statutes in reference to salmon-fishing—the averments of fact as to the situation of the machinery complained of being denied by the defender, p. 578.

Issue—Servitude—Possession—Burgh, Inhabitant of—The proprietor of a tenement situated in a certain part of a royal burgh set forth, that he and his predecessors, as well as the inhabitants generally residing in that neighbourhood, had had right of access to a mill-dam from time immemorial, for the purpose of drawing water therefrom. In pursuing a declarator of his right, he was held entitled to an issue embracing not only his own possession, but also that of the other inhabitants of the neighbourhood, p. 66.

Motion for New Trial—Held incompetent, when moving for a new trial, to found upon misdirection or omission in point of law on the part of the Judge, no exception to the charge having been taken at the trial, p. 233.

Property, Right of Common—Possession—Competing Title—New Trial, Motion for, on the Ground of Surprise—The pursuer took an issue, whether, as proprietor of certain lands, he possessed, as common proprietor along with the defenders, a portion of land called the Ness of Chanonry? Held that the pursuer was bound to establish that he had possessed the land in dispute in the character of proprietor of his lands, and not merely as a burgess or inhabitant of the community, p. 385.

Statute—Verdict—A verdict by a jury, summoned under a Statute which required them to fix both "price and damages" payable to parties having an interest in the lands and heritages dealt with under the Act, quashed, on the ground that the jury had only fixed the price, and "declined" to estimate the damages, p. 381.

PROCESS—LIBEL—Citation—Agent and Principal—Company—Objection to an action, that it was libelled against a party alone, as manager or agent of the Highland Distillery, and that it was so insisted in after the proprietor was named in the defences, without calling the proprietor—sustained, and the action dismissed, p. 208.

LISPENDENS—Foreign—Diligence—A party having instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery, thereafter brought an action on the same claims, and against the same defendants, in the Court of Session, for the purpose of suing out diligence on the dependence against their property situated in Scotland—The Court repelled a preliminary defence founded on lis pendens, but appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute stating the progress made, and orders issued in the Court of Chancery, p. 336.

MANDATE—A foreigner, against whom judgment by default had been pronounced for having failed to find a mandatory, was reponed on making personal appearance. Having again failed to find a sufficient mandatory, he offered to find security to the amount of £50 for his presence at all diets of the Court—Held that, in the circumstances, the amount was sufficient, p. 313.

NOBILE OFFICIUM—Bill-Chamber—Competency—A petition for the removal of children from a mother's custody, on the ground of misconduct, accompanied with an allegation that she intended to remove them beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, having been presented during vacation to the Lord Ordinary on the bills—Held competent for his Lordship to entertain the petition, so far as to interdict the removal of the children, and after it had taken place, to grant warrant for bringing them back, p. 415.

PETITION, PRAYER OF—Decree—Waiver—Hypothec—A party presented a petition, praying the Sheriff to decern and ordain the respondent to produce in process an account for which, he alleged, certain title-deeds were hypothecated, and failing his doing so, to ordain him instantly to deliver up the title-deeds. The respondent produced his account, with answers to the petition, and pleaded retention of the titles till payment. The application having resolved into an action of count and reckoning between the parties; and the Sheriff having decerned in terms of the original petition, after a condescendence and proof, it was objected, that under the prayer of the petition, the proceedings subsequent to the production of the account were incompetent—Held under the circumstances, that the objection, if competent, had been waived, p. 285.

POOR—Assessment—Consuetude—Suspension—According to use and wont for a length of time, poor's assessment had been levied on certain lands, as situated within the parish of St Ninians, but in an action for payment of the assessment of a particular year, the proprietor of the subjects pleaded that the action ought to be dismissed, on the ground that the subjects were situated within the parish of Stirling, and so not liable for the assessment. After a proof as to the situs of the lands, the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the action, but the Sheriff, proceeding on the usage as to the mode of assessment, the proof of which he held to be complete and decisive, reversed that finding, and decerned for the assessment and expenses of process—Held that suspension was a competent mode of review of the Sheriff's judgment; but opinion indicated, that the main question as to the situs of the lands, and consequent liability to a particular parish, could only be raised by declarator, p. 595.

PROOF—The copy of a lease confessedly genuine, is admissible in evidence in the absence of the principal, p. 325.

Commission and Diligence, p. 146.

Diligence for Recovery of Writings—Agent and Client—Confidentiality, p. 115.

Parole—Bond of Presentation—Held incompetent to prove by parole, or to remit to trial by jury, an alleged promise by a party to present a debtor on a certain day, or pay the debt, p. 250.

Reference to Oath—Production of Documents—A party having brought an action against his client, ninety years of age, for recovery of certain business-accounts which had prescribed, the record was closed without any productions being made, and a reference was made to the oath of the defender. In the reference a summons was produced, and the defender was asked if he recollected of the action relative thereto—Held that the document might be shown to refresh the memory of the deponent, but could not be used in evidence to contradict his oath, or be produced in process, p. 265.

PROCESS—PROOF—Witness—Competency—Commission to examine a witness abroad, granted, notwithstanding of his appearing to have such an interest in the cause as might render his evidence incompetent, p. 16.

PURSUER—Bankrupt—Cessio—Caution for Expenses—Circumstances in which a bankrupt pursuer was found not entitled to insist in an action without finding caution for the expenses of process, p. 190.

RANKING AND SALE—Writer's Hypothec—Lien—Circumstances in which, in a process of ranking and sale of an estate, the Court dispensed with the production of the title-deeds of the lands under sale, p. 660.

RECLAIMING NOTE—Competency, p. 610.

RECORD, Authentication of, by Lord Ordinary—Personal Exception—Where the counsel for the parties had authenticated the record by their signatures, and signed a minute agreeing to close the record on the interlocutor sheet, which was followed by a minute signed by the Lord Ordinary closing the record in terms of the minute of counsel, but the revised papers did not bear the signature of the Lord Ordinary—Held in the circumstances, that this was a sufficient compliance with the Judicature Act, p. 575.

Opening of, p. 51.

Opening up—Production of Writs, p. 313.

Proof—Evidence—Witness—Statute 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 83—Patent, Infringement of—Circumstances in which, in an action of damages brought for the infringement of a patent, where the defender proposed to call witnesses to prove that the principle of the patent had been in public use prior thereto in Scotland—Held that the proposed line of evidence was inadmissible, as no sufficient notice of such course had been given to the pursuer on the record;—and opinion, (1.) That in regard to an allegation of prior use of the principle of a patent, it is not enough to aver so, generally, but it is necessary that the prior use at particular places, and by particular persons, shall be set forth in such a way that the pursuer may be able distinctly to meet such averment; and, (2.) That the Statute 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 83, § 5, in regard to a defender in such an action giving certain notice of what he intended to found on at the trial, did not extend to Scotland, but merely referred to the mode of pleading to be adopted in English actions brought for the infringement of patents, p. 626.

REDUCTION—Review—Lis Pendens—An action of reduction dismissed as incompetent, in respect that the process was unexhausted in the Inferior Court, p. 561.

RELEVANCY—Agent and Client—A summons at the instance of a client, to render a law-agent liable for certain law expenses and damages occasioned to the client from the use of a border warrant, which had been obtained, as alleged, on the proper usual employment of the agent, and which the Court found to be illegal, held relevant, though not averring ignorance, or want of professional skill, or gross neglect in the proceedings, p. 417.

Summons—Malice—Diligence, Illegal use of—Damages—Reparation, p. 580.

REMIT, JUDICIAL, TO A PERSON OF SKILL—Observed, That where the Court, on a general motion by the parties for a remit, appoints a particular individual who is not expressly objected to, the appointment must be held to have been made with consent, p. 141.

REMIT OB CONTINGENTIAM, p. 72.

STATUTE 1579, c. 83—Prescription, Triennial, p. 36.

SUMMONS, AMENDMENT OF, p. 177.

Conjoined Action—Competency—An original and a supplementary process being conjoined—Held that a declaratory conclusion, contained only in the former, was, in consequence of the conjunction, competently directed against the defenders in the latter, p. 24.

PROCESS—SUSPENSION—Bill of Exchange—Accounting—Caution, p. 392.

Caution, p. 310.

Interdict—Where a presbytery was proceeding with a libel against a minister, interdict granted before answer, on the ground that the minister of a parliamentary church and his elder had seats in the presbytery, and were taking part in the proceedings, p. 556.

SUSPENSION AND INTERDICT—Caution—Consignation—Expenses—A party having executed a pointing of furniture, the property of the daughter of his debtor, she presented a suspension and interdict, whereupon the pointing creditor abandoned his diligence—Held that, with the view of trying the question of expenses, the complainer was entitled to have the bill passed without caution or consignation, p. 100.

SUSPENSION AND LIBERATION—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5—Held incompetent to introduce a prayer for liberation in a note of suspension of a decree in absence, presented under the 5th section of 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 86, p. 172.

TITLE TO INSIST—Trust—An action at the instance of two trustees and the beneficiaries under the trust was raised against a third trustee, to compel him to execute the trust; pending the action the trustees, pursuers, died—Held that the beneficiaries had a proper title to pursue the action without sisting the representatives of the deceased, p. 19.

WAKENING AND TRANSFERENCE—Diligence—Arrestment—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114—It is incompetent, under Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, to insert a warrant of arrestment in a summons of wakening and transference, p. 499.

See Arbitration. Bill of Exchange. Church. Diligence. Exclusive Privilege. Expenses. Landlord and Tenant. Lis Alibi. Mandate. Parent and Child. Proof. Property. Declarator of. Public Informer. Public Officer. Ranking and Sale. Reference to Oath. Reparation. Service. Suspension. Testament. Title to Sue. Trust-Dead. Trust, Latent.

PROOF—Contract—Advocation, p. 437.

Evidence—Heritable and Personal Creditors—Question of evidence, whether particular portions of land were comprehended under the securities of heritable creditors? p. 553.

Evidence—Jury Trial, p. 584.

Oath in Reference—Construction—Process—It is not competent, in construing an oath on reference, to look beyond its contents, p. 616.

Presumption—Death—Heritable and Moveable—1. Circumstances in which a sailor, after an absence of thirty-seven years without being heard of, was presumed to be dead. 2. A sum of money, with interest, arising from a compulsory sale under a Statute which expressly provided against any innovation of existing interests, found to be heritable, p. 1.

Presumption—Debitor non presumitur donare—Testament—Legacy—A party under an obligation to pay to A, or to the heirs succeeding him in the lands of B, a sum of £3000 on her own death or marriage, bequeathed to him, his heirs, executors, and assignees, a legacy of £20,000, payable the first term after her death—Held that the debt was not extinguished by the legacy, p. 329.

Process—Clerk, Subscription of—Oath de fidei, p. 62.

Witness—A builder, proposed to be examined as a valuator, having been informed by the agent of the party adducing him, of the valuations of previous witnesses, held to be disqualified, p. 104.

Witness—Disqualification, p. 146.

Witness—Objection to Credibility—Malice—Extra-judicial Statement, p. 27.

See Agent and Client. Aliment. Bill of Exchange. Friendly Society. Husband and Wife. Landlord and Tenant. Obligation. Parent and Child. Parish. Process. Reparation. Sale. Teinds, Valuation of.

PROPERTY—Common—Declarator, p. 515.

Declarator of—Title and Interest—Servitude—Road—

Process—Circumstances in which held, that one of two proprietors of houses adjoining a close which was used as a common passage by both, was not entitled to substitute another passage, alleged to be equally convenient, for the existing one, p. 563.

PROPERTY—Disposition—Heritable Creditor—Records—A father, infeft in the plenum dominium of certain lands, executed a disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed, subject to reversion, the dominium utile to his eldest son, and the superiority to his second son. Some years after he disposed the lands, as they stood in himself, to the eldest son, recalling the previous conveyance to the second son, without mentioning the name of the eldest son, but declaring that the disposition-settlement should be effectual in so far as not revoked or altered. The eldest son having predeceased his father without issue, after granting an heritable security over the lands—Held, in a competition between the heritable creditor and the second son claiming as his father's heir, that the security extended over the plenum dominium of the lands—the eldest son's right extending to it, and not being limited to the superiority, p. 459.

Marches—Superior and Vassal—Warrandice, p. 86.

Possessory Judgment—Road—A party having, at his own hand, enclosed a piece of ground which a public body had kept for more than seven years under their charge, as part of a street, for the use of the public, on the allegation that that body, and the public through them, had no title, and that he was the true proprietor—Held that the public body were entitled to retain possession until dispossessed by the order of a court of law, p. 281.

Water—Servitude—Continuous Proprietor—A party having right, in common with the inhabitants of a village, to lift water from a well for domestic purposes, laid a pipe for the purpose of supplying certain houses with water from the surplus which escaped from the well—Interdict against this operation granted at the instance of an owner of property bounded by a stream which was partly fed by the water escaping from the well, p. 396.

See Suspension.

RIGHT OF COMMON—See Process.

PROVISION—See Husband and Wife.

PROVISION TO CHILDREN—Parent and Child—Liferent and Fee—A father, in contemplation of the marriage of his natural daughter, bound himself, for love and favour, to make payment to her of a sum of money, and that to her in liferent during all the days of her lifetime, secluding the jus mariti of her intended husband, and to the children of the marriage in fee, whom failing to the husband—Held that the wife was liar, p. 73.

See Trust—Settlement.

PUBLIC INFORMER—Statute 50 Geo. III. c. 48—Process—A party who had been appointed by the Sheriff of Edinburgh as an officer of Court, was employed in that capacity under the Middle District Road Acts, to supply information to the Procurator-fiscal of the county, to enable him to prosecute for offences committed under the Road Acts. On the occasion of these prosecutions, the officer acted as principal witness, and was paid weekly wages for his duties and trouble, and, labelling on the 50th Geo. III., he brought an action against the Procurator-fiscal, in which he insisted he was entitled to a half of the fines recovered from offenders, on the ground of being informer—Plea in defence sustained, that the Procurator-fiscal, who pursued for the penalties, was, in the sense of the Act, the informer, p. 504.

PUBLIC OFFICER—Messenger—Reparation—Diligence—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114—A messenger instructed to charge a debtor immediately, gave a charge on six days on the 13th, but did not transmit the charge, so as to be in the hands of his employer, till the 21st, and on the 22d, before ultimate diligence could be used, the debtor escaped—Held that the messenger was liable for the debt, p. 12.

Messenger—Reparation—Negligence—Process—Statute 1672, c. 6—A messenger having returned an execution of a summons in which a number of the defenders were neither named nor designed, and the action having in consequence been dismissed, and the pursuer found liable in expenses—Held, in an action by the pursuer, that the messenger was liable, p. 270.

PUBLIC OFFICER—Schoolmaster—The master of a private charity, incorporated by royal charter, had the office conferred upon him only from year to year, or during pleasure—Held that the governors might dispense with his services at the annual election of office-bearers, p. 62.

See Process. Reparation.

PUPIL See Aliment.

R

RANKING—See Trust.

RANKING AND SALE—Catholic Creditor—Where a daughter's provision was heritably secured on two subjects, and her husband afterwards became the purchaser of one of them—Held, in a ranking and sale of the other subject, that if the provision were ranked wholly on it, the creditors in that subject were entitled to an assignation of the security held over that which the husband had purchased, p. 620.

Decree of Certification—Process—A petition to open up a decree of certification in a ranking and sale, presented after the lands were sold and vested in a purchaser, but while the price was still in manibus curia, for the purpose of rearing up a burden on the lands, through a title which did not exist at the time the petitioner and other creditors had joined issue on a closed record in the process in regard to their claims and interests, refused as incompetent.—Observed, that the object of the petition (if at all competent) could be discussed only in the ranking and sale, or in a reduction of the decree of certification, p. 579.

See Process.

RECORD—See Expenses. Process. Property. Service.

REDUCTION—See Arbitration. Bankrupt. Personal Exception. Process. Suspension.

REFERENCE, JUDICIAL—See Arbitration. Process.

REFERENCE TO OATH—Suspension and Interdict—Process, p. 516.

See Process. Trust, Latent.

REI INTERVENTUS—See Caution.

RELEVANCY—See Process. Reparation.

RELIEF—Warrandice—Sale—Held that a purchaser, against whom the Crown was proceeding with a suit in Exchequer for bygone teind-duties, was not obliged to wait the issue of that process, but was entitled to proceed with an action of relief for the purpose of determining the seller's liability under the clause of warrandice, in the event of the Crown's claim being sustained, p. 141.

See Caution. Diligence. Process. Superior and Vassal.

REMIT, JUDICIAL—See Process.

TO PERSON OF SKILL—See Suspension.

RENT—See Bankrupt. Landlord and Tenant.

REPARATION—Damages—Collision, p. 285.

Damages—Trustees, Statutory—Liability for the misconduct of their Officers and Servants—Held that trustees under a public Act, declaring that the trust-funds are to be appropriated solely for the purposes of the Act, are not liable for the negligence or misconduct of their officers, p. 586.

Damages—Wrongous Imprisonment—Public Officer—Process—Summons—Justices—Relevancy—Proof—Oath, Form of—Roman Catholic—In an action of damages against Justices and the Procurator-fiscal, averring malice and want of probable cause—Circumstances in which held, that the facts set forth in the summons were not relevant, p. 289.

Wrongous Apprehension—Public Officer—Justice of Peace—Clerk—Statute 43 Geo. III. c. 141—An action of damages against a Justice of Peace dismissed, on the ground that he had tendered twopenny of damages, and the acts complained of were not libelled to have been done "maliciously, and without any probable cause," p. 113.

See Agent and Client. Diligence. Exclusive Privilege.

Process. Public Officer. Sale. Trust.

REPONING—See Process.

RES JUDICATA—See Process.

RESPONSIBILITY—See Agent and Client.

RESTING-OWING—Melliorations—Entail, p. 496.

RETENTION—See Compensation. Superior and Vassal.
 RETROCESSION—See Landlord and Tenant.
 REVIEW—See Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 54. Process. Service.
 REVOCATION—See Husband and Wife. Trust. Trust-Deed.
 ROAD—See Burgh. Process. Property. Servitude. Statute.

S

SALE—Misrepresentation—Sub-Lease—Reparation—Damages—The seller of a lease found liable in damages to the purchaser for concealing the existence of a written sub-lease which he had previously granted of part of the lands, though that sub-lease was defeasible at the pleasure of the landlord, p. 31.
 —Stoppage in transitu—Cautionary Obligation—Bankrupt—Goods having been delivered by mistake to the cautioner instead of the principal, and the principal having been sequestrated—Held, in a question with the trustee, that the cautioner was not entitled to retain possession of the goods till freed of his cautionary obligation, p. 520.

—Title—Reservations and Restrictions—The proprietor of several feus disposed of them by a missive of sale, without specifying that his title contained a reservation of mines and minerals in favour of the superior, and also certain restrictions as to the kind of buildings to be erected on part of the ground—Held that the purchaser was not bound to take the subjects with these restrictions, p. 51.

—Warranty—Proof, p. 513.

—See Bankrupt. Husband and Wife. Obligation. Superior and Vassal.

SALMON-FISHING—See Process.

SCHOOLMASTER—See Public Officer.

SEMIPLENA—See Aliment. Parent and Child.

SEPARATION AND ALIMENT—See Process.

SEQUESTRATION—See Bankrupt. Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 54. Landlord and Tenant. Process.

SERVICE—Brieves, Advocation of—Commission and Diligence—Review, p. 115.

—Brieve, Advocation of—Process—Record—Review, p. 107.

—Brieve, Advocation of—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 2—Process—A note of advocacy of a brieve was presented to, and marked by the depute-clerk of Session, and was thereafter, without being published in the calling lists, and then enrolled in the printed rolls for the week, laid before the Lord Ordinary named in the note—Held that the procedure was correct, and that the next step was for the Lord Ordinary to advocate the brieve, p. 20.

—Brieves, Competing—Succession—A father having settled his property on his daughter in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti, and his children in fee; "whom failing before majority or marriage, to the nearest lawful heir or heirs of my said daughter"—Held, on the failure of the children, that the cousin-german of the daughter was preferable to a brother of her husband, p. 327.

—See Entail.

SERVITUDE—Road—Foot-Road, Public, p. 54.

—See Process. Property.

SETTLEMENT—Lease—Assignment, p. 437.

—See Poor. Trust.

SHERIFF-COURT—See Jurisdiction.

SMALL-DEBT ACT—Arrestment on Dependence—Fees—Declared irregular and illegal, 1st, to issue and charge a fee for precepts of arrestment on the dependence of small-debt actions; and, 2d, to give discount on fees to pursuers, especially without providing that the full fees should not afterwards be charged as expenses against the defenders, p. 454.

—See Process.

SOCIETY—See Title and Interest to Sue.

STAMP—See Bill of Exchange.

STAMP ACT, 55 Geo. III. c. 184, Part 1st, p. 66—Bank—Banker's Draft—Found, 1. That drafts upon a banker in the form of a mere order, without any mention either of the bearer or of a particular payee, are to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer, in the sense, and within the benefit of the Act 55 Geo. III. c. 184: 2. That drafts in that form do not lose their privilege from their bearing, after and apart from the signature of the drawer, a memorandum in his hand-writing, such as "per A B." But that an order having such addition in the body of it, and before the signature, is payable only to the party mentioned, and is not entitled to the statutory privilege as payable to the bearer: 3. That drafts payable to A B, E F, "or to the bearer," are to be considered as drafts payable to the bearer, p. 82.

STIPEND—See Teinds. Church.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU—See Sale.

STATUTE—Road—Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, § 65—Entailed Proprietor—Expenses—Road trustees, with a view to acquire a right of ferry belonging to an entailed proprietor, made offer of £567 as the value, which was refused; the proprietor, however, made no tender of it for any specific sum, and a jury was summoned to ascertain the value. The verdict was for £625, and the proprietor, in applying to the Court to regulate the investment of the fund for the benefit of the succeeding heirs of entail, craved that the expense of realising and investing the fund should be deducted from it—Held that he must pay his own expenses in realising the fund, but that he might deduct the expense of investing it, p. 7.

—1318, c. 12; Robert I.; James I., 1424, c. 12; 1427, c. 6 or 116; 1429, c. 22 or 131; James II., 1457, c. 34 or 66; James III., 1469, c. 13 or 87; 1478, c. 6 or 73; James IV., 1488, c. 16; 1489, c. 16; 1503, c. 17 or 72; James V., 1535, c. 16; Mary, 1563, c. 3; James VI., 1579, c. 27; 1581, c. 3; 1685, c. 20; 1696, c. 35; 1698, c. 3; 1705, c. 12—See Process; 1579—See Prescription; 1579, c. 83—See Process; 1579, c. 74; 1672, c. 18—See Poor; 1592, c. 117, and 54 Geo. III. c. 169 (Ministers' Widows' Fund)—See Church; 1661—See Competition; 1663, c. 21—See Church; 1672, c. 6—See Process. Public Officer; 1685—See Entail; 1696, c. 5—See Bankrupt. Caution; 10 Geo. II. c. 28, and 43 Geo. III. c. 142—See Interdict; 10 Geo. III. c. 51—See Entail; 43 Geo. III. c. 141—See Reparation; 48 Geo. III. c. 151, § 16—See Process; 50 Geo. III. c. 48—See Public Informer; 3 Geo. IV. c. 91—See Burgh. Managers of; 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, and 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 63—See Excise Laws; 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, and 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 1—6—See Process; 11 Geo. IV. c. 119—See Obligation; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 83—See Process; 6 Will. IV. —See Partnership; 6 and 7 Will. IV.—See Contract. Husband and Wife; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 41—See Bankrupt; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 2—See Service; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, § 5—See Process; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110—See Bankrupt; 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114—See Process. Public Officer; 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41—See Bankrupt; 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 14—See Process.

SUB-LEASE—See Sale.

SUBMISSION—See Contract. Debtor and Creditor.

SUCCESSION—Testament—Trust—Burden—Personal and Real—A testator directed his trustees to convey certain lands to A, whom failing to B, but declared, that in the event of A or his issue succeeding to a certain other estate, he or they should be bound to denude of the estate now conveyed in favour of B or his issue,—it being the testator's meaning and intention that the two estates should never be united during the lifetime of B, or any of his issue—Held that the trustees would discharge their duty under the settlement, by inserting the testator's declaration in terminis in the conveyance to A; that the declaration amounted only to a personal obligation on A, and could not be made to affect the lands as a real burden or species of entail, p. 501.

—See Service. Superior and Vassal. Testament. Trust.

SUMMONS—See Process. Reparation.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Agreement—Joint and Several Obligation—Intromission—Liability—A prime superior feued out certain subjects to A, who subfeued part of them to X and Y; Y subfeued his out to C; C never completed any title to his feu, but possessed under the personal obligation derived from Y. A, the mid-superior, to whom the several subfeuars had regularly paid their feu-duties, fell into several years' arrear of feu-duty to the prime superior, and he having threatened eviction therefor of all the subfeus, X paid the amount, and brought an action of relief against C for a proportion of the arrears corresponding to his feu-duty—Held that X was entitled to demand relief from C of a proportion corresponding to the amount of his feu-duty, p. 463.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Burgh—Retention—Relief—

In a feu-charter granted by the magistrates of a royal burgh, the subjects were to be held free of all public burdens. The affairs of the burgh having been put under trust in terms of a Statute, by which the magistrates were authorised and required to compound for all and every debt due, and obligation contracted by them, by granting bonds of annuity at the rate of £3 Sterling for every hundred pounds of such debts—Held, 1. That the vassal was entitled to retain all feu-duties and casualties, whether payable on account of the property in question, or on account of any other property held in feu of the magistrates, until he shall be relieved of all the taxes within the obligation of exemption, which he may have been compelled to pay since the constitution of the statutory trust: 2. That for the whole sums on account of taxes or other burdens as aforesaid, which the vassal may have paid before the constitution of the trust, the magistrates are bound to deliver an annuity-bond corresponding to the amount, in terms of the Statute: 3. That the vassal is not bound to accept of annuity-bonds at the rate and in the terms of the Statute, for the sums paid, as above expressed, since the constitution of the trust; but that, as to such sums, the magistrates, as superiors, are liable in full exemption and relief to the vassal, both for what he has paid and for what may be exigible from him in all time coming, p. 252.

Casualties of Superiority—Entry of Heirs and Singular Successors—Relief—Composition—Succession—Entail—Construction—Charter of Resignation—A fee-simple proprietor entailed his estate on A, B, and C, neither of whom were heirs of line to the entailor, nor were they related by blood in any degree to one another. A, the institute, made up titles, and received from the superior a charter of resignation, whereby the lands were conveyed to the same series of heirs, as specially set forth in the entail, and a clause was inserted in the charter, declaring that the granting thereof was not to exclude the superior and his successors from any claim they had at law to a full year's rent of the subjects, "whenever the heirs of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered and infeft." On his entry the institute paid a composition to the superior of a full year's rent as a singular successor. After his death, and also that of B, who had entered with the superior in the lands, the succession opened to C, who was not the heir of line of B, the vassal last infeft—Held by a majority of the whole Court, that the superior was bound to enter C as an heir of the investiture, on payment of the ordinary casualty of relief exigible from an heir, p. 463.

Feu-Duties—Interest—Interest on feu-duties is not exigible previous to a judicial demand, p. 307.

Investiture—Parts and Pertinents—Reservation—Precept of Clare—Coal and Limestone, Reservation of—In certain lands the dominium utile, together with the parts and pertinents thereof, were acquired free of any reservation in favour of the superior. A reservation of the coal and limestone began to be inserted in the titles about sixty years back, for the first time, in a precept of clare constat, and subsequently in successive charters; but the minerals were never wrought—Held that the property of the coal and limestone was in the vassal, p. 198.

Obligation—Feu-Contract—Implement—By certain articles of roup two lots of ground were feued in 1813, and in 1825 a formal contract of feu was entered into by the superior and vassal, varying essentially from the articles of roup. The contract provided, that "when the stances shall be built upon, the buildings shall be in a line pointed out by A B, and be constructed conform to a plan approved by an architect to be appointed by the superior: Further, that the vassal shall be at one-half of the expense of making the common sewers opposite to the stances, and also of one-half of making the streets, lighting and cleaning the same, &c.; and in so far as the said drains, &c. are already finished, the vassal becomes bound to pay the expense thereof." The stances remained unoccupied, and in 1840 the trustees of the vassal raised an action to have the superior ordained to furnish an elevation plan, to make streets, &c., the vassal being willing to pay one-half of the expense of making the same opposite the two stances feued; and in the event of the superior failing so to do, to have the feu-right declared at an end; and in any event, to have repayment of the feu-duties already paid, or at least relief from the payment thereof in future—Held, 1. That the demands made upon the superior could not be maintained either as conditions of the feu-contract or as independent rights: 2. That the feu-contract could not be controlled by the articles of roup, p. 259.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Reddendo—Circumstances in which the word hordeum, in the reddendo of a charter of the sixteenth century, held to mean not bear or bigg, but barley, p. 83.

Sale—Retention of Title in Security of Price—A party sold a property, and executed a disposition in favour of the purchaser, in virtue of which he obtained possession of the subjects; but the deed remained in the custody of the seller, as a security for a balance of the price—Held, in a question between the heir of the seller, who had died unintest, and the disponees of the purchaser, that the heir had the only good and undoubted right to obtain a charter from the superior, p. 279.

Sasine—Register—Where lands originally burgage were held in feu under magistrates, who were specially empowered to grant such feus—Held that the sasines taken in them could be validly recorded only in the General Register of Sasines or Particular Register of the county in which they were situated, and not in the Burgh Register, p. 400.

See Expenses. Jurisdiction. Property.

SURROGATUM—See Husband and Wife.

SUSPENSION—Reduction—Remit to Person of Skill—Process—Property—Damage, p. 452.

See Bill of Exchange. Interdict. Process. Reference to Oath.

—AND LIBERATION—See Process.

T

TEINDS—Stipend—Augmentation—An heritor holding a feu-right to his teinds for payment of a certain quantity of meal annually to the titular, or, in his option, to the minister of the parish, had an amount of stipend laid upon his lands equal to the value of the teind-duty—Held, in providing for a subsequent augmentation, that it must be laid proportionally upon the teinds of the lands of the titular and the heritor, after deducting from the gross amount of those of the heritor the teind-duty payable by him as old stipend, p. 3.

Titularity—Completing Titles—Augmentation and Locality—Church, p. 634.

VALUATION OF—Proof—Evidence held insufficient to prove that the teinds of certain lands were included in the valuation of other lands of a different name, belonging to the same proprietor, p. 45.

TERCE—See Agent and Client.

TESTAMENT—Legacy—Vesting—Condition—A sum was bequeathed to A, the interest being payable from six months after the testator's death to A's legal guardians, and the principal on A's majority. A survived the testator, but died in pupillarity—Held that the legacy had vested, p. 573.

Process—Title—Foreign—A Scotsman who died domiciled in India bequeathed "to D. F. and his family," by a will executed there, a sum lodged in the hands of his bankers at Calcutta. The executors under the will having died or declined to act, the children of D. F., under a decree-dative from the Commissary of Edinburgh as executors qua legatees, brought an action in the Court of Session for payment of the legacy against one of the partners of the bank who was residing in Scotland, and obtained decree, subject to the condition of "producing a sufficient title in their persons before extract"—Held that that title must be a confirmation of the decree-dative which they had previously obtained, p. 569.

Succession—Destination—Entail—A father bequeathed to his two natural daughters two separate sums, to be accumulated for their behoof till they were twenty years of age. Failing either of them without lawful male heirs, the other was to take her fortune; and failing both without lawful male heirs, the whole was to go to one, and failing him to another brother of the testator's, and his lawful male heirs, and failing them to a nephew. On the marriage of the daughters, provided it was after twenty years of age, and with the consent of the trustees under the settlement, they were "to have the whole of the sums heretofore bequeathed to them," which sums, however, were to be invested in land, and entailed on the male heirs of the two daughters. A multiplepointing having been raised for the purpose of determining the rights of the parties, and one of the daughters having died leaving a daughter, an interlocutor was pronounced, finding that the lands to be purchased with the sums bequeathed to the daughters were to be settled on the surviving daughter and her heirs-male, under the fetters of a strict entail, but that it was "unnecessary, hoc statu, to give any direction as to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the said deed"—Held that the collateral heirs-male of the testator ought not to be included in the entail which he had directed to be made, and that the trustees under the marriage-contract of the daughter surviving at the date of the above interlocutor, were entitled, to the exclusion of those of the daughter who had died, to have the lands and estate purchased with the accumulated amount of the bequests transferred to them in fee-simple, for behoof of the parties interested in the marriage-contract, p. 343.

TESTAMENT—See Foreign. Husband and Wife. Proof. Succession. Trust.

TITLE—See Husband and Wife. Obligation. Parish. Process. Sale. Testament.

AND INTEREST TO SUE—Trust—Society—Corporation—Pactum Illicitum—Nobile Officium—A public society, denominated the "Prime Gilt," existed in Kirkcaldy for upwards of two centuries, and the funds, which arose from rates levied on masters and mariners, were dedicated to the support of the contributors in necessity, and their widows, &c. Owing to alleged difficulties in levying the rates, and other causes, it was resolved to realise the property of the society, and to divide it equally among the existing members, providing for any widows on the fund, but refusing to recognise the right of the mariners, or thereafter to receive their rates. In a conjoined process of suspension, reduction and declarator, brought in regard to these proceedings at the instance of certain widows on the fund, and common mariners who had long contributed their rates—the title of these parties to sue was sustained, and interdict granted against the resolutions and proceedings of the managers; and found that the property was held in trust for the Prime Gilt, and the persons or members entitled to be members thereof, and such parties as may hereafter become members, or as are or may be entitled to derive support or assistance from its funds, and that the managers are bound to denude of, and convey the property of the society in trust to such person or persons as the Court may name, and in such terms, and under such conditions as the Court may hereafter direct, p. 529.

TO SUE—Executor—Process—One of three executors brought an action in her own name against one of the co-executors, for her share of a debt due by him to the defunct—Held, in the circumstances, that she was entitled to pursue the action, p. 30.

—See Entail. Property. Declarator of.

TO OBJECT—See Diligence.

TRUST—Catholic Creditor—Ranking—A trust-settlement for family purposes, by a party who died insolvent, having been taken up by the trustees, and administered by them on a general understanding with the creditors, and for their behoof, a creditor holding a personal and heritable security for the same debt, claimed on the personal security for the whole amount. A multiplepointing was afterwards raised by certain creditors in name of the trustees, and the same creditor again lodged his claim to rank for the full amount of the debt, without deducting a payment which he had in the meantime received from the heritable security—Held that the ranking was good, p. 78.

TRUST, LATENT—Reference to Oath—Construction—Process—Circumstances in which an assignation, alleged to have been granted in trust, was found to be onerous and valid by the deposition of the assignee, to whose oath it had been referred, p. 191.

—Succession—Testament—A testator conveyed his property to trustees, with an injunction to pay over the annual free proceeds to his daughter during her lifetime, or failing her to her children, till they attained majority, when the fee was to be paid over to them, and the trust was to cease, but expressly provided that the accounts of the trustees "shall be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience, to be chosen by the said trustees or trustee, and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docqueted by the said trustees or trustee, and which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them or him accordingly, it being hereby provided, that neither the said" daughter, "nor any other party, or person or persons whatsoever, shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, or others acting under his or their authority, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid"—Held that the daughter and her husband had no right to see the trustees' accounts and vouchers annually, before being audited and reported on by an accountant, and to have an opportunity of stating objections thereto, if necessary, and of being heard thereon, p. 406.

—Testament—Succession—Parent and Child—Revocation, p. 618.

—Trustees—Liability—Reparation—Culpa lata—Circumstances which were held to amount to gross negligence on the part of trustees, so as to render them personally liable for moneys lost to the trust-estate, notwithstanding of the protecting clause in the trust-deed, p. 115.

—Trustees—Powers—Liability—Bona fides—A party executed a trust-deed, in which he directed his trustees to invest the whole residue of his funds "in the purchase of lands in Orkney, or any other place they should judge expedient," and to convey them to his heir of entail. The trustees purchased the superior-duties affecting the entailed estate. It having been found that this was an improper application of the trust-funds, and that they must account to the heir of entail for the capital sum of money applied in the purchase—Held that they must also account for interest on the capital sum, according to the rate which had been payable on heritable bonds, p. 90.

—See Process. Settlement. Succession. Title and Interest to Sue.

TRUST-DEED—Revocation—Intention—An heritable property having been ineffectually conveyed by a trust-disposition and settlement, which revoked a previous settlement, only "in so far as inconsistent with these presents"—Held that the heir-at-law was excluded, and that the residuary legatee under the previous settlement was to be preferred, p. 209.

—Trustees, Discretionary Powers of—Process—Multiplepointing—Competency—A testator bequeathed the sum of £3000 to his natural son, the interest of which he appointed to be applied in defraying the expense of his board and education "until he make choice of a profession; and how soon my trustees are satisfied that he is doing well in such profession, and that it will be prudent to give him the command of the capital sum," to pay it over to him. The legatee, after having completed his thirty-second year, made choice of the business of a farmer, but before he had taken any farm, claimed payment of the legacy. A multiplepointing by the trustees, for the purpose of having it determined whether they were warranted to comply with the demand, was dismissed, 1st, as incompetent; and, 2d, in respect that the question raised was matter for the discretion of the trustees in the first instance, p. 267.

—See Husband and Wife.

TRUST-SETTLEMENT—Heritable and Moveable—Provisions to Children—A party by his trust-settlement directed his trustees, "if it shall not have been done previously, to lend out on good heritable security the sum of £10,000, as soon after my death as possible, for securing payment of the yearly interest and produce to my widow;" 2d, "As soon as possible after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, if not previously done, to lend out the sum of £9000 for the security of provisions to my daughters." Lastly, "As soon after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife as may be convenient, to convey and make over, in equal portions, to my sons A and B, the free residue of my estate, heritable and moveable." The wife survived the truster. He himself left heritable securities to the amount of £7400; and the trustees, over and above, took heritable securities to themselves, amounting to £10,184. After the death of the widow, but before the division of the residue, A, the son, died intestate. In a competition between his heir and executors for the half of the residue—Held, 1. That the heritable securities left by the truster himself were to be imputed pro tanto in making up the investment of £10,000 for the widow: 2. That after her death the said £10,000 was to be kept up to the amount of £9000, for the security of the provisions to the daughters: 3. That the remaining £1000, together with the whole other residue of the testator, was moveable, and that the half destined to the residuary legatee deceased, descended to his executors, p. 236.

TRUSTEE—See Bankrupt. Bona Fides. Parent and Child. Process. Reparation. Trust. Trust-Deed. COMPETITION FOR—See Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 54. TRUSTEES—Personal Liability, p. 239.

U

USAGE—See Parish.

V

VALUATION—See Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 40. VESTING—See Testament.

VITIATION—See Bill of Exchange.

W

WAKENING AND TRANSFERENCE—See Process.

WARRANTICE—See Property. Sale.

WATER—See Property.

WITNESS—See Process. Proof.

WRITS, PRODUCTION OF—See Process.

WRONGOUS IMPRISONMENT—See Reparation.

INDEX

. OF

CASES DECIDED IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

ACCRETION—Alluvion—River—Feu-Right—Property—

—By a series of Statutes, the first in 1758 and the last in 1825, a trust was created for improving the navigation of the river Clyde. Powers were conferred on the trustees to undertake all necessary works for that purpose, whether it should be by contracting or enlarging the channel of the river. The trustees proceeded by contracting the channel, for which end they erected embankments in the channel of the stream. At one part of the river a feu-right had been granted in 1792 by the Magistrates and Town-council of Glasgow (who were then also the trustees of the river), of a piece of ground of a specified measurement, and described as bounded on the north by the Clyde. A considerable space having been interjected between the original limits of the feu and the river, in consequence of the embankment made by the trustees, and the filling up of the ground behind, which was done principally by them, so that it became solid ground about 1826—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) in an action of declarator by the feuar, to have that new ground declared to belong to him in absolute property, as having accreted to his original feu, that he had not acquired such property therein, but that the trustees were entitled to remove their embankment and resume possession of the interjected space, for the improvement of the navigation, without giving any compensation to the feuar as for his own ground, p. 509.

ACCUMULATIONS—See Loan.

ACT OF SEDERUNT, 11th July 1828—See Process.

ADMINICLE—See Proof.

ALLUVION—See Accretion.

ANNEXATION—See Poors' Rates.

ANNUITY—See Trust-Settlement.

ARRESTMENT, BREACH OF—See Diligence.

ASSIGNATION—See Trust.

BANKRUPT—See Trust, Latent.

CASH-CREDIT—See Trust, Latent.

CONDITIO SI SINE LIBERIS—See Testament.

DAMAGES—See Landlord and Tenant. Reparation.

DILIGENCE—Arrestment, Breach of—Bona fide Payment—Principal and Agent—Statute 1591, c. 118—Where an arrestee transmitted funds to his agent, who therewith paid the original creditor in bona fide, both being at the time of such payment ignorant that any arrestment had been used against him, such arrestment having been executed in his absence at his dwelling-house previous to the payment—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that he was not liable in second payment, as for breach of arrestment, p. 669.

ENTAIL—Fetters—Institute—Irritant Clause—An entail, with prohibitory and resolute clauses directed against the institute nominatim, but with an irritant clause directed against "any of the heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate"—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) not to be so feued in the irritant clause as to strike at a sale of the estate by the institute.—Observed by the Chancellor, That reference cannot be made to other parts of a deed of entail for the purpose of giving more effect to the irritant clause than is to be derived from the expressions used in that clause itself, p. 169.

—See Trust.

EXECUTRY—See Trust.

EXPENSES—See Mandate. Reparation.

FACTOR—See Trust.

FACULTY—See Succession.

FEU-RIGHT—See Accretion.

FOREIGN—See Loan. Mandate. Trust.

GUARANTEE—See Trust, Latent.

HEIR—See Trust, Latent.

JURISDICTION—Held (in affirmance of a judgment of that Court) that the Court of Session have jurisdiction, ratione contractus, over an heirress-portioner domiciled in England, and personally cited during a residence in Scotland of less than forty days, in respect she was liable for the debts of her father on the passive titles, as having been served to a Scotch estate for the purpose of conveying it away in implement of her father's general settlement, from which she took benefit, and as possessed of a mid-superiority alleged to be of little value, p. 667.

HOMOLOGATION—See Husband and Wife.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Testament—Provisions—Jus Relictæ—Homologation—Reduction—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that a widow having, in the first instance, accepted and taken possession of various special subjects of value, to which she had right by the testamentary deeds of her husband; and having thereafter transacted with his disponees and executors, and discharged all her claims against the estate, it was not thereafter competent, either to her or any one in her right, to repudiate or reduce the settlements of her husband on the ground of inadequacy or otherwise, p. 642.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—See Marriage, Constitution of Succession.

HYPOTHEC, OBLIGATION TO ASSIGN—See Landlord and Tenant.

INTEREST—See Loan.

JURISDICTION—See Trust.

JURY TRIAL—See Landlord and Tenant.

JUS RELICTÆ—See Husband and Wife.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—Hypothec, Obligation to Assign—Question, Is a landlord bound, on receiving payment of rent past due, to assign his right, or is he bound only to grant a discharge? p. 321.

Sequestration—Reparation—Damages—Process—Jury Trial—A tenant under a lease, which contained an obligation on the part of the landlord to put the houses and buildings in good repair, and to make the fences on the farm fencible "betwixt and the term of Whitsunday next," fell into arrear of rent, and was sequestered, on which the tenant's agent, on 18th May, made the following tender in a letter to the landlord's agent: "Stop the roup in Gordon v. Grahams: and since we can't do better, I will advance the arrears and expenses myself, on your client granting an assignation, or giving me an obligation to grant one at my expense. My assignation not to compete with the landlord's right for the balance of the year's rent of which the above arrears form a part." And on the 24th May he repeated the tender in another letter. The offer was at last accepted, and the sequestration withdrawn on the 28th May. The tenant then brought an action of damages, and obtained a verdict against the landlord for not duly implementing the obligation in the lease relative to buildings and fences, and also for having failed, after the aforesaid tenders of rent, timeously to withdraw the sequestration. Exceptions were taken to the charge of the presiding Judge, inter alia, because he directed the jury, that after the tenders of 18th and 24th May, the landlord was "in law responsible to the pursuer for not withdrawing the sequestration quoad the sums contained in these tenders." The Court of Session, without deciding the question of law as to the landlord's liability involved in the direction, disallowed the bill of exceptions, holding that there were sufficient grounds to support the direction, in the whole circumstances of the case—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the direction was erroneous, in respect there was nothing in these tenders to raise a liability on the part of the landlord.—Observed by the Lord Chancellor, that the direction on the legal question of liability behaved to be judged of on the grounds on which it was put by the presiding Judge, and not in relation to the other circumstances of the case, p. 321.

LAPSING—See Testament.

LIABILITY—See Poor's Rates.

LIBEL, AMENDMENT OF—See Reparation.

LIFERENT AND FEE—See Superior and Vassal.

LEGACY—See Testament.

LOAN—Interest—Foreign—Accumulations—A party, who was insane, died in India in 1810, leaving a sum of money in rupees in the hands of a house of agency there. His relations in this country, who were aware of the insanity, had, about the time of the death, of which they were not aware till long after, some correspondence with one of the partners of the company when in this country, in consequence of which, in 1812, they were put in possession of an account or doquet, signed by the firm, ascertaining the balance in their hands, as in April 1810, to amount to a certain sum, and specifying "to bear interest at 9 per cent. per annum,"—the figure "9" being written on an erasure. This doquet was admitted to be a valid probative document—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That the defender was bound by the account so rendered in 1812, and was liable for the sums therein charged; and 2. That interest was due on these sums from 30th April 1810, at the rate of 9 per cent., to the date of final decree; but 3. (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), That in calculating interest on the said amount, compound interest or annual rests ought not to be allowed, p. 427.

MANDATE—Expenses—Process—Foreign—A foreigner brought an action in this Court, and sisted a mandatory; and while the record was in the course of preparation, the mandatory lodged in process a minute of withdrawal as mandatory, which was not objected to, and a new mandatory was ordered to be sisted, but it afterwards appeared that at the date of lodging this minute the mandant had died, or was believed to have died abroad; his representatives failing to appear and sist themselves as parties—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the mandatory, though not entitled to carry on the action for the purpose of showing that no expenses would in the issue have been found due to the defender, was nevertheless liable to the defender in the expenses incurred by him in the process during the subsistence of the mandate. 2. That the mandatory was not entitled to be reponed against the judgment of the Court of Session finding him liable in these expenses, on the allegation that it had since been discovered that the mandant was still alive, p. 162.

MARRIAGE, CONSTITUTION OF—Husband and Wife—A gentleman addressed the following letter to his housekeeper: "You and I having lived together as man and wife for some time, I hereby declare you to be my lawful wife, in the event of a child being born, in consequence of the present connexion betwixt us." The letter was dated 1826, but not delivered till 1828, at which period a child had been born—the gentleman's averment being that he had antedated and delivered the letter for the purpose of making a third party, to whom he had promised marriage, believe that he could not fulfil his promise—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the letter was not sufficient, either per se or with reference to the facts proved, to constitute a marriage, p. 674.

—Husband and Wife—Proof—Parole—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) competent for the defender in a declarator of marriage to prove the purpose for which, and the circumstances under which, a written declaration of marriage was given by him to the pursuer, p. 674.

OBLIGATION—See Succession.

PACTUM ILLICITUM—Public Officer—Question, Whether, where an office under the Crown is not itself assignable, the emoluments may legally be assigned or conveyed for behoof of creditors? p. 676.

PARENT AND CHILD—See Testament.

PASSIVE TITLES—Where three sisters were served as heiress-portioners of their father, for the purpose of conveying Scotch estate to the trustees of the marriage-settlement of one of them, in which settlement the father provided the heiress in one-third of his estate (subject to his power of disposal, legacies, &c.)—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that the service inferred a legal representation of the father by all the sisters, and liability for his debts—the other sisters having joined in the service, and in conveying the Scotch estate in implement of a direction in the father's general settlement, from which they took benefit, p. 666.

PAYMENT, BONA FIDE—See Diligence.

POWERS AND LIABILITY—See Public Officer.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—See Diligence, Trust.

PROCESS—A. S., 11th July 1828—In an action of damages by a schoolmaster for alleged illegal dismissal, the cause, after being sent to the jury roll, was retransmitted, previously to trial, to the Court of Session, for the determination of certain points of law, and the Lord Ordinary having, in terms of the 65th section of the Act of Sederunt 1828, reported the cause on cases, the record being unclosed—Held competent for the Court, at that stage of the cause, to dismiss the action de plano as groundless, p. 431.

—PARTIES CALLED—Held to be no objection to a process against heiress-portioners, for making them liable on the passive titles for the ancestor's debts, that the trustees under the ancestor's settlement, who were resident in England, and vested by the settlement with a right to take up and administer the ancestor's whole estate, real and personal, had not been called, p. 667.

PROCESS—See Landlord and Tenant. Mandate. Reparation.

PROOF—Adminicle—A memorandum, made by and found in the repositories of a deceased country gentleman, of a conversation with a female about the real purpose of a letter intended to be used by her in a declarator of marriage, about which she had come to consult him—Held competent evidence, p. 674.

—See Marriage.

PROPERTY—See Accretion.

PROVISIONS—See Husband and Wife. Testament.

POORS' RATES—Liability—Statute 7 Geo. III. c. 27—Construction—Annexation—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that by the Statute 7 Geo. III. c. 27, for extending the royalty of the city of Edinburgh, the lands of Hillside, thereby disjoined from the parish of South Leith and annexed to the parish of Saint Giles, in the city of Edinburgh, remain liable in payment of poors' rates to the parish of South Leith, and that not only on account of the solum, but also for the buildings erected thereon, p. 672.

PUBLIC OFFICER—Schoolmaster—Trustees—Powers and Liability—A testator left in trust a sum of money to certain parties "for the benefit of a charity or school for the poor" of the testator's native parish, but no conditions were inserted in the deed of bequest as to the way and manner in which these trustees were to execute the bequest. The trustees founded an institution for teaching, and appointed masters to continue at pleasure—Held, in an action of damages brought by one of the masters who had been dismissed (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that there was no obligation in law on the trustees to appoint ad vitam aut culpam only—that the pursuer's appointment was not ad vitam aut culpam, and action therefore dismissed, p. 431.

—See Pactum Illicitum.

REDUCTION—See Husband and Wife. Trust, Latent.

REPARATION—Damages—Wrongous Imprisonment—Process—Caption—Advocation—Amendment of Libel—Expenses—In an action of damages for wrongful imprisonment, on the ground that the pursuer had been apprehended under a process-caption issued by the Sheriff of Roxburghshire for recovering a process which had been advocated to the Court of Session, and was therefore under the control and jurisdiction of that Court,—the circumstances being, that a bill of advocation had been passed, but the letters had not been expedited within the ten days allowed by the Act of Sederunt, so that the bill fell, and a certificate to that effect was given out to the defenders,—and the Sheriff-Court process stood borrowed on a receipt by the pursuer, as a procurator there, in common form, to return it when called upon,—he not having complied with the regulation of the Act of Sederunt in case of an advocation, viz., to return the process to the Sheriff-clerk, that it might be transmitted to the Court of Session on an obligation by the complainer's agent for its redelivery when the advocation should be finally disposed of; and the pursuer having unwarrantably expedite his letters of advocation after the certificate that the bill had fallen had been issued—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That there was no relevancy to sustain a claim of damages; and, 2. That the pursuer was not entitled to state, after the record was made up, but not closed, a new objection which went to the nullity of the caption altogether, otherwise than by an amendment of the libel on payment of the whole previous expenses, p. 505.

RIVER—See Accretion.

SCHOOLMASTER—See Public Officer.

SECURITY—See Trust, Latent.

SEQUESTRATION—See Landlord and Tenant.

STATUTES, 1681, c. 118—See Diligence; 1661, c. 24—See Trust, Latent; 7 Geo. III. c. 27—See Poors' Rates.

SUCCESSION—Vesting—Faculty—Obligation—Husband and Wife—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session) that a clause in a postnuptial contract of marriage, by which the husband bound himself to make payment to "his wife, or to any person or persons she shall appoint by a writing under her hand at any time in her lifetime, or without the consent of her husband, and that whether she survive or predecease him, and whether she have issue or not, of the sum of £3000 Sterling money, or such other lesser sum as she shall direct," vested the sum absolutely in her; and that, although she had not uplifted it during her life, nor disposed of it by any writing under her hand, it transmitted after her death to her next of kin, p. 433.

SUCCESSION—See Trust-Settlement.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Circumstances in which the title of a vassal was sustained, who had entered with a superior whose title was defective, but had subsisted on record, unimpeached, for nearly forty years—had been twice declared by the Court of Session to be valid, and acquiesced in as such by parties having an adverse claim to it, p. 664.

—Liferent and Fee—Held competent for a superior, uninfert, to dispose the fee of the superiority to one party, and the liferent to another, with power to the latter to enter vassals; and the entry of a vassal by the liferenter in the exercise of this power, held to be effectual, p. 664.

TESTAMENT—Parent and Child—Provision to Children—Legacy—Lapsing—Conditio si sine liberis—Trust—Where a father, in a family trust-settlement, left special legacies to his younger children and their heirs, and the residue of his means and estate to his eldest son, but without mentioning his heirs, although it was provided in his favour that his share of the succession should amount to a sum greater than the largest provision of any of the younger children; the eldest son having predeceased his father some hours, leaving children—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session) that his share of his father's succession did not lapse, but went to his children, notwithstanding the distinction made in the terms of the settlement between him and the younger children of the testator, and the fact that his children were alive at its date, p. 158.

—See Husband and Wife. Trust.

TRUST—Construction—Title to Sue—Assignment of Patent Office—Alimentary office—A party executed a trust-deed, by which he conveyed, for behoof of creditors, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and without prejudice to the generality, certain heritable and other subjects specified in the deed, and he bound himself to grant such deeds thereafter as the trustees should think necessary for the more effectual execution of the trust. The truster, at the date of the trust, held the office of keeper of a local register of seigns by patent under the Crown, but no mention was made in the trust-conveyance of the emoluments or right to the office. The trustee having brought an action to compel the truster to account for the emoluments—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), on a construction of the trust-deed, that neither the office nor emoluments were carried by the deed, and consequently, that the trustee had no title to pursue.—Opinion. That the clause as to granting other deeds was merely to render the trust more effective in its execution, so far only as the subjects actually conveyed by the principal deed were concerned, p. 676.

LATENT—Bankrupt—Statute, 1661, c. 24—Reduction—Completing Titles—Ancestor—Heir—Guarantee—Security—Cash-Credit—Thomas Allan, partner of the firm of Robert Allan and Son, bankers in Edinburgh, was infeft as absolute proprietor of two estates which were purchased by him with funds belonging to the firm, and in the books of the firm, accounts were kept relative to, and in the name of these estates, in which the disbursements by the firm, in the purchase-money, improvements, &c., were put to the debit, and the rents drawn were carried to the credit of the accounts. Robert Allan and Son got a cash-credit from the Royal Bank, and in security and repayment of their operations thereon, gave their joint bond as a company and as individuals—Thomas Allan at the same time disposing one of the foresaid estates in farther security. In less than a year after Thomas Allan's death, his son and heir, also a partner of the firm, which was continued under the same name after Thomas's death, granted to the Royal Bank a second bond and disposition in security over the two foressaid estates, in consideration of an additional loan to the firm—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That these estates were the private property of the deceased partner, and not held in trust by him for the company: 2. That being so, the conveyance by his son, within a year after his death, was null and void, under the second branch of Statute 1661, c. 24, prohibiting dispositions by apparent heirs to the prejudice of their ancestor's creditors: 3. That the company was dissolved by the death of the partner, and that without any notification to the public or to customers, although the articles of copartnership provided specially, "that in the event of the death of any partner, his heirs shall not be entitled to examine the books of the company; but the survivors shall make up a statement of the deceased's account, counting up to the first balance after the decease, and attest the same by their signatures or oath, if required; and such statement, signed and attested, shall be held as sufficient, and shall preclude any right to further examination by the heirs or others:" 4. That the first bond and disposition in security was not a continuing guarantee, but became inoperative on the death of the partner by the change in the company which then took place; and, 5. That the cash-credit having been operated upon subsequently to the death of the partner, in the same manner and under the same firm as before, and the account being kept by the bank as a continuous account, a balance standing against the company at the date of the partner's death was cleared off by payments afterwards made by the surviving partners. 6. Observed by the Lord Chancellor, that the principle recognised in the case of Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Merivale, 530, is applicable in its full extent to the present case, p. 216.

TRUST—SETTLEMENT—Succession—Construction—Annuity—A party having left a trust-settlement, with directions to lay out capital sums to answer annuities of £200, £400 and £400, for his three sisters, and if the residue of his estate should not be sufficient for yielding the annuities, to pay the interest arising on the whole residue to the sisters, in proportion to the annuities provided to them; and also with directions to pay the capital sums laid out for producing the annuities to certain residuary legatees, as and when the sums became tangible by the death of the said annuitants respectively; and one of the annuitants having predeceased the trustor, and another having died during the subsistence of the trust; and it not being ascertained before the accounting was completed, whether the annual income arising from the estate while both the annuitants surviving the testator were alive, would be sufficient to satisfy their annuities for that period in full—Held (altering the judgment of the Court of Session) that during the continuance of the trust, the annuitants could only divide among themselves the income of the estate as far as it would go, and that upon the death of one of them, the share or capital which was invested to secure the payment of that annuity became tangible and payable to the residuary legatees; and cause remitted to the Court of Session with a declaration to that effect, p. 222.

Testament—Entail—Jurisdiction—Foreign—Executry—Administration, Right of—A testator left a general trust-deed of his heritable and moveable property, wherever situated, in favour of trustees, for certain purposes,—the trust to be subject to any entail of the heritage which he might execute, and which, it was declared, should be held and taken to be a part of the trust. The testator subsequently executed an entail. On his decease, the trustees named in the trust-deed declined to act. The heiress of entail first entitled to succeed made up titles under the entail and was infeft, and likewise confirmed to the moveables in Scotland, and administered to the personalty in England. With consent of all concerned, including the said heiress of entail, new trustees were appointed by the Court in place of those who declined to act. These new trustees then brought two actions against the said heiress of entail; the first, to have it declared that the whole property, funds and effects belonging to the testator in Scotland, England, and elsewhere, including the funds and effects held by the said heiress of entail under the letters of administration, pertain to, and are vested in the pursuers in trust; and the second, to have it declared that the pursuers are entitled to all the powers given to the trustees named in the trust-deed, and as such, to make up titles to the lands in which the said heiress of entail was infeft, and to obtain themselves seized therein, so as to carry into effect the purposes of the trust—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session) that the power of appointing persons to recover and administer property situated in England is vested exclusively in the ecclesiastical courts of that country, and therefore, that the administration of the testator's property in England must remain with the said heiress of entail, by virtue of the letters of administration held by her; but, 2. (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that notwithstanding the infeftment of the heiress of entail under the entail, it was feudally competent for the trustees to obtain themselves seized in the whole lands, qua trustees, in order to effect the objects of the trust, p. 164.

TRUST—Trustees, Liability of—Factor—Principal and Agent—A trust-deed of a very extensive property, and involving very considerable trouble, provided the three trustees named in £100, to be divided among them annually, as a gratification for trouble. The deed contained a clause of the following nature: The trustees "shall noways be obliged to do diligence, otherwise than as he or they shall think fit, nor shall he or they be liable for omissions, but only each of them for himself, and his own actual and personal intrusions, nor shall they be farther liable for their factors than that they shall be habit and repute responsible at the time of entering upon their office." The trustees named in the deed appointed one of their own number to be factor, another to be cashier, and a third to be country agent; and they appointed an accountant, with a salary, to audit the accounts annually. The factor and cashier, by authority of the trustees, were to get an annual salary for these offices; that of the cashier amounted to £50. The trust-deed gave no authority for the creation of these offices in the persons of the trustees themselves. Considerable balances were allowed to accumulate in the factor's hands from year to year, with which circumstance the trustees were acquainted. Ultimately the factor became bankrupt, with a large balance in his hands—Circumstances in which held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That the trustees were not liable to make up the deficiency; and, 2. That the fact of one of the trustees being cashier, with a salary, and thereby having a special superintendence over the factor, did of itself, without proof of wilful misconduct, infer liability against him, p. 535.

TRUST—See Testament.

TRUSTEES—See Public Officer. Trust.

VESTING—See Succession.

WRONGOUS IMPRISONMENT—See Reparation.

INDEX OF NAMES.

CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

	Page		Page
A		A
A v. B	86, 115, 215	Carfrae's Trustees v. John, Harriet and Jane Carfrae	236
A. B. v. Janet Chisholm	264	Carnegie, Sir James, v. Anthony Mactier and Others	515
Ainslie, Alexander, v. The Trustees for the Creditors of the City of Edinburgh, &c.	252	Chaplin, John, and Mandatory v. William Allan	250
Aitken, James, v. The Magistrates, &c. of Lanark	423	Christie's Creditors	25
Alexander, John Henry, v. J. H. Anderson	591	Christie of Durie, Petitioner	7
Allan or Hutchison, Mrs Margaret, v. Hutchison's Trustees	466	Clason, Andrew, v. David Black and Others	270
Allan, Hugh, v. Robert Glasgow's Trustees	209	Cleghorn, James and George, and John Wilson v. Sir W. F. Elliot and Trustees	492
Anderson, David, v. James Wright	534	Clement, William, v. Robert and James Greig	421
Anderson, George, and Others v. Claud Russell and Others	259	Clephane or Minto, Mrs Isabella, and Husband v. John Kirkpatrick	395
Anderson, John, v. The Bank of Scotland	459	Clyde Shipping Company, The New, v. The River Clyde Trustees	586
Anderson, Thomas, (Smith's Trustee) v. Walker's Trustees	584	Connell, Archibald, v. The Duke of Buccleuch	45
Armstrong, William, v. The Rev. Robert Wilson	444	Corbett Porterfield, James, v. Nathaniel Gordon Porterfield and Others	91
Auld, Robert, v. Aikman's Trustees	570	Corey, Thomas, and Mandatory v. William Anderson	582, 622
Ayton, Heritors and Kirk-Session of, v. Heritors and Kirk-Session of Coldingham, &c.	271	Cormack, David, v. Mrs Jemima Erakine or Henderson	564
B		Cowden, John, v. John Lachlison	191
Baillie, Colonel Hugh Duncan, v. Donald Mackay	585	Cowie, Miss Mary, and Others (Lovie's Trustees) v. George Duncan	31
Baird William, and Mrs Janet Haddow or Fell, Claimants	231	Cox, John, v. George Tait and Others	177
Balfour, John, v. Balfour's Trustees	329	Coyne, George, v. James Boag	16
Ballantyne, William, v. Mrs Elizabeth Carter	173	Craig v. Thomson	265
Bank, The Glasgow and Ship, and Sir W. Forbes and Co. v. Craig's Trustee and the Commercial Bank of Scotland	194	Craig, John, v. Brock and Ferguson	22
Bank of Scotland, Raisers—Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, and John Kirkpatrick, Claimants	403	Crawford, Alexander Farquhar, v. Stirling's Trustees and Messrs Pearson and Robertson	98
Bank of Scotland, Commercial, v. Joan Black or Haining and John Haining	528	Creighton, David, v. James M'Intosh	616
Barclay, James, v. William Muir	66	Crieff, Heritors and Kirk-Session of the Parish of, v. Heritors and Kirk-Session of the Parish of Little Dunkeld and Monzievaird	610
Beattie, Jean, and Husband v. Robert Murdoch	284	Cullen, John, v. James Macfarlane	587
Berry, William, v. James Wilson	54	Cumming, Rev. Alexander, and Others (Swanson's Trustees) v. William Williamson	419
Beveridge, Robert, v. Robert Henderson	37	D
Beveridge, Samuel, v. William Moffat and Alexander Braeh	463	Dalglish, Robert, v. Lieutenant-General Duncan Darroch	128
Black or Haining, Mrs Joan, and John Haining, Claimants	528	Darling or Wilson, Jessie, and Others v. James Adamson	19
Black, John, v. Daniel Macfarlane	533	Darroch, Lieutenant-General Duncan, v. Andrew Ranken	56
Blair, Alexander, v. Thomas Ranken	579	Dewar, Rev. David, and Others v. Alexander Peterkin	72
Boag, James, v. George Coyne	16	Dewar, Rev. David, and Others v. Rev. John Cruickshank and Others	533
Bond, Ephraim, v. M'Leod	16	Dingwall, Alexander, v. Alexander Dingwall, jun.	301
Boswell, Sir James, v. Montgomerie and Others	104	Dingwall Fordyce, Arthur, v. Sir Henry Bridges	447
Boyd, Agnes, v. George Kerr	516	Dixon, William, v. Mrs Dixon or Fisher and Husband	542
Brakinrigg, William, v. Robert Drybrough Menzies	109	Dores, Thomas, v. Messrs Horne and Rose	265
Breadalbane, Trustees of the late Marquis of, v. The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos and Others	439	Downie, Alexander, v. Charles Peebles	47
Brechin, George, v. William Taylor	335	Duff, Charles, Appellant	359
Brown, Joseph, v. James George and Others	279	Duncan, George, v. Lovie's Trustees	31
Brown, William, v. Thomas Samuel and Company	583	Dundee, Trustees of the Harbour of, v. The Magistrates of Dundee	274
Browne, Poor Anna Maria, v. Robert Burns	516	Dunn, Mrs Isabella Watson, v. William Matthews	191
Bruce, Ann, v. William Petrie	17	E
Bryson or Torrance, Margaret, v. James Bryson	30	Eglinton, The Earl of, v. Lord Montgomerie and Others and Paterson's Trustees	177
Bryson, James, v. Muir's Trustees	24	Elgin, Magistrates of, v. Messrs Gatherer and Walker	7
Buchan, Earl of, v. Harry Shipley Erskine and Others	525, 527	Elliot, Sir W. F., and Trustees v. James and George Clegborn and John Wilson	491
Buchan, Earl of, v. Lady Cardross	415	Esson, Petitioner	491
C		F
Cairns, George, v. Robert Anstruther	162	Farquhar, Margaret and Jane Gray, v. William Finlay Hamilton	242
Cairns, John, v. James Merry and Others	190
Campbell or M'Gibbon, Mrs Mary, v. Thomas Baillie	320
Campbell, John Graham, v. The Parliamentary Trustees for the Heirs of Entail of Shirvan	193
Campbell's Trustees v. John Campbell Ralston	424
Canal Company, Edinburgh and Glasgow Union, v. Sir J. G. Carmichael	625

Fife's Trustees, Earl of, v. The Magistrates of Aberdeen	400
Findlay, Colonel Alexander, v. William Mackintosh	660
Finlay, Kirkman, and Others v. James Thomson and Archibald McConnell	285
Forster, Mrs. and Husband v. Tod's Trustees	406
Fraser, A. T. F., v. The Right Honourable Baron Lovat	104
Fyfe v. Woodman	100
Fyfe, Dr Andrew, v. John Carfrae and Son	43
Fyffe, David, and Others v. John Hutchinson Fergusson	569

G

Gardner, Janet, v. James Alexander Haldane	567
Garland, Andrew, v. Peter Stewart and Others	1
Gentle, Robert, v. George Izat and Alexander Thomson	52
Glasgow, Robert, v. W. Scott Moncrieff, Wishart's Trustees	313
Glen, Adam, v. David Black and his Cautioners	12
Goldie, Alexander and William (Mrs Hoggan or Smith's Trustees) v. Miss Jean Goldie and Others	571
Gordon, Lieut.-Col. John, and Alexander Millar, Claimants	128
Gordon, Lieut.-Col. John, v. John and James Graham	321
Graham, James, v. Captain Thomas Macintosh	73
Graham, John and James, v. Lieut.-Col. John Gordon	325
Graham, John, v. His Grace the Duke of Hamilton	198
Gregorson, John, v. Archibald Edward Macdonald	267
Greig, Peter, v. John Miller and James Normand	263
Greig, Robert, and Others, Petitioners	177
Grimshaw, Ambrose, and Others v. John Malcolm	455

H

Haldane and Abbot v. Alexander Fraser and his Trustee	419
Hamilton, Alexander Duke of, v. John Urquhart	3
Harbour and Docks of Leith, Commissioners for the, v. The Trinity Harbour Company	381
Harvey, John, v. Adam Forrest	39
Henderson, Robert, and Others v. The Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts	134
Hendrie, John, v. Robert Stewart	513
Hepburn, Petitioner	491
Holcombe, Lieutenant-Colonel H. F., v. John Stewart	437
Home, George, v. James Hardy and Others	575
Home, William F., &c. v. William Pringle's Trustee	535
Hopetoun, Earl of, v. Thomas Horner and Others	313
Horne and Rose v. Dr and Mrs Bremner	620
Houston's Executors v. Scougall and Company's Trustee	33, 393

I & J

Inglis, James, and Alexander Hume v. William Richmond	281
Inglis, Malcolm (Robertson's Trustee) v. The Port-Eglington Company	202
Jaffray or M'Gowan, Ann, v. William Jaffray	620

K

Kemp, Robert, (Napier's Trustee) and Others v. John Napier and Others	229
Kennedy, Mrs C., and Andrew Kennedy v. George Steell	4
Kerr, Robert, v. Archibald Scott	504
Kilgour, Alice, v. Andrew Nicol and Trustee	561
Kilpatrick, Robert, v. Thomas Kilpatrick and Others	46
King, Daniel, v. Margaret Patrick or King	27, 233
King, James, v. P. and W. Creighton	25
Kinnoull, Earl of, and Rev. Robert Young v. Rev. John Ferguson and Others	550
Kinnoull, Earl of, v. The Rev. Dr Gordon and Others	597
Kirk, Robert, v. Ann Forbes	580
Kirkcaldy, G. D. H., v. Mrs Catherine Marshall and Others	78
Kirkland, David, v. Kirkland's Trustees	239
Kirkwood, John, v. John Thomas Keeling	327

L

Laidlaw, Robert, v. Christopher Smyth	444
Landell, William, v. William Purves	417, 653
Lethem's Representatives v. William Baird and Mrs Janet Haddow or Fell	231
Lindsay, Donald (Marquis of Huntly's Trustee) v. John Webster	89

Lindsay, Donald (Marquis of Huntly's Trustee) v. Earl of Aboyne	314
Lochnaben, Magistrates of, v. William Beck	11
Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, and John Kirkpatrick, Claimants	403
Lockhart and Swan, and W. Paul, Raisers—N. Lockhart, C. Ferrier and J. M'Neill, Claimants	403
Louson, Andrew (Craig's Trustee) v. James Craig	520
Lovat, Lord, v. The Rev. Alexander Garden Fraser	115
Lovat, Lord, v. Archibald T. F. Fraser	496
Love, John, and Others v. Thomas Brown	141
Lumsden, Harry Leith, v. James Gordon and William Simpson	446
Lumsden, James, v. Mrs Stuart or Lorimer and Husband	83
Lyon, George, v. Archibald Butter and Thomas E. Baird	67

M

M'Arthur, Colin, and Thomas Gemmill v. John Melvil	129
M'Arthur	113
M'Kellar, Dugald, v. Donald M'Kellar and Others	192
Mackenzie, James W., Petitioner	216
Mackenzie, Murdo, Objector	385
Mackenzie, Roderick, v. The Magistrates of Fortrose	258
M'Ewen or Munnoch, Mrs Elizabeth, v. Daniel M'Ewen	452
M'Farlane, John, and Others v. Randal William Callender and Robert Lewis	567
M'Farquhar or Burrows, Mary Anne, v. Mary Cornwall and Others	289
M'Gregor or Munro, Elizabeth, v. Poor Andrew Munro	255
M'Kinlay, Elizabeth, v. Stewart Mitchell	343
M'Innes, Major-General John, (Macalister's Trustee) v. Macalisters	233
M'Clelland, James, (Allans' Trustee) v. Robert Rodger and Company	208
M'Millan, Peter, and Gilbert M'Kellar v. Duncan M'Culloch	25
Macpherson, Ann, v. William Macpherson and Others	172
Macphun v. Marshall	423
Macrae, Alexander, v. Colonel John Gordon	515
Macrier, Anthony, and Others v. Sir James Carnegie	277
Madden, Mrs Elizabeth, and Others v. Archibald Currie's Trustees and Others	503
Maiklem, Poor John, v. John Macgruthar	553
Mansfield, Thomas, (Burnett's Trustee) v. Mrs Violet Young and Others	551
Matheson, John, v. George Mackenzie	398
Matthew, Thomas, v. Robert Fawns	141
Melville, Right Hon. Viscount, and Others (Sir R. Preston's Trustees) v. Sir William Erskine's Trustees	425
Melville, Viscount, v. John Paterson, Plummer's Trustee	396
Melville, Right Hon. Viscount, and Messrs Whytock v. William Denniston	62
Melvin, George, v. The President and Governors of Gordon's Hospital	101
Menzies, Thomas, v. John Murdoch, Livingstone's Trustee	347
Middleton, Rev. William, and Others v. Alexander Anderson and Others	390
Milne, James, v. Mary Cobban or Blacklaws	48, 328
Milne, Patrick, v. Charles Melville	392
Mitchelson, Henry, &c. v. David Peacock	588
Moncur, John, and his Trustee v. The Commercial Bank of Scotland	289
Mone, John, v. John Anderson and Others	53
Monteith, Henry, v. John Pattison and Others	493
Moray, Earl of, v. Charles Pearson (Forsyth's Trustee) and W. H. Playfair	149
Moreen, Alexander, Petitioner	518
Morrison, Alexander, and Neil M'Callum v. Alexander Campbell	100, 216
Morrison, John, &c. v. John Gregory M'Kirdy, &c.	289
Murray, Andrew, v. Elizabeth M'Gregor or Munro	296
Murray, William, v. Miss Anne Matilda Murray and Others	296

N

Neilson, James Beaumont, and Others v. Househill Coal and Iron Company	174, 626
---	----------

	Page		Page
P		T
Pearson, Alexander, and Others (Alexander's Trustees)	501	Thomson, John, v. Agnes Westwood	296
v. William M. Alexander and Others	240	Thomson, Robert, v. John Hamilton Mack	255
Peter, Bathia, v. William Rennie's Representatives	107	Thorburn, James, v. James Charters	65
Plock and Logan v. James Wallace	20, 107	Tweeddale, George Marquis of, v. Alexander Beatson and Others	83, 307
Pollok or Tennant, Mrs Janet, and Husband v. Dr William Pollok	38	V & W
Prentice, David, and Company v. James Cochran	454	Vignes, Antoine, v. Edinburgh and Leith Bank	514
R		Waddell, Miss Euphemia, v. James Waddell and Curators	618
Rae, Sir Wm., (her Majesty's Advocate) v. John Douglas	307	Waldie, John, v. The Commercial Bank	583
Railway Company, Edinburgh, Leith, and Newhaven, v. David Manson	573	Wand, Andrew, &c., v. Charles Stewart and James Gibb	245
Ralston, Alexander M'Dougall, v. James and John Ralston	457	Watmore, Mrs Thomas, v. Thomas Burns	57
Ramsay, Sir Alexander, v. The Principal and Professors of the United College of St Andrews	152	Watt, Archibald, v. William Knox	595
Ramsay, Robert Balfour Wardlaw, v. The Commercial Bank of Scotland	332	Wedderburn or Hawkins, Mrs M., and Husband v. Sir David Wedderburn, &c.	336
Rattray, William, v. John Meadows White	335	Wilson, Rev. David, v. Presbytery of Stranraer	414
Rennie, Mrs Frances, and Husband v. James Ritchie	523	Wilson, Elizabeth, v. Archibald Brown	146
Ritchie, James, and John Craich v. James Moir and Robert Jameson	62	Wood, Christopher, v. Robert Anstruther and James Renton	456
Robertson v. Mason	149	Y & Z
Robertson, Nicol, v. Alexander Davidson and Others	51	Young or Steedman, Janet, and Others v. Alexander Malcolm and Others	529
Robertson, Robert H., and Mandatory v. John Rutherford	443	Zuill, Andrew, v. M'Murphy, Ralston and Company	310
Robertson, Robert Henry, v. Thomas Clark	128
Robertson, Thomas, v. Lieutenant-Colonel John Gordon and Alexander Millar	499
Roughhead, David, v. Joseph Stevenson and Others	556
Roy or Mackenzie, Mrs Isabella Colina, v. Curator for Ross's Children	259
Russell, Claud, and Others v. George Anderson and Others	654
S
Sands, W. H., (Duke of Roxburghe's Trustee) v. The Right Hon. the Earl of Wemyss and March	563
Scott, John, v. Jane Stevenson or Ronald	622
Scott, Ralph Erskine, v. The Edinburgh, Leith and Newhaven Railway Company	115
Seton, Christopher, v. William Dawson and Others	192
Sheriff, Alexander, v. John Balmer and Mandatory	556
Smith, Reverend James Doune, v. Presbytery of Abertarf and Others	576
Smith, William, and Others v. Henry Anthony Hardman and Others

CASES DECIDED IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

Allan, William, v. Peter M'Craw and Others	672	Gibson-Craig, Sir James, v. Sir Thomas John Cochrane and Others	664
Bank of Scotland, The Royal, v. Adam Christie and Others	216	Gordon, Lieut-Col. John, v. John and James Graham	321
Bell, Andrew, v. Dr Andrew Mylne and Others	431	Hill, Robert, and Others v. William Paul	676
Breadalbane, Marquess of, James Auchinleck Cheyne, &c. v. Charles Campbell	169	Home, William F., &c. v. John Pringle (William Pringle's Trustee) and Others	535
Cairns, George, v. Robert Anstruther	162	Irvine or Douglas, Elizabeth, and Others v. John Kirkpatrick	666
Casamajor, Misses, and Others v. Pearson and Robertson, W.S., and Others	222	Laidlaw, Robert, v. John Smith, Garden's Trustee	669
Dill, William, v. Major-General Sir Robert Houston and Others, Houston's Trustees	433	Preston, Dame Anne Campbell Baird, v. The Right Hon. Viscount Melville and Others, Sir Robert Preston's Trustees	164
Dixon, Anthony, and Others v. Mrs Brown or Dixon and Others	158	Scott, Thomas, v. Messrs Carle and Erakine	505
Dixon, William, v. Mrs Margaret Dixon or Fisher and Husband	542	Stewart or Menzies, Mrs C., and Others v. John Menzies	674
Fergusson, John Hutchinson, v. David Fyfe and Others	427	Todd, Charles, v. Magistrates, &c., of Glasgow	509

